PRELIMINARY EXPLANATIONS.

As this work must fall into the hands of many individuals who know little of political affairs, it is necessary to give the following preliminary explanations.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

There are two kinds of government; and the two may be best distinguished by the words LIBERAL and ILLIBERAL. The present nations of Europe arose, it may be said, out of the ruins of the Roman empire—a sovereignty which formerly overspread a great part of the world, but was gradually broken into pieces during the centuries between the sixth and the eleventh. For a long time all these nations were governed, each by a single monarch, who had almost unlimited power over his subjects. But it has happened that, in the island of Great Britain, the power of the King has been a good deal broken down by the people, who now chiefly govern themselves, through the medium of a representative body, called the House of Commons, the King only retaining certain minor privileges. It has also happened that the people of France have been able to exchange their despotic monarchy for one equally limited with that of Great Britain. Such things always happen when nations attain a certain degree of civilization; that is to say, when they become sufficiently intelligent, and sufficiently orderly among themselves, to require a less rigorous kind of restraint to be imposed on them.

At present, only Great Britain, France, and Belgium, are liberalised countries. Most of the rest of Europe, consisting of Spain, Portugal, Holland, Germany, Austria, Prussia, Russia, and Italy, are non-liberalised; that is, they are still governed chiefly by single monarchs, who have no regular control upon their actions, or the way in which they manage their subjects. In these countries, nevertheless, there are large—but not large enough—parties of people, who would like very much to have their government liberalised; and, in some instances, attempts of that kind have been made, but put down by force. As power is a very agreeable thing to men, and, more especially, as there is always more or less mischief, and distress, and difficulty, about a decisive alteration of government, the absolute monarchs endeavour, with all their might, to prevent the progress of liberal opinions among their subjects. Seeing that the press would let their people know how the liberal countries are getting on, they restrain it by the most severe laws. Nay, they would like to make war against the liberalised countries—especially France and Belgium, which were latest liberalised—in order, if possible, to restore the old system, so that their own subjects might not have any such example at all before their eyes.

Europe, then, is now in the following predicament: Great Britain, France, and Belgium, are so circumstanced, that they may, perhaps, have soon to defend their liberal institutions against the arbitrary powers in their neighbourhood. There is just this chance against the war—namely, that the arbitrary monarchs have to fear lest their own subjects may not second them very cordially in their efforts to put down liberal opinions elsewhere. They have also to reflect that, in the last war, France alone not only maintained her part for many years against all those arbitrary powers, with Great Britain to assist them, but actually subjugated many of them. There is, further, some chance of a new liberalised power being added speedily to the confederacy—namely, Portugal, which is at present a subject of contest between two brothers, Miguel and Pedro, the latter of whom is of liberal dispositions. It is, upon the whole, most likely that no war of any importance will take place, but that the liberalised countries will be left at peace to enjoy their superior institutions, while the other nations must yet go through several stages of further civilization, before they can either obtain liberal institutions, or be fit, perhaps, to enjoy them.

HOME POLITICS.

Great Britain has been a liberalised country for centuries. It has, by a series of wrenches, forced a certain degree of liberty out of the hands of its sovereigns; and no country is so well fitted, by the intelligence and private virtue of its inhabitants, to enjoy civil freedom. The people obtained the decided protection of laws, in the reign of King John, about six hundred years ago. At the distance of about half that space of time—namely, in the middle of the sixteenth century—they abolished the Catholic, and assumed the Protestant religion; a change which operated in a most powerful manner in raising a spirit of independence and extending freedom of thought among the people. Soon after this period, they commenced a contest with their monarchs for a more liberal kind of government, which terminated at the Revolution of 1688, when the grand principle was established, that king and people are mutually dependent on each other, the one being obliged to rule by certain laws, and the other only called upon to obey so long as these laws are respected by their sovereign. Since the Revolution, the chief management of affairs has resided in the House of Commons, which was partly elected by certain local bodies of people, and partly nominated by the grandees of the realm, and by the Crown. Still, however, every act of the House of Commons required the sanction of an assembly of noblemen, called the House of Peers, and of the King himself, before it could become law. For a long time, the people were so much accustomed to pay deference to the King and the Peers, that they did not much regard the interference of those personages in the making up of the House of Commons. But at last they all at once became very much concerned on this point, and insisted on having the power of electing the whole of the House of Commons themselves; a demand urged with such vigour, that both the House of Peers and the King were obliged to give way last summer, so that the people, or the richer part of them, will henceforth have a much greater say than ever in the management of the national affairs.

Although the people are said to have done all this, it was in reality only a majority of the people who did it. Every great change has its objectors. The Civil War had its Cavaliers, the Revolution its Jacobites, and so forth. So has the Reform of the House of Commons had its Conservatists. Wealth makes men cautious, commercial enterprise makes them bold. Thus it has been the opinion of a great number of opulent persons throughout the country, and of a great variety of other kinds of men, that there was more danger in such a decisive change in the legislature—more danger of making men cease to obey all government and respect all laws, than there was good to be expected from it. "When you have got men into a habit of obeying any thing, even a thing in itself not very perfect, better," say the Conservatists, "keep them in this habit undisturbed, than, by attempting to improve the thing, shake their allegiance to it, and so cause them to think worse, perhaps, of the new, than they did of the old." Where men have thought conscientiously in this way, and are not observed to have any selfish reasons for wishing to keep things as they are, they ought to be respected by those who think differently; for it is very well known, that, in a community like that of Great Britain, the admiration of all surrounding nations for the general diffusion of good feeling between man and man, and the unity of spirit with which all seek the good of the country and the honour of the British name, there can be no class of persons thoroughly and by nature hostile to the public advantage. The whole are brothers, and their different views on political questions is too much a matter of mere chance, arising from their circumstances in life, their habits of thinking, or perhaps from no higher cause than the mere temperament of their blood, to make it feasible that they should entertain bitter feelings regarding each other. The Conservatists are so called, because they wish, in a general way, that institutions should be preserved as much as possible in their usual forms, they being of belief that the abuses of institutions had better be winked at than run the risk of ruining all by alteration. It may well be believed that these gentlemen strenuously opposed the passing of the Reform Act, though many of them have since expressed their willingness to turn it to the best account for the sake of the country, and, now that the first grand step has been taken, will probably show themselves as ready to reform minor abuses as those who have hitherto been their opponents.

It has been stated that commercial enterprise makes men bold in political speculations. This was remarked three thousand years ago by a Greek philosopher named Aristotle, who, seeing that agricultural habits had an equal effect in making men timid in those matters, expressed his fear that no nation would ever hold together under one government, if composed of these two kinds of people in nearly equal portions. Now, it happens that there are vast multitudes of commercial people in Great Britain, who, of course, are almost all of them anxious for improvements in the state management. The whole affair is one of arithmetic. A commercial man is in the habit of reckoning every thing by figures: if a man does so much, he gets so much; every good in this world he sees sold for its price. Now, the commercial man, having seen that some of the individuals who had a share in the creation of the House of Commons got money and power thereby, became resolved that no such thing should be, because it was not consistent with the common and proper rules of mercantile life for obtaining those advantages. Hence the Reform Act, and hence the cry which still continues for the abolition of sinecure places, and pensions enjoyed without merit. In the same way, the commercial man goes to work with the National Church Establishments. He sees certain clergymen in England and Ireland (for there is but one church in those two departments of the empire) getting very large salaries, without doing, as he thinks, any adequate service in return; while the more active class of ministers have perhaps far too little. This he thinks wrong; and hence the demand now astir for church reform, and the downfall of all privileged and established churches. Again, the commercial man sees that the landlords, or growers of grain throughout the country, have a privilege, by means of what are called the Corn Laws, of keeping up the price of their article above what it can be bought for on the Continent; so that these landlords, and their tenants, and all connected with them, have the enjoyment of more money than what they would otherwise have. This also seems very wrong to the commercial man; and hence the demand for the abolition of the corn restrictions. Men of this kind have not yet got any proper general name, except that of Liberals; but there seems to be little reason to give them any particular title, for they promise to become very speedily identical with the nation at large. Some men of tendencies such as these are called Whigs, and of them is the present Ministry composed ; but the Whigs are not willing to make nearly such extensive changes as many of the people are, and hence they are said to enjoy no sincere or general affection throughout the country. The more zealous of the arithmetical thinkers are called Radicals, from their having once asked for a radical reform of Parliament ; but this is a title from which many of the rest would shrink, as they are not so devoted to innovation, but they would still like to see a caution observed in the change. In short, it is exceedingly difficult to describe the great class of liberal thinkers by any specific epithet.

It is the actings of these various parties, and the progress and changes of opinion among them, that we are to chronicle in one large department of the record now laid before the public. While scrupulously endeavouring to give no one more or less than justice, it will be our earnest wish and aim to soften the asperities that arise among the parties—to aid in the explanation of their views mutually to each other—and to promote, as far as may lie in our power, that humane and generous spirit of good fellowship, which has hitherto characterised the British nations, even in the midst of civil war, and much more so in political debate.

THE CURRENCY QUESTION.

THERE are three things, yea, four, in our system of polity, that are supposed to pass all human comprehension—the Currency Question, the Corn Laws, the Principles of Trade, and the Payment of the National Debt. When an article is found in any periodical work with one of these titles at its head, the most of readers pass on to the next, with a hopeless shrug, as much as to say, “that is not for us.” Yet it is of the utmost importance that these questions should be generally understood, for they are of more or less concern to all. The circulation, for instance, is to the body politic what the blood is to the natural body, the nourisher of all its faculties. If it either falls short or redounds, the system is deranged in the one and in the other ; and we should, therefore, be prepared, by due information, both to prevent the derangement, as far as possible, and to repair the effects of what we cannot prevent. Under these impressions, we venture to present the following information upon the currency question, earnestly hoping that our account of it will be found intelligible by the bulk of the community.

The currency of a country is popularly understood to mean its gold and silver coins, or these and the bank notes together, found necessary in conducting its transactions. From the ideas habitually propagated upon this subject, eighteen millions would appear to be about the amount of gold and silver in circulation, from twenty-two to twenty-three millions of notes of the Bank of England, and sometimes ten, in particular periods seventeen, and even twenty millions of the notes of other banks. The circulation of the kingdom would thus appear to consist of about fifty-eight millions. It is in general held to amount to about forty-seven millions of every description of currency, varied, of course, by occasional expansions or contractions.

We do not wish to detract from the authenticity of these statements ; but it will be seen material, in our subsequent reasonings, to state that the currency of a country does not consist solely of its gold and silver in circulation, nor even of these and its bank notes. Every note of its buyers and sellers passing from hand to hand, is as much a part of the circulation as are the notes of a bank, or the usual coin. All property, even, exchanged against other property, is part of the circulation of the country for the time. In short, the currency of a country is its floating wealth ; that is to say, that part of it that is not fixed in houses, lands, or furniture, nor in any permanent manner, but is continually employed, or ready to be employed, in conducting the transactions of society. Whatever may be the amount afloat, is the circulation of the country. It does not consist of the mere amount of property coined. That, if not in use, is no more circulation than so much plate or furniture ; and if plate or furniture, houses, lands, or goods, are impeded, and circulating in the shape of obligations, whether of bankers (who may be termed public sponsors) or of the individual owners, they are for the time in a floating state, are represented in, and make part of, the circulation. The general amount of the circulation of the united kingdom, considered in this manner, that is to say, the coin, bank notes, and bills not in the hands of banks, must be at least equal to ONE HUNDRED MILLIONS ; and it is of importance to hold in view that such must be the amount, in estimating the effects of contractions or expansions of the currency.

The value of a currency does not depend upon its amount, but upon what it has to do ; upon the relative abundance or scarcity of itself, and the property opposed to and to be purchased by it. Thus, a piece of money or a bank note is no more depreciated in the hands of a rich man than in those of a poor man. It has exactly the same power of purchase in the one hand as in the other ; but it will be more easily parted with by the one than by the other : and the same is true of a rich or poor country. As the circulation of a country and medium of purchase becomes abundant, it is more easily parted with for property. Property is in this case said to rise, and money to fall ; and as circulation is restricted, or competition less, money is said to rise and property to fall. Neither expression is correct, but both are intelligible. What has happened is, that fixed and floating property, or the power of purchase and the property to be purchased, have become unequal. There is more money, or power of purchase, relatively, in the market than there is of property, or more property than money. This is the general position. But it must be added, that particular circumstances oftener rule the value of commodities, and, of course, of the circulation as opposed to them, than the general value of the circulation ; that is, the plenty or scarcity of the article, or the demand for it in the market. This so much more frequently rules the case than the value of the currency, that it may almost be assumed as the general position, that it is not the high state of currency, or even want of money, that causes property to fall, but the want of effectual demand for that particular species of property. Nor is it the abundance of money that depreciates money, as opposed to property ; but the excess of competition or effectual demand. An article that to-day is worth much, may to-morrow be unsaleable, and yet the state of the circulation remain unchanged ; and if a change in the circulation does affect prices (as it naturally must), the effect is small in proportion to the mass of the circulation—a million or two millions deducted from a hundred being evidently capable of making but a very slight impression.

Therefore, when we speak of abundance or scarcity of money, we should look at least to two things—not at the abundance of the circulation, more than at the difficulty of profitably applying it. The circulation of a country may be large and yet scarce, from a great and general activity ; and the circulation of a country may be restricted, or to a great extent lost, and yet too great for the occasions of the country. Fixed property may be high, and yet prosperity low, as the holders of money may be seeking a safe, if not a profitable investment ; and the fixed property of a country may be low, and yet its prosperity high, no one wishing to divert his funds from the purposes of trade. Generally, however, a period of prosperity sustains every species of property, because then credit is added largely to capital, both through the intervention of banks and the general confidence of the public ; and though this, perhaps, renders the circulation for the time very great, there is no excess, for there are purposes for it all.

These things furnish much of the instruction that is wanted at present, for they teach us, whether in prosperity or adversity, to look, not at the circulation, its extent and supposed depreciation, or the reverse, but at the country. Is the country active and productive ? Then it is happy, no matter whether the circulation is extensive or not. There is no crime, no misery ; for there is work to be done, and money to pay for it. The COUNTRY is the statesman's barometer ; its happiness or misery the points to be sought or avoided ; and though a fullness of happiness, even, is to be contemplated with anxiety, it is only with anxiety so to manage as that there may be no relapse.

It is the tendency of all labour, and of every industrious community, to accumulate wealth, and this accumulation has a tendency to render the portions of that wealth in the hands of large holders be considered of less moment, and be parted with freely. If the country generally is rich, like an individual in similar circumstances, it will spend freely ; and this, whether its circulation be in gold and silver, or in any other shape by which property can be represented.

This is one of those conditions of things that leads our state doctors to desire that the circulation should be kept down as much as possible ; and they suggest various plans. One of them, and the one considered the most legitimate, is to propose to keep the circulation in gold and silver. But by the evidence of the Governor of the Bank of England on a late occasion, it is proved, that, were this to be rigidly adhered to, transactions could not be managed. And the fact is obvious. Half the time of the community would be lost in reckoning its counters. Again, while bank currency of any amount can be carried easily, it may also be carried safely : it is a marked article : whereas, bullion would not only be difficult to carry, but the known possession of it would endanger life in all directions. But, lastly, the insisting upon coin for all purposes of circulation is not only unnecessary, but ridiculous, and, more than any thing, would defeat the object intended. It is unnecessary and ridiculous to insist that a country, before attempting to trade, should first divest itself of an immensity of every species of property desirable, to invest in white and yellow counters as a medium of exchange, while exchanging one article against another would effect the purpose ; or a bill of exchange, that is to say, a note from a purchaser that he had made an exchange, and received a certain value from a seller, and would account for that value to the seller, or any one sent by him ; and the possession of gold and silver for every purpose would defeat the object of sustaining the currency, from this, that bullion, like every other article, must descend in value as it increases in amount.

It will be seen, therefore, that we favour the system of a paper circulation for internal purposes ; and the reasons will be immediately stated. The only wonder is, that after the experience that has been had of this system, and of its magical power to do good, we should now, after reaping that good almost in excess, feel disposed to doubt its reality, merely because men who have not studied the subject, or cannot comprehend it, are unable to render a reason why we have prospered. There is perhaps this excuse, that the men who conduct banking establishments, and those of the first importance, are equally apt to discredit the subject with their opponents ; which renders necessary a little further explanation here.

Much of the confusion among practical men on the subject of circulation, arises from improper notions on the subject of EXCHANGE ; and this again arises from using terms to indicate particular states of a part of the circulation, and particular things to be done to correct that state, as if they were terms of general import, and indicating particulars of general and national importance. The most prominent of these terms is, the par of exchange. Nothing is heard of so frequently. The Governor of the Bank of England speaks of it as regulating the issues of the Bank ; and the enemies of that establishment represent these as regulating the value of the currency of the country, to its constant detriment.

It may surprise that we are obliged to say there is no such thing !—that “the par of exchange” is a term without a meaning. What is meant is, that occasionally dealers in bullion see it their interest to make transfers of that article, and then the banks are made to furnish it ; because, while coin never varies in price as coin, it is liable, as a piece of bullion, to fluctuate like any other article. Coin is therefore often not only cheaper than any other bullion, but infinitely more convenient for merchandise, being already assayed and weighed. The banks, in consequence, often furnish the material for this branch of trade, almost at their own charge ; it forms a great deduction from their profits, because it is often replaced at a great sacrifice, and the country, instead of thanking them for it, often feels inclined to blame them, as inflicting a general loss. Did it fall on the country to replace this circulation, the accusation would be just ; but as the banks themselves furnish it, the COUNTRY neither has an interest in this action and reaction, nor, if it had, could it prevent it. It is a fluctuation, not in the CURRENCY, but in the price of articles that happen to make part of it—that is, gold and silver. The mode which the bankers in general adopt to protect themselves, is, to avoid issuing their notes freely, so as they may not readily be returned upon them for gold. But it appears, from the recent evidence of the Governor of the Bank of England, that they also sometimes themselves send bullion abroad. And this is the true plan, for then they have the profit upon their own article. But they seem not exactly to see what they do ; for they term it “correcting the par of exchange,” and do it secretly, as if correcting an improper state of the circulation originating with them, whereas it is either liquidating an actual balance of trade against the country, with which they can have no concern, or, as may be equally the case, supplying a particular article of trade, at that particular moment in demand. The actual circumstances of trade may, and doubtless often do, occasion an efflux or influx of gold and silver : it is unavoidable. But the constant gnawing that is kept up on the currency, and which often compels bankers to tighten their circulation, is to be traced to the single circumstance, that part of our currency is an article of merchandise, the dealers in which are constantly on the alert.

We shall see all this illustrated, by a very short statement of the actual Principles of Exchange, which, however, must be detained till our next Number.

CHURCH ESTABLISHMENTS.

WHILE the hostility to the Episcopal Church is producing bloodshed in Ireland, it is also assuming a formidable aspect in England. The dissenters, a numerous and powerful body (though a majority of them were originally Presbyterians, and, therefore, supporters of a church establishment), are everywhere taking up the arms of argument and agitation against this great clerical corporation. The following is part of an address to them, which has been printed :—“Let us awake to a sense of that duty which devolves on us as men and Christians ; let us wipe away that reproach which rests upon us in a compromising support of the established hierarchy ; let us vindicate the cause of true religion and justice, which are injured and violated by its existence. We neutralize our dissent, by a quiet and compromising payment of all ecclesiastical demands. The example of the Quakers is that which we call upon you to imitate. If the whole body of dissenters had imitated this example from the first, we do not hesitate to say that long ere this the question would have been settled for ever. It is not too late ! Our numbers are great, our influence, from the senate to the meanest hovel in the land, vast and increasing ; we have only to be united and firm, to be happy and free. If the priests will have our money, let them have it as our blood. If they will have our support, let them have it at the expense of every law of hospitality and good citizenship, by the seizure of our property, and its public sale ; let them seize, but who will buy ?”

Mr Cresset Pelham announced, on the 16th October, at the Newcastle reform festival, that a measure for the reform of the church—a moderate, but real and efficient measure—is contemplated by the Ministers.

The Standard newspaper has since given an affirmation of this report, adding, that the bill has been already drawn up by the Rev. Sydney Smith, long a contributor of anti-church articles to the Edinburgh Review, and the intimate friend of several persons in the Cabinet.

In Scotland, even, where the established Presbyterian church (based originally upon a popular system) has hitherto been in good credit, both at home and in other countries, the spirit of the times has also induced a demand of church reform. A number of the dissenters, or rather seceders (for, originally, they only professed to withdraw from the church on account of abuses, not to dissent from its original doctrines or regulations), have formed a union, under the title of the Voluntary Church Association, which held its first meeting on the 13th of September, and, some time during last month, published a manifesto of its sentiments. A similar association has since been formed at Glasgow; and on the first Tuesday of November, it is the intention of a number of the dissenting clergymen in Fife to form another, and to petition Parliament against church establishments. The fundamental rules of the Edinburgh society are, "That a compulsory support of religious institutions is inconsistent with the nature of religion, the spirit of the gospel, the express appointments of Jesus Christ, and the civil rights of men: That, in every case where the individual disapproves of the system supported, or of the principles of its support, it is an unwarrantable attack upon the right of property, and a direct invasion of the rights of conscience: That it keeps in a state of unnatural separation those who ought to be united—and in a state of unnatural union, those who ought to be separate: That its tendency, as exhibited in its effects, is to secularize religion, promote hypocrisy, perpetuate error, produce infidelity, destroy the unity and purity of the church, and disturb the peace and order of civil society: That by its direct and indirect influence, it is among the principal causes of the low state of Christianity in those countries where it is professed, and of the slowness of its progress throughout the world; and that, while thus unreasonable, impolitic, unjust, and mischievous, it has not even the plea of necessity—Christianity having within itself, in the native influence of its doctrines on the minds of those who believe them, every thing which is requisite for its efficient support and indefinite extension."

No member of the church has as yet deigned to take that notice of the association which it is prepared to hail as a mark of its power. (See the manifesto above mentioned, entitled "Substance of a Speech delivered at a Meeting of Evangelical Dissenters.") But the counter-arguments of that body we believe to be nearly as follow:—"That the Church of Scotland, except in the city of Edinburgh, is not altogether supported by compulsory means, but chiefly by foundations, and no part of its support can be called compulsory upon the nation, except what it derives in small additional stipends from the state—a support exclusively applied in parishes where, in all probability, a clergyman could not otherwise be maintained: That, in a large majority of the parishes, the population is not sufficiently dense to afford a hope that ministers of the gospel could be supported except by the tithes and by the state: That it is surely better that the tithes (a kind of tithe, but paid by the landlords) should be applied to the support of religion, than given up for any other purpose—more especially as the money is raised without the least distress or trouble of any kind, and is not used—not a penny of it—by any but acting clergymen: That an established church is necessary for keeping up 'standards' of faith, and that even the seceders only exist with a reference to the standards kept up by the Church of Scotland: Lastly, that the church itself is every year becoming purer and more popular, through the force of public opinion from without—three-fourths of the ministers now appointed being of the evangelical kind, and many of them nominated by their flocks—whereas, not more than ten years ago, hardly a third were evangelical, and the flock was never consulted." It is, indeed, remarkable, say the established clergy, that so long as the majority of our body were anti-popular, the seceders never said a word against establishments in the abstract, and that they only have begun to do so when the clergy are more generally of a popular character, and more expressly resembling and rivalling themselves.

So much we think it necessary to give, as a mere history of what has lately taken place on the subject of church reform, and as a view of the sentiments of both parties. Whether it will be possible to raise a popular fervour against the church establishment of Scotland, remains to be seen: one thing is certain; no fervour is as yet in existence among the congregations of the establishment. The church enjoys much affection and reverence among the Scottish people in general, grounded at once on national reminiscences and esteem for its unassuming and practically useful character. The voluntary associations must therefore make up their minds to very great exertions, if they hope to succeed in their object. There are two points in the present system of the church—neither of them essential to its fundamental constitution—which will no doubt afford them much ground of hope; and these the church would do well to put out of the way as soon as possible. We mean patronage (an institution disgraceful for its Jacobite origin, and, however nominally existing, still repugnant both to the feelings and good sense of the people), and the condition of the metropolitan establishment. In Edinburgh, it is well known, eighteen ministers are supported in only thirteen churches, by a very heavy compulsory tax upon the inhabitants, while the money further paid for the seat-rents is absorbed by the city corporation, and applied, at their pleasure, to the building of new and the repairing of old churches. Bonaparte used to say that Paris was France, and it is to be expected that many will look upon Edinburgh as Scotland, or at least that the population of the capital, acting under their own excited views, will exercise a great influence in the contest which is about to take place. Those who are really friendly to the church would certainly consult their own interest in an eminent degree, if they were to set themselves seriously to the removal of this important grievance.

By accounts just received from Canada, it appears that an union is about to take place between the United Secession Church and the members of the Church of Scotland in that colony. We may hence anticipate the organization of a Presbyterian Church in that part of the empire, totally independent of any of the church courts of Scotland, or of the state.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

THE history of France during the past month has been signalled by the appointment of a new Ministry. The limited monarchy which took its rise from the revolution of 1830, has disappointed the hopes of many of those who helped to create it, by not acting in what they deemed a sufficiently liberal way. The King, Louis Philip, instead of making further innovations, or encouraging popular movements in other countries for the support of his own government, has rather shown a desire to restrain, as much as possible, the popular feelings in his own country, and, by a perfect neutrality, to make himself agreeable to the despotic powers of Europe. The difficulties which beset the King in this course of policy, have been fully shown during the last few months, by his being unable to obtain a Ministry who would second him in his views. At length, on the 13th of October, the Moniteur, or official newspaper of the French government, contained the list of a new Cabinet, composed as follows:—

The Duc de BROGLIE—Minister of Foreign Affairs.

M. HUMAIN—Minister of Finance.

M. THIERS—Minister of Interior.

M. GUIZOT—Minister of Public Instruction.

M. BARTHE—Keeper of Seals, &c.

M. de RIGNY remains Minister of Marine, and

M. d'ARGANT—Minister of Commerce.

This Ministry is entirely of a moderate, or what is called in France a Doctrinaire cast. Its members are men not illiberal, but who with their liberality are anxious to reconcile certain principles of an opposite character. It is anticipated that the Ministers will not be able to conduct the public business for any length of time, as they can have no chance of securing a majority in the Chamber of Deputies, which is called for the 19th of November. The King, however, must be resolved that they shall try their fortune in that quarter, as he has already taken measures to secure a majority for them in the Upper Chamber, by creating sixty-one new Peers. In the meantime, they are said to be highly unpopular with the press, as well as among the bulk of the people.

Since its accession, the Doctrinaire Ministry has made an attempt to gain some favour. Marshal Soult was no sooner in office than he addressed a circular to the public functionaries, stating his resolution to act vigorously against the friends of the exiled family, and "to press to a solution every undecided European question." The latter expression refers to the quarrel between Holland and Belgium, to which article we must refer the reader for further explanation.

Another circumstance, however, has added to the unpopularity of the government. M. Berryer, a partisan of the exiled family, who was arrested on suspicion of treason in June last, was brought to trial on the 16th and 17th ult. It is believed that M. Berryer was in reality guilty of no crime, unless he can be said to have offended the laws by visiting the Duchess de Berri, in order to induce her to retire from France. However, the government is alleged to have resorted to the basest means in order to make him out guilty. The counsel for the crown was so sensible of this as to abandon the case, and M. Berryer was acquitted.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

WHEN it became obvious, at the end of the year 1830, that Belgium could not exist under the same monarchy with Holland, the five principal powers of Europe (Great Britain, France, Prussia, Austria, and Russia), named a Conference to sit at London, and arrange the means of separating the two countries. This Conference has been able to cause a suspension of actual hostilities between the Dutch and Belgians, and for the latter has appointed a King —to wit, Prince Leopold of Saxe Coburg. But it has been quite unable to make Holland consent to certain terms of separation, which have been agreed to by Belgium. The former allege that they would be much injured, commercially, by the regulations which the Conference seeks to impose; and, having command of the citadel of Antwerp, and a large and well prepared army, they seem determined to resist to the last.

If the Five Powers which form the Conference were quite unanimous upon this subject, they could soon compel the King of Holland to submit to any terms they please. But it has been suspected that the three despotic powers have no sincere wish to force the King of Holland into terms. He governs his country in much the same manner as they manage theirs, and Holland forms an excellent frontier bulwark for them, against the liberalised states of the west. It is, therefore, by all means their interest to preserve Holland from injury.

At the concluding meeting of his States-General on the 13th, the King of Holland expressed his firm resolution to hold out against every attempt that might be made to force him into the terms of the Conference. It is also very well known that his people, feeling their commercial interests deeply concerned, are likely to back their sovereign in any, even the most desperate attempts at resistance. In the meantime, the King of the French has assembled an army of 50,000, to be ready to protect Belgium and reduce Holland, while a British fleet is prepared to blockade the river Scheldt. This fleet, which is to be rendezvoused on the 5th of November, consists of the following vessels:—The Talavera, 74; Wellesley, 74; Revenge, 76; Spartiate, 76; Donegal, 74; Vernon, 50; Southampton, 50; Stag, 46; Castor, 36; Conway, 28; Volage, 28; Nimrod, 18; Childers, 18; Rover, 18; Scout, 18; Satellite, 18; Larne, 18; Snake, 16; and the Rhadamanthus and Dee, steam-vessels.

PORTUGAL.

THIS country, as elsewhere stated, is in the process of being contested by two brothers. Miguel, the younger of the two, usurped the throne in a treacherous manner some years ago; but, notwithstanding this circumstance, and though said to be a ferocious despot, he seems to have ingratiated himself considerably with his people, who, perhaps, are in general too ignorant to desire free institutions. During the course of the past summer, Pedro landed at Oporto with a powerful force, composed of Portuguese, French, and British troops; his navy, at the same time, rides the neighbouring seas under a British commander, named Sartorius. It was expected that the army of Don Miguel, and his subjects in general, would have immediately joined Don Pedro, in lesser or greater numbers; but this hope has been disappointed. Instead of making any attack upon his brother's forces, he has only been able to defend himself, as yet, within the walls of Oporto. It should be mentioned, that Don Pedro does not claim the crown for himself, but for his daughter Maria, he professing to be only her regent.

On Saturday the 29th September, the troops of Don Miguel made an attack upon Oporto. In the morning they forced their way into the town, and were met in the streets by the troops of Don Pedro, who made a very brave resistance, and ultimately forced the assailants to retire. In this conflict both parties fought with equal pertinacity and determination, the assailants losing about fifteen hundred, or, as some accounts state, two thousand men; while Pedro's troops lost only between three and four hundred. It may be deplored by the friends of liberal principles; but the circumstances of this attack fully prove that Don Miguel does not want the affections of his army, while the fact that Don Pedro is a defendant, and not an assailant, almost amounts to a defeat. The loss on Don Pedro's side fell chiefly on his French and English troops, who seem to have taken the lead in the defence. Among the latter, Colonel Burrell, Lieutenant Luper, and Ensign Burton, were killed; Count St Leger, Major Shaw, Captain Shillock, and Colonel Hodges, were wounded. Two British vessels, the Orestes and the Childers, which drew near the town for the protection of British lives and property, were damaged (especially the former) by the balls of Don Miguel, and one man killed, in consequence of Don Pedro's troops placing themselves near those vessels, which they, perhaps, expected to be a protection to them.

On the 14th October, another determined attack was made by the troops of Don Miguel on the fortifications of Oporto. After a long and severe contest, the assailants were repulsed with a loss of 1200 men. On the same day a naval action took place, in which the ships of Don Pedro received considerable damage, without any decisive result.

TURKEY.

THE Ottoman empire, after an existence of four centuries in Europe, is said to be threatened with immediate dissolution. Mohammed Ali, the enlightened Pacha of Egypt, after having well matured his plans, and prepared an army for accomplishing them, commenced an expedition early in the present year against Acre, which, after a tedious siege, was obliged to surrender. In July, his commander Ibrahim, NOVEMBER, 1832.

him, having gained a victory over the army of the Sultan, advanced upon Aleppo, which he took on the 15th; and on the 30th he encountered, and again overthrew the Turkish army, 36,000 strong, between Antioch and Scanderoon. On this occasion he killed and captured 13,000 men. By the last accounts, he was advancing rapidly to Constantinople; the people were every where joining him in his progress; and, though the Sultan had ordered another army to be collected in order to oppose him, it was expected that a few days would decide the fate of the empire.

JAMAICA.

JAMAICA papers up to the 31st August contain an account of an attack upon a Baptist minister, and the friends in whose house he dwelt, at Savanna-la-mar, on the 8th of August. A Baptist missionary, of the name of Kingdon, came to the town since the martial law had ceased. Several of the inhabitants to whom he applied refused to rent him a house; but at length he was received by Messrs A. and J. Deleon, who allowed him to reside in the upper part of their house, notwithstanding the remonstrances of many of their neighbours. He began to preach in a house in the vicinity, and the negroes from the estates attended him at night. The inhabitants, it appears, were alarmed at this attempt to instruct their slaves, and a deputation waited on Mr Kingdon, at his lodgings, and earnestly requested him to leave the town. He refused to do so, and, fearing an attack, his friends, the Deleons, and several free persons and slaves, armed themselves to protect him. Some of the inhabitants called at the house to request Mr Kingdon to go away in a vessel then in the harbour, which was to sail next morning. Some boiling water was thrown upon these people, and they were fired upon from the house. A serious riot ensued, and the magistrates had much difficulty in preventing the mob, then very numerous, from tearing Kingdon and the Deleons to pieces. The rioters scaled the house, gutted it from top to bottom, and afterwards set it on fire, to the great peril of the whole town. The fire was, however, put out by the exertions of the custos and some others. On the following night the mob pulled down two or three other houses belonging to persons of the Baptist persuasion; and it is said that the leaders of the riot were so disguised that it was impossible to recognise them. Seven or eight persons have been wounded in the affray. The missionary and his protectors are in custody, and will be brought to trial. The Jamaica papers throw the whole blame of the riot upon Mr Kingdon and his friends.

ENGLAND.

THE REVENUE.

The accounts of the revenue for the quarter ending October 10, show a sum total of L.12,093,586, being an increase upon the amount of the corresponding quarter last year, of L.696,847, notwithstanding the repeal of the candle-tax, which used to bring L.480,000 annually into the Exchequer.

The amount of taxes collected during the year ending October 10, is L.43,408,812, being a decrease of L.327,576 from the amount collected in the previous year, and about three millions less than what was obtained in 1830.

Nevertheless, as taxes to the amount of nearly five millions and a half have been repealed since 1830, there is in reality an increase of about two millions and a half since that period. The existing taxes are thus shown to have become more productive than formerly; which must arise, either from the diminution of the general burden, or from the naturally advancing prosperity of the country.

An expedition is arranged to sail in quest of Captain Ross and his crew, who left this country three years ago on a voyage of discovery to the arctic regions. The government gives L.2000; the Hudson's Bay Company furnishes supplies and canoes free of charge; and the remaining expense (L.3000) is to be forthcoming from other quarters.

Great efforts are made in London for a regulation enforcing the better observance of the Sabbath. According to the present system, several important classes of the trading community have hardly any space of time for either relaxation or religious ordinances.

Tuesday, October 2, a whale fifty feet long was caught on the beach of Coquet Island.

October 10, died Thomas Hardy, shoemaker, aged 82. This person, who was a Scotchman by birth, and a zealous Presbyterian in religion, originated the London Corresponding Society, which gave such alarm to the government at the time of the French revolution. He was tried, about the same time, with eleven other persons, for high treason, and, after a trial of nine days, was acquitted. He had latterly lived upon the bounty of a few persons, among whom Sir Francis Burdett was the chief contributor to his comfort. Hardy was buried on the 18th, when a vast assemblage attended the funeral, and Mr Thelwall, the last surviving person of all those tried along with him, made an oration over his grave. He has left a memoir, which is about to be published.

On Thursday, October 11, Lord Durham returned to London from his mission to Russia. The objects of his visit to St Petersburg are not known, but are supposed to have had reference to Belgium and Poland.

On the 13th October, the inhabitants of South Molton presented an elegant silver claret jug to Lord Ebrington (raised by subscription not exceeding a shilling), for his services in favour of reform, and particularly his important motion in the House of Commons.

By the balance-sheet of the Manchester and Liverpool railway, from the 1st of July to the 31st of December, it appears that the undertaking is going on with increasing prosperity.

The price of bread has experienced a decline both in Britain and France, in consequence of the abundance of the harvest. In France, the four pound loaf of fine bread is now sold at 7d.

A rail-road is proposed from London to Dover.

From an estimate laid before Parliament in 1827, it appears that in Great Britain alone there are nearly three millions and a half acres of waste land, fit for cultivation; in Ireland nearly five millions; altogether in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, fifteen millions of acres of land, stated to be as good, on the average, as any now in cultivation.

The whole population of London, by the last returns, is 1,474,069. The mortality amounts to about 4½ in every thousand, or somewhat less than one-half per cent., a rate which is believed to be nearly the lowest which has prevailed in any large town that has been really visited by the cholera.—Medical Gazette.

The hop duty in Kent is now estimated to produce L.125,000 or L.130,000, although a fortnight back it was calculated at L.155,000. The hops are exceedingly partial in different districts of the country.

Prince Talleyrand.—This distinguished and aged diplomatist, having seen the new French Ministry organized, has returned from Paris to London, and resumed his office as ambassador from the court of Louis Philip to this country.

The trial of the Bristol magistrates commenced on Thursday, the 25th ult., at Westminster Hall, and will probably continue for some days.

The following is the general cholera report to the 19th ult., as issued by the Central Board established in the metropolis:—

	Cases.	Deaths.		Cases.	Deaths.
Oct. 1.	730	284	Oct. 11.	314	161
— 2.	399	150	— 12.	245	140
— 3.	395	168	— 13.	245	98

The cholera has entirely ceased its ravages in Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and other towns in that extensive and populous district. It has been steadily decreasing since the 19th, in every other quarter.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Several large vessels have recently left the London and St Katharine's Dock with respectable tradesmen and small capitalists, and their families, for Van Dieman's Land and New South Wales. Three ships sailed last week for these colonies, with many hundred passengers of both sexes, whose respectability is guaranteed by the high price of the passage-money, from L.15 to L.30 each person. The brig Ellen, bound to Sydney, has left the river, with about 120 passengers, amongst whom were several agriculturists and their families.

Swan River.—The latest accounts from Swan River give rather a melancholy picture of the situation of the colonists, many of whom would be compelled to abandon the colony, and thus yield up the outlay they had made.

Quebec papers have been received to the 13th of September, and Montreal to the 15th. The following is an extract from the Quebec paper of the 13th:—"The total number of emigrants arrived from the opening of the navigation this year to the present date, 49,569; to the corresponding period of last year, 46,070; difference in favour of 1832, 3499."

The crops in Upper Canada are described as abundant, and of good quality. In the Lower Province, particularly in the neighbourhood of Quebec, the wheat has sustained much injury, from a small worm of an orange or reddish-yellow colour, which devours the grain, leaving nothing but the chaff and its own decayed substance.

Deplorable Condition of St Domingo.—We are informed by a gentleman lately returned from St Domingo, that that once beautiful colony is reduced to a state which beggars description; the people have no confidence in their rulers, and those in authority are surrounded in their hovels by armed men, on whom they cannot rely. Commerce is at its lowest ebb; as for money, there is none.—Sun.

Annual Cost of a Private Soldier.—The daily pay of a foot soldier is one shilling, with a penny for beer; the daily pay of a life-guardsmen is 1s. 11d., and the annual cost is L.74, 4s. 11d. per man, besides horse and allowances, or L.1, 8s. 6d. per week; dragoons, L.56, 11s. 5d. per annum, or L.1, 1s. 9d. per week; foot guards, L.34, 6s., or 13s. 2d. per week; infantry, L.31 per annum, or 11s. 10d. per week. A regiment of horse soldiers of about 360, officers and men, costs about L.25,000 per annum. The wages of seamen in the royal navy are L.2, 12s. per month, or 13s. per week; and L.1, 12s., or 8s. per week more, are allowed for their provisions.

Thirty millions of bushels of barley are annually converted into malt by the breweries of Great Britain; and upwards of eight millions of barrels of beer (of which more than four-fifths are strong) are brewed annually. This enormous consumption attests the fondness of the people for the beverage of their forefathers.—Mirror.

Madame Letitia Bonaparte's Will.—Among the events of the day, the will of Madame Letitia Bonaparte occupies a conspicuous place. Nearly 79,000,000f. will now be added to the fortune of the eldest of the Bonapartes, and will, consequently, render him a very important personage. Madame Mere, who was enriched by the gifts of her son, and still more by her own economy and the prudent management of her fortune, never seriously assumed the elevated part which unexpected events assigned to her. When she has been urged to increase her household establishment, I have frequently heard her say, "I must be economical; one day or other all these kings will be coming to ask me for a dinner, and I must manage so as to have something to give them."

A correspondent of the Times estimates the forces of Don Pedro at 21,000, of which 17,500 bear arms; the rest are Galegos, employed in the works and batteries. The entire number of French and English does not exceed 500.

A commercial association at Moscow is about to establish a communication, by waggons for merchandise, and carriages for travellers, between that city and the frontiers of China. These waggons and carriages, which are expected to start on their first journey early in the spring of 1833, will traverse the governments of Tamboff, Casan, Peren, Tobolsk, Irkutsk, and Takutz, in Siberia, to Kiachta, on the frontiers of China.

Accounts from Leghorn state that the ex-Dey of Algiers has determined to reside in the environs of Naples, and sent his agent Busnach to hire a villa. This arrangement, however, it is added, will not stop his schemes for regaining his former position in the regency of Algiers.

England has recently been engaged in a war of four-and-twenty hours' duration. The Regency of Tripoli was some 200,000 piastres in debt to Great Britain, which the Bey wished to avoid paying. At last, after sundry excuses and delays, the English consul took down his flag, went on board a vessel, and declared war against his Beyship. Next day 170,000 of the piastres were paid, and a little delay was granted for the payment of the remainder, and so ended the Tripolitan war.

The Nile's Weekly Register, published in Baltimore, says, there are 150 editors of newspapers, &c., holding office under General Jackson in the United States.

The Madrid Gazette publishes a statement on the subject of highway robberies in Spain, from which it appears that from the 1st of Jan. 1830 to the 1st of April 1832, the diligence has been robbed 22 times out of a total of 3780 journeys. No passenger was either killed or wounded.

A Russian has published "A View of all the Known Languages, and their Dialects." In this book we find in all 937 Asiatic, 587 European, 226 African, and 1264 American languages and dialects enumerated and classified. The Bible is translated into 139 languages.—Christian Remembrancer.

Preservation of Dead Bodies.—A highly important discovery has recently been made by Messrs Capron and Boniface, chemists at Chaillot. By a process, which they keep secret, and to which they have given the name of "Mommification," they have succeeded, after passing a number of years in experiments, in so modifying and perfecting the known processes of preserving bodies as to reduce them to mummies, leaving all the forms unaltered. All the elements of disorganization which show themselves in the human body so soon after death are completely destroyed, and not only the external body, but all the viscera, the lungs, the heart, the liver, and even the brain, are perfectly preserved; the features also remain so perfectly uninjured, that correct portraits may be taken at any length of time after death; and as the body is not enveloped in bandages as in the Egyptian method, the natural forms are perfectly preserved. The operation requires but a very few days, after which the dead bodies may be preserved in a room or a vault, or interred in the ordinary way, without being accessible to worms. They may also be exposed to all the variations of the air, either in a standing or sitting position, without undergoing any alteration. The inventors do not intend to make their process public, but it may be adopted even by those who reside at a considerable distance from Paris, as a body placed in a leaden coffin or bathing tub, and completely surrounded by ice, may be kept uninjured for 20 days, and the operation may still be performed. At the last meeting of the Academie des Sciences, a human body, and also two hearts, preserved in this manner, were exhibited, and the process appeared perfect; the discoloured state of the skin, occasioned by the scar of an old wound, was even fully perceptible; and although these preparations had been completed several weeks, not the slightest approach to change of any kind was observable.—French Paper.

IRELAND.

The government is at present endeavouring to enforce a law, which was lately made, for compelling payment of tithes in Ireland. By this law, the arrears of tithes are enjoined to be paid to the agents of the government itself, which has, in expectation of those proceeds, already paid the clergy. The Irish, however, have resolved against making this payment in any shape whatsoever, and, accordingly, the resistance to the government has been as strenuous as ever it was against the clergy. In general, the resistance is passive: the people know that the mere fact of not paying subjects them to no hazard, as the law can only seize their goods in default; they, therefore, feel safe in not paying, for, through the spirit of the public at large, the law can make nothing of the goods after it has seized them. But, in some places, the antipathy to persons concerned in enforcing tithes has been of so fierce a character, as to proceed to active resistance, or something approaching to it. On the 8th of August, Captain Burke, C. C., was posting tithe notices near Waterford, with an escort of thirty of the armed police of the county, when, in the neighbourhood of Mooncoin, the populace pressed upon him in so threatening a manner (as the story is told, in the meantime, by his friends), that he directed his men to fire, and killed twelve persons, besides wounding upwards of twenty.

Several persons were tried at Tralee on the 18th for conspiring to oppose the payment of tithes. After a trial which lasted till the succeeding evening, and in which Mr O'Connell exerted all his eloquence and legal skill in behalf of the accused, two persons (J. O'Connor and S. McCarthy) were convicted, and sentenced to be imprisoned one month, and fined ten pounds each. G. O'Connor was also sentenced to a fortnight's imprisonment and a fine of ten pounds.

Mr Maurice O'Connell, son of the great agitator, and a member of Parliament, has eloped with a young lady of fortune—a Miss Scott—and it is said that her fortune chiefly consists in lay tithes.

SCOTLAND.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

THE affairs of the late Sir Walter Scott have naturally attracted a great deal of public attention during the past month, and many ill-founded inferences have been put into circulation respecting them. It is certainly to be much lamented, that the latter days of this great man were embittered, if not his dissolution hastened, by pecuniary embarrassments, into which he was drawn, not by any imprudence on his own part, but through the misfortunes of others. It is, however, so far consolatory, that little debt remained due at the period of his decease, and that that little must soon be discharged. The illustrious deceased, in his will, dated February 4, 1831, and which was probably drawn up by himself, states that the half of the debts enumerated in his trust-deed of February 1826, were then paid. The sum, we believe, thus disbursed, was about £54,000. In addition to this sum, £22,000, fallen in from insurance offices, and about £10,000, realised out of the profits of the new edition of his novels, were due to the trust at his decease; and thus, it is said, there remained only about £21,000 of debt contracted before 1826, exclusive of interest. If we add to this the debts contracted since the trust was executed, arising partly from the expenses of his continental journey, death-bed, &c., the whole amount of his engagements do not exceed £30,000.

In his will, Sir Walter first directs his executors (his two sons and Mr Lockhart) to sell his moveable property at Abbotsford (given back in 1830 by his creditors, as a present) to his eldest son, at £5,000, of which sum, £2,000 to be given to Mr Charles Scott, as much to Miss Anne Scott, and the remaining thousand to Mrs Lockhart, in order to make up her portion (with a like sum given at her marriage) to the same amount as the rest of the junior branches of his family. He then directs that the future profits of the work entitled "Tales of a Grandfather," and certain articles inserted in the Annals, all of which were lately written for his own immediate comfort and subsistence, be applied to discharge his debts incurred since the execution of the trust, the surplus, if any, to go to the trust. He next enumerates the means which he principally depends on for the payment of all his other debts. First, the new edition of his novels, or rather his share in the profits of that edition; then the similar edition, which was contemplated, of his poems. In the event of these being sufficient to discharge the debts under the trust, the further profits to go towards the redemption of an heritable bond of £10,000, contracted upon the estate of Abbotsford for the support of Archibald Constable and Company; the still further profits, if any, to be divided among his family. "And if it be thought necessary," the document thus proceeds, "that any biographical sketch of the author himself be drawn up, to be attached to the said collection, I do request and entreat my affectionate son-in-law, the said John Gibson Lockhart, who has, during all his connection with me, shown me the duty and kindness of a son, to draw up such sketch, using in that matter such letters, correspondence, and diaries, as shall be found in my repositories; and I also request the said John Gibson Lockhart to carry on and conclude the publication of my poetical works as above mentioned, if I shall leave them incomplete, for behoof of the said trust, and also, for the same purpose, to correct and cut down the Life of Bonaparte to a less size, which may be done with a prospect of considerable advantage, or to suggest some competent person to do so; and in general I name the said John Gibson Lockhart my literary executor, assigning my son the said Charles Scott as his assistant, to spare his time as much as possible;"—a recompence, he adds, being rendered to them, either by the trust, or by the assignees under this deed.

From the success which has hitherto attended the new edition of his novels, there is not the least reason to doubt that twenty further volumes, to which, at the very least, his whole works must extend, together with the biographical sketch alluded to, the interest of which must be very great, will far more than clear off the remaining encumbrances, leaving his estate clear in the possession of his representative, with the prospect of considerable wealth to the junior branches of the family. So certain does this prospect appear, that his executors have already been enabled, by a wealthy individual connected with the publication, to make offer to the trust creditors of money to the amount of all their remaining claims, without interest; which it is expected will be taken without hesitation, and a discharge granted. It is further hoped that an extension of the copyright will be obtained from Parliament; in which event, as cheaper editions will hereafter be published, with probably equal success, the children of this illustrious person must ultimately obtain not only comfort and independence, but also a considerable degree of opulence.

COBBETT'S VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

OCTOBER 9, Mr Cobbett commenced a course of lectures in the Adelphi Theatre, Edinburgh. Public curiosity being much excited on the occasion, he obtained a very full audience, composed of all classes of persons, and all orders of political thinkers. Cobbett, during the long course of his political life, has been in the constant habit of railing at the Scottish people, whom he seems to have always considered as intruders wherever they appeared in England. He was, therefore, perhaps, in some fear respecting his reception in the Scottish capital. In this feeling, if he entertained it, he was fully as much mistaken as was Dennis the poet, when he expressed a dread to walk on the beach near Dover, lest a vessel which he saw in the Channel might prove to be a French war-ship, dispatched to capture him, for his satires upon the Grand Monarque. The truth is, Cobbett's railing upon Scotland is altogether of an obsolete character, and refers to things upon which the present generation has no sore feeling whatsoever. His Edinburgh audience, therefore, received him in what may generally be described as a very respectful and cordial manner; a respect intended solely for his acknowledged powers as a political writer, and not certainly for his consistency as a patriot. Cobbett's first lecture referred to a variety of what are called political grievances, all of which he illustrated with much felicity and great force of language, for the purpose of showing the necessity of exacting pledges from candidates under the reform bill, as to certain future reforms in our foreign and domestic polity. The whole affair was a most surprising exhibition of what may be called natural rhetoric. From the beginning to the end, the language was easy, flowing, and intelligible; the manner most dramatic; the sarcasm powerful and unsparring; the irony beyond any thing we could have previously conceived of that species of satire. We were particularly struck with the way in which he attempted to prove the army to be a mere police force, designed to compel the payment of unjust taxes and bridle a misgoverned people, as also with some of his illustrations of church abuses. Cobbett appears to us as a perfect model of English plebeian feeling on political subjects. Though gifted with immense natural powers of mind, he is still inspired with all the prejudices of a low and uneducated class of people—and hence his innumerable errors and inconsistencies; for, of course, without much knowledge, there can be neither correctness nor consistency of thinking.

On the succeeding evenings, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, Cobbett continued his demonstrations on church and state abuses, and on the paper currency; on Saturday, he addressed the working classes gratuitously in the Waterloo Room. A complimentary address, and a vote of thanks, were presented to him on this occasion.

This singular orator proceeded from Edinburgh to Dunfermline, Falkirk, Glasgow, and Greenock, at all which places he repeated his lectures to large assemblages of people. He has since expressed, through the medium of the Morning Chronicle and his own Register, his high opinion of the Scottish people, and his gratitude for the attention which they paid to him; but, at the same time, his regret at finding that the Scottish people are not supported by the produce of their own country, a result which he ascribes to the largeness of the estates, and the tyrannical manner in which the farm-servants are treated by their masters. This is a fallacy highly characteristic of Cobbett. What does it matter where the produce of Scotland is eaten? If the wheat is sent into England, it can only be because the people prefer English money to wheat, being able, we suppose, to buy many other luxuries with the money which they could not get so readily with the wheat. If there was a law, such as Cobbett would wish, to compel the produce of every farm to be eaten on that farm, or even the produce of every county to be eaten within that county—nay, we will say, the produce of every kingdom to be eaten within that kingdom—it would tend far to dissolve those social arrangements by which the country is rendered at present so much superior to what it was in barbarous times.

PREFERMENTS.

Sept. 27. The Rev. Dr Fleming of Flisk was inducted into the parish of Clackmannan.

The Rev. James McCulloch was inducted into the parish of Kelso, as successor to the late Rev. Dr. Dundie.

Oct. 2. Took place a partial election of magistrates for Edinburgh. The Lord Provost Learmonth, as usual, was elected for the second year. The following new bailies were appointed:—W. Child, R. Ritchie, J. Patterson, and A. Wright, Esqrs.

3. The Rev. David Sturrock was called to be minister of the congregation of Original Seceders at Midholm.

The Rev. Mungo Campbell has been appointed assistant and successor to the Rev. John Paton, minister of Lasswade.

Mr Thomas Hamilton Miller has been nominated to succeed Sir Walter Scott as sheriff-depute of Selkirkshire.

9. The Rev. John Robson was ordained to the charge of the United Associate Congregation at Lasswade.

12. The Rev. John Hunter, late of Swinton, was inducted into the charge of the Tron Church, Edinburgh.

The Rev. R. Crawford has been appointed assistant and successor to the Rev. Dr. Anthony Dow, of Irongray.

CRIMES.

On Thursday, Sept. 27, George Matheson, shoemaker, was found guilty, by the Circuit Court at Aberdeen, of murdering David Blaikie, Wright, on the 14th of August last, in a dispute about an account; the fatal blow had been inflicted in the abdomen by a knife. Matheson was sentenced to be executed on the 26th of October, and his body buried, according to the new regulations by act of Parliament, within the precincts of the jail; but his sentence has since been commuted to transportation for life.

On Thursday, October 4, John Chisholm was found guilty, by the Circuit Court at Perth, of the murder of his wife, and sentenced to be executed. Next day, Duncan and Janet Stewart were found guilty of murdering David Stewart, tinker, by stabbing him with a knife near Little Dunkeld, on the 17th May last. Both were sentenced to be executed on the 31st of October.

A horrid murder was committed on the 4th, in the neighbourhood of Dunkeld, by John Stewart, a woodranger, who slew his wife by the blows of an axe on the head. Having fled, he was pursued and seized, and is now in prison.—A week afterwards, another fully more horrible murder was committed by some unknown individual for the purpose of robbery, on the person of Samuel Neilson, a blind fiddler, at Cambusnethan, in Lanarkshire. This unfortunate man was found in his bed with his head dashed to pieces, apparently by the nave of a wheel. A person of weak intellects, supposed to have committed this crime, was apprehended on the 12th at the Kirk of Shotts.

Tuesday, October 16, William Mason was sentenced, by the Circuit Court at Glasgow, to seven years' transportation, for inflicting several wounds with a knife upon the body of Charles Cunningham, in Cunningham's own house, on the 23d of July; the quarrel arose from a reckoning due by Mason to Cunningham.

Next day, George Mackie was sentenced to transportation for life, for having, on the 15th of January last, within the boiling house of John Gilmour of South Walton, in the parish of Meams, put into a pot, containing soup, which was preparing for the use of John Gilmour and his family, a quantity of arsenic, or some other deadly or noxious poison; John Gilmour, Barbara Gilmour, Agnes Black, and Euphemia Macfadyen, having partaken of the soup, were seized with violent illness and vomiting, and for a while their lives were considered in imminent danger.

Thursday, October 18, George Duffy, labourer, was sentenced to be executed on the 7th of November, for the extraordinary crime of thrusting his wife into the fire, whereby she was severely scorched as to die soon after. Lord Moncreiff, in proposing sentence in this case, remarked, that it was unexampled in the annals of crime; but a similar case occurred at Edinburgh in the year 1755, when Nicol Brown, flesher, destroyed his wife by bringing her in contact with the fire, for which he was executed.

The sum total of convictions before this Court, for offences great and small, was forty-eight: Of these were sentenced to death, 1; to transportation for life, 2; to transportation for 14 years, 8; to transportation for 7 years, 30; to confinement in Bridewell, 5; to imprisonment in Jail, 2.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Monuments to Sir Walter Scott.—A most numerous and highly respectable meeting was held in the Assembly Rooms, at Edinburgh, on Friday the 5th, at which the Lord Provost was called to preside, for the purpose of considering of some national testimony to the memory of Sir Walter Scott. The feeling throughout the meeting was most enthusiastic in favour of the object of the meeting, and the following resolutions were adopted:—"That this meeting is impressed with sentiments of the highest admiration of the genius and talents of the late Sir Walter Scott, whose matchless works have carried his fame into the remotest regions of the civilized world, and have reflected on the literature of his country a glory which seems destined to be as durable as the language in which they are written."—"That this meeting, in accordance with what they believe to be the general wish and hope of his countrymen, are of opinion that a public memorial should be erected in the metropolis of Scotland, to the memory of Sir Walter Scott, on a scale worthy of his great name, and fitted to convey to future times an adequate testimony of the estimation in which he was held by his contemporaries." Committees were appointed for Scotland and England, to carry the second resolution into effect; and George Forbes, Esq., was appointed treasurer.

Sir John Forbes rose and said, that he was deputed by the Bank of Scotland, and the other banks and banking companies in Edinburgh, creditors of Sir Walter Scott, in token of their admiration of the honourable feelings which induced Sir Walter Scott, after his embarrassments in 1826, to dedicate his talents, during the remainder of his life, to the insuring the full payment of his debts, to subscribe, in their names, the sum of £500 towards the object of the meeting (great cheering). The sum subscribed at the close of the meeting amounted to £1100, and from twenty-four subscribers. It has since been increased to about £4000. The most remarkable subscription is that of Mr Murray of the Theatre-Royal—£100. By such liberality, the subscriber has at once done infinite honour to himself and to his profession.—At a meeting of the inhabitants of Glasgow, held on Thursday the 18th ultimo, the Lord Provost in the chair, it was unanimously resolved to erect a monument in that city to Sir Walter Scott. A large sum is expected.—A number of gentlemen in the neighbourhood of Abbotsford have resolved upon granting their own district with a similar testimonial, and a considerable sum has already been subscribed in London, the preparatory steps have been taken for erecting a monument.—The inhabitants of Dublin and Aberdeen have resolved to aid the Edinburgh fund, which, we would hope, will be the most considerable after all, both for the general honour of our native country, with which the capital is identified, and as that was the native city of the deceased. The site contemplated for the Edinburgh monument is one of the noblest that could any where be found; namely, that part of the Calton Hill which is at present deformed by the Old Observatory. We suggest that, on such an occasion, the furnishing of a plan should be made a matter of general competition; a premium to be given to the best, and lesser sums for the next six or eight, all of which might be framed, and deposited within the structure, as memorials of the architectural ideas entertained on this subject at the era of Sir Walter Scott's decease.

New Hour of Shutting Shops.—On Monday, October 15, in obedience to the representations of the shopmen of Edinburgh, their masters in general agreed to commence shutting their places of business at 9, instead of 9 o'clock. The chief object contemplated in this change is to permit young men employed in shops to have more time to spend on the cultivation of their minds. Intellect may thus be said to have stolen an hour's march upon business.

The Floods.—On Monday the 8th, the streams in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, by the continued heavy rains on that day, became swelled to an extraordinary degree. On the Water of Leith and the Esk the floods came down with peculiar force and violence, occasioning much damage in their course. Besides dam-heads carried away, considerable damage was done to various mills. At Slateford the old narrow bridge was partly carried away. Luckily, the crops were off the ground, otherwise the damage would have been immense. Heavy rains seem to have been very general in Scotland this week, as the provincial newspapers testify. At Glasgow the lower part of the town was, as usual on such inundations, flooded by the waters of the Clyde. It is calculated that the damage done in Morayshire alone from the inundation is not less than £100,000.

Spontaneous Denial of Powers by Corporations.—The magistrates of Sanquhar have announced their intention of leaving the selection of their successors at the next election to the inhabitants at large. The bonnet-makers of Dundee have also, according to the Dundee Chronicle, thrown open their corporation. These must be considered as striking marks of the spirit of the present times.

Landing of Charles X. at Hamburg.—The ex-royal family of France, which sailed from Scotland for an asylum on the Continent, on Tuesday, Sept. 18, in the United Kingdom steam-vessel, landed safely at Hamburg on the Friday following. It is mentioned that they met with a cordial reception on their arrival. According to the latest accounts, the ex-royal family had arrived at Frankfurt on the Oder, where they designed to make a short pause before proceeding to their ultimate destination in Austria.

Glasgow Reform Jubilee.—The celebration of the success of the reform bills, which had been postponed for several weeks, in consequence of the prevalence of the cholera, and other causes, took place in Glasgow on Friday the 28th of September.

Highland Society's Meeting.—The annual agricultural meeting and general show of live stock, under the patronage of the Highland Society, took place this year at Kelso, on Thursday, Oct. 4. The high character of the district in which this meeting took place, the excellency of the breeds of sheep and cattle for which it is distinguished, and the eminence of the numerous competitors for the prizes offered, gave an interest and importance to this meeting which no similar one ever possessed. The north of England and the south-east border counties of Scotland have been long distinguished by the attention bestowed on the improvement of the breeds of the finer kinds of stock; and the present competition, which was thrown open to the stock of all England, as well as of Scotland, was calculated to call forth the honourable emulation of the breeders of either country.

Edinburgh School of Arts.—On the evening of Wednesday the 3d, the introductory lecture on the commencement of the twelfth session of this useful seminary was given by Dr D. B. Reid, lecturer on chemistry, to the most crowded audience ever assembled in the Freemasons' Hall. Dr Reid illustrated his lecture by a number of beautiful experiments. At the close of the lecture, Dr W. Thomson, one of the secretaries, gave an outline of the course of study which is to be pursued during the winter session, viz. mathematics, chemistry, and natural philosophy; intimating, that although the winter course was to be limited to these subjects, in summer other interesting branches of science would be taught.

Emigration.—Since the beginning of the present year, no fewer than 14,500 persons have emigrated from the port of Liverpool only, to the United States, Canada, and Van Diemen's Land; but the greater proportion have proceeded to the country first mentioned.

Newcastle Pitmen.—The turn-out of this numerous body of men, originating in differences between them and their employers, and which has, unfortunately, existed some time, to the distress of all parties, is now in a great measure at an end, the men having generally returned to their wonted employment.

Decision in favour of Dissenting Ministers.—In the Sheriff's Court of Appeals at Edinburgh, relative to the registration of claims to vote under the reform act, it has been recognised that the clergymen of dissenting congregations have a right to be registered as voters in right of the manse held by them, provided there be written evidence that the congregation have a title to the manse, and have actually bound themselves to give such manse to the claimant. It was held that the want of written evidence of the obligation on the congregation to supply a manse (which was not mentioned in the minutes of ordination) was fatal to claims.

Recovery of the Paisley Union Bank Stolen Notes.—Upwards of twenty years ago, the Paisley Union Bank's Branch at Glasgow was broken into and robbed, and the greater portion of the stolen notes was shortly thereafter recovered. But there was a considerable sum of the company's £20 notes, which could not then be traced. In the end of August last, five of these notes having been put in circulation, the bank determined upon making another attempt to recover the whole of them, and employed that intelligent and active messenger, Mr Henry Miller of Glasgow, who, after many weeks spent in persevering inquiry and exertion in Edinburgh, London, and Birmingham, succeeded in recovering and bringing to Scotland the whole remaining amount of the £20 notes.

A monument has been finished on the top of Tom-na-Chastel [The hill of the castle], near Cress, to the memory of the late General Sir David Baird. The monument is a model of Cleopatra's Needle, and stands 80 feet high.

The Harvest.—By accounts received from all parts of the united kingdom, it appears that almost never was there a harvest in this country of so abundant and excellent a nature as that just past. Cheap markets may with certainty be anticipated as soon as the new grain comes into use.

Herring Fishery.—Banff, Oct. 15.—The fishing on this coast was concluded about a month ago. On the opposite side of the Moray Frith, where the greatest number of boats have hitherto assembled, the quantity taken has been very much less than usual, which was principally owing to the cholera having broken out at Helmsdale almost at the commencement of the season, and at Wick about the middle of it; the immediate consequence of which was, that a great many of the boats, as well as of the people employed on shore about the fishing, left these stations before the time when the bulk of the fishing is usually made; and we understand that, even taking in the whole line of the opposite coast, the average for the number of boats that first assembled is not more than 90 to 100 crans each, if so many. At the stations in the head of the Frith, say from Helmsdale round to Spey, it has been almost a complete failure. East of the Spey, and onward to Peterhead, the fishing has been more abundant; but even there it is much under an average catch. Taking the whole of that part of the coast, the average may be from 140 to 150 crans per boat. And the total quantity on both sides of the Frith may be estimated at about 50,000 barrels short of the catch of last season, and 100,000 short of 1830. With this great short-coming of the quantity, prices would undoubtedly have run very high, but that the consumption in Ireland is much reduced, from an idea being prevalent there (whether well or ill-founded we shall not pretend to say) that fish is an improper article of food where the spread of cholera is apprehended. Neither has the usual quantity been shipped for the West Indies, on account of the depressed state of that interest. Prices have run from 20s. to 22s. 6d. and 23s. per barrel, at which latter rates there was a considerable demand about two or three weeks ago, for the Continent and West Indies, but it is not now so brisk. The quantity, however, that now remains undisposed of is very small. —Aberdeen Journal.

At the great national market, called Falkirk tryst, commenced on the 8th October, 90,000 sheep were upon the ground. Cheviot weidlers sold at 20s. to 22s. 6d.; white-faced ewes, 10s. to 14s.; black-faced weidlers, 12s. to 22s. 6d. The market was considered a good one. Next day, about 60,000 black cattle were brought forward. Best West Highlanders, four-year-olds, from L.6 to L.10; two and three-year-olds, L.4 to L.6; queys, two-year-olds, sold from L.3 to L.5. The prices obtained for the heavy cattle were about 20s. a-head, or 7½ per cent below last year. At the same time, the demand was good, and nearly all sold. The best cart horses brought L.30 to L.35; current price of good husbandry horses, L.25.

DUMFRIES.

The pestilence visited Dumfries for the first time on the 15th of September. Its ravages since then have been more severe, in proportion to the population, than in any other part of Great Britain.

Aberdeen, Oct. 24.—We are sorry to say that cholera is still on the increase in this place, although only the lower orders have as yet felt its ravages. During last week, no fewer than 23 new cases and 5 deaths have occurred in the city, and 9 have recovered. Total cases, 92; deaths, 33; recoveries, 46; remaining, 13.

Dundee, Oct. 23 and 24.—New cases, 11; deaths, 10; recoveries, 10; remaining, 22. Total cases, 776; deaths, 487; recoveries, 267.

Inverness, Oct. 18 to 24.—New cases, 29; deaths, 6; recoveries, 21; remaining, 8. Total cases, 543; deaths, 167; recoveries, 360.

The cholera morbus now prevails with more or less virulence in Lothian, Dumfriesshire, Glasgow and Paisley, Kelso, Fife (particularly at Dunfermline, Cupar, and Kirkcaldy), Aberdeen, Inverness, and the northern counties.

Sporting Intelligence.

Billiards.—A match for two hundred sovereigns, between Mr Cootes and Captain C—, has just come off at Gerard's Hall. It was to have been eleven games, of one hundred each; but by mutual consent it was reduced to five, Mr Cootes receiving a red hazard in each of the three first games. The play throughout was very interesting. The first game was won by Mr Cootes beating the Captain by three points. The second was well played by both gentlemen, and terminated in Mr Cootes making a canon, and winning the game. The third game was contested for by both parties with all the eagerness possible, and every move of the ball was narrowly watched. The Captain came off victor, as he did in the fourth. They were now two games each, and both equally confident. The Captain commenced, but, by some mistake, brought both balls over the middle pockets; at this critical point there were some angry words respecting a stroke which Mr Cootes made, which was at last decided to be a foul one, and the balls were broke again; when, strange to say, the balls came each within half an inch of their former position. Mr Cootes now made the most of his advantage, and was 34 before the Captain scored one; but still the Captain was all confidence, and offered twenty sovereigns upon himself. After some good playing, they were both 97, when the Captain made a beautiful canon, which made him 99. At this critical point of the game, and to the astonishment of his friends, he gave a miss; then they stood 99 and 98; the anxiety was mutual, and every move of the balls was narrowly scrutinized; each party went in three times without scoring; the play became more interesting; caution was the principle upon which both acted; after a variety of strokes, Mr Cootes made a hazard—thus winning the game by one. Perhaps, since the game of billiards was first invented, there was never a more severe match played. The table was in beautiful order, and both played well. The Captain's friends attribute his losing the last game to his giving a miss when 99.

The gentlemen of the Fancy have had their attention directed to an engagement of great moment, which took place on Monday, the 15th October, at the Gentlemen's Subscription Pit, Paddington, between two 17lb. dogs, for fifty guineas a-side, named Tiny and Belcher. Tiny is better known as "the Bermondsey dog" and he had been open to fight any dog in the world, for any sum, for a long time. The other little dog was likewise well known as a good one, and a great deal of anxiety existed as to the result of the fight. The dogs set to at four o'clock in the afternoon, and the contest was one of the best we ever remember to have witnessed, and ended in the defeat of Belcher, after a most severe fight of thirty minutes. On Tuesday, a fight took place at Noisy Jack's Pit, between Frank Redmond's celebrated dog Lion, and a dog called Soldier, at 40lbs. weight. Lion proved himself the best dog ever pitted: he had all the worst of the fight for upwards of an hour, when his resolution and courage turned the scale, and decided the match in his favour. The winners of the above contests are open to fight any dogs in the world at 39lbs. and 17lbs. weight, for any sum.

Hunting has commenced in Bedfordshire under promising auspices. Monday the 8th was the first regular field day.

The Liverpool coursing meeting took place on Friday and Saturday, the 12th and 13th. The sport was excellent.

The Edinburgh races took place on the 25th and 26th, at Gullane, instead of Musselburgh, in consequence of the prevalence of cholera in the city and neighbourhood, but there was very little company on the ground. The Mid-Lothian yeomanry cavalry having met for permanent duty, were on the same day dismissed for a similar reason.

Caledonian and Fife Hunts.—Owing to the cholera being in Cupar, the assemblage for the races this year proved nearly a total failure. The races, however, went on as usual, and afforded most excellent sport.

On Tuesday and Wednesday, the 16th and 17th, the Perth races took place on the Inch at Perth, and a more numerous or more distinguished attendance than there appeared, has not been seen for many years. The horses were well-matched, and the races were excellent.

Races in New South Wales.—The following paragraph from The Sydney Herald affords some idea of the progress of refinement at the head-quarters of our convict establishment in New South Wales:—"The much-talked of Sydney races commenced on Wednesday at Paramatta. The day was particularly fine, and with its early dawn all was lively bustle and anxious preparation. The race-course was honoured by a fashionable assemblage of the fair—we seldom have seen on any public occasion in this colony so brilliant a display. So imposing and so numerous were the equipages, so multitudinous the equestrians, the arrangements so excellent, that our imagination carried us on to Ascot or Epsom. His Excellency entered the course on horseback, attended by his aides-de-camp, at about one o'clock, and was received with every demonstration of respect; three hearty cheers announced his arrival. We observed his Excellency's carriage and four, containing the family of the governor and part of the suite; indeed all the haut ton within 200 miles of Sydney were present: and we are happy to add, that so excellent was the sport, and the horses so superior, that we predict our Australian races will soon vie with those of the mother country." Then follows an account of two days' races, in which cups, plates, sweepstakes, and handicaps, were run for by celebrated horses.

A Jockey.—The duty of a jockey is to win, and not to do more than win. Half a neck is sufficient where his antagonist is exhausted, and as much judgment is shown in avoiding useless exertion as in making that which is sufficient. The best and most expert jockeys, such as Robinson and Chifney, avoid the use of the whip, if possible. Boys more readily resort to it, and thereby sometimes lose a race, that might otherwise have been won. When a race-horse is in the fullest exercise of his power, and doing his best, the blow of a whip will sometimes make him wince and shrink; he will, as it were, tuck up his flanks to escape from the blow, and raising his legs higher up, lose ground instead of stretching himself forth over a larger surface. In this way considerable space may be lost, when nothing is wanting but a quiet, steady hand, and a forbearance from the use of the whip. A curious example of this occurred a few years ago at Doncaster, in the celebrated race between Matilda and Mameluke. The latter was of a hot and violent temper, and being irritated by several false starts, not only lost considerable ground, but a great deal of his strength, at the outset of the race. Robinson was riding Matilda, and saw Chifney on Mameluke pass every horse in succession, till he came up with Matilda. At that moment he calculated Mameluke's strength with such nicety, that he was convinced he could not maintain the effort he was then making. He permitted Chifney, therefore, to reach him, and even to be a little ahead of him, and so far from whipping Matilda, actually gave her a kind of check. That check—that slightest imaginable pull—strengthened Matilda, and by assisting her to draw her breath, enabled her to give those tremendous springs by which she recovered her ground, headed Mameluke, and won the race for her owner, Mr Petre. It was in this race that a Scotch gentleman, who had won L.17,000 by the issue, went up to Robinson, in the joy of the moment, and gave him L.1000 as a present. Gully, the owner of Mameluke, is said to have lost L.40,000 on the occasion, every sixpence of which was punctually and honourably paid.

NEWSPAPER GOSSIP.

His Majesty has been graciously pleased to order a donation of L.100 to be applied towards the relief of the sufferers by the late fire at Bradninch, in the county of Devon.—The Marquis of Cleveland, having lost his Parliamentary interest in the borough of Camelford, is about to bring his land and houses there to the hammer.—The Earl of Albemarle has recently received a large accession of fortune, quite unexpected, by the death of an individual.—John Barrington, Esq. of Castlewood, Queen's County, eldest brother of Sir Jonah Barrington, succeeds to the title possessed by the late Sir Fitzwilliam Barrington, Bart.—A great number of persons continue to be convicted at different London police-offices, and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, for selling the Poor Man's Guardian, an illegal publication.—On Saturday se'night, "Rob Roy" was acted at Drury Lane, with all the strength of the house. At the close of it, a view of Abbotsford, the late residence of Sir Walter, one of the finest things Stanfield has ever done, was presented. The principal characters of the "Waverley" novels then passed in procession as those of Shakspeare's plays did in Garrick's jubilee. Macready, Cooper, Braham, Harley, and all the principal actors, assisted on the occasion, which, besides being a well-timed compliment in honour of departed genius, furnished a spectacle such as has rarely been witnessed on the boards of a theatre.—The amount of the funds in the general treasury, belonging to suitors of the Supreme Court, at Calcutta, on 31st December 1831, was 9,784,191 rupees, or nearly one million sterling.—Bibb met Morton the dramatist one day after the successful performance of one of the latter's plays, and concluding that a prosperous author must have plenty of cash, raised his solicitation accordingly, and ventured to ask him for the loan of a whole crown. Morton assured him he had no more silver than three shillings and sixpence. Bibb readily accepted them, of course, but said, on parting, "Remember I intended to borrow a crown, so you owe me eighteen pence."—"I am afraid of the lightning," murmured a pretty woman, during a thunder storm:—"Well you may," sighed the despairing adorer, "when your heart is steel."—In Queen Elizabeth's time, the following entry appears in the corporation books:—"Aldermen's wives not to scold in church." How the aldermen's wives have changed since the days of good Queen Bess!—An echo of a very peculiar character has been described by Sir John Hassell, as produced by the suspension bridge across the Menai Strait, in Wales. The sound of a blow of a hammer on one of the main piers is returned in succession from each of the cross beams which support the road-way, and from the opposite pier, at a distance of 576 feet; and, in addition to this, the sound is many times repeated between the water and the road-way, at the rate of twenty-eight times in five seconds.

The more married men you have (says Voltaire), the fewer crimes there will be. Examine the frightful columns of your criminal calendars; you will there find a hundred youths executed for one father of a family. Marriage renders a man more virtuous and more wise. The father of a family is not willing to blush before his children.—Mr Irving's new church in Newman Street, London, has been opened for the first time, and it appears able to accommodate a large congregation. Mr Irving is apparently as enthusiastic as ever; but it is remarked that he has within a very brief period assumed all the appearance of old age.—The wool and cloth market is steadily improving; the demand for flannels continues brisk.—At a public sale in a country town in England, a few days ago, a most superb copy of Field's Bible, printed at Cambridge in 1660, in two volumes folio, was, after considerable competition, knocked down to Mr James Taylor, bookseller, of Brighton, for L.15, 10s. The volumes are illustrated by nearly 300 engravings by Hollar, Lombart, Ogilby, and Sturt, and bound in old blue morocco, richly gilt. This edition, which may be considered as an unrivalled specimen of the time, is rendered extremely curious to the antiquary by the substitution of the word ye instead of we, in Acts vi., verse 3.

The iron trade at Merthyr, in Wales, is very bad at present, and a great number of miners and colliers are out of work.—There are not more than three or four English families now resident at Brussels, where, three years ago, there were as many hundreds.—Sir Charles Colville has resigned the governorship of the Mauritius.—It is rumoured at the Clubs that the Lord Chancellor is already occupied in framing his measure for abolishing the judicial and political functions at present combined in the person of the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and for not making that high officer dependent upon the changes of Ministry for the tenure of the high and responsible station in which he is placed.—An account from Dijon, a city in France, states that a manufacturer has discovered a cold dye for blue, which will save one quarter of the expense of the present process. It is well known that many fruitless experiments were made for substituting woad for indigo at a time when, in consequence of the continental blockade, the French manufacturers were deprived of the latter article.—The first appearance of Miss Fanny Kemble in the tragedy of "Fazio," at the Theatre of New York, is said to have created the greatest sensation that ever was produced in any theatre across the Atlantic. At the close of the performance the whole audience rose, and expressed their unanimous plaudits.—There are five candidates in the field to represent Manchester—Mr Phillips, Mr Cobbett, Mr Powlett Thompson, Mr Hope, and Mr Samuel Jones Lloyd.—The number of criminal prisoners in England averages 80,000 annually, while their maintenance costs upwards of L.340,000.—Paganini, whilst he remained in London, deposited in the Bank of England, in the name of two trustees, English gentlemen of the highest honour, a considerable sum of money, which is settled upon his son.—Persons are at present engaged in surveying for a railway, which it is proposed to form from the city of Durham to South Shields, with a branch to Sunderland.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex has become President of the Agricultural Employment Institution.

THE BOOKSELLING TRADE.

The bookselling world has lately been a good deal chagrined by some statements in Mr Babbage's work on Trade and Manufactures; the object of which is to show that both the wholesale and retail dealers enjoy too large a share of the money drawn from the public for books. Mr Babbage is right in lamenting that the cost of the production of a book, including the author's remuneration, should be so many per cents below the price demanded for it from the purchaser; but he is wrong in thinking that this is the fault of the bookseller, or that the bookseller enjoys an undue share of profit. The fault lies in circumstances, which nothing could remedy, unless the whole trade were reduced to one regular corporate monopoly, the number of booksellers thus abridged to one-fifth, and a certainty introduced into the value of an article proverbially the most uncertain that exists. We have much pleasure in giving publicity to the following observations upon Mr Babbage's statements: they are contributed by a most respectable member of the bookselling trade in Edinburgh.

"The whole history of the bookselling trade, both in this country and on the Continent, shows that it is very precarious, and by no means yields large profits in the aggregate. On the contrary, most of our publishers have ended in bankruptcy, and the moderate portion of wealth acquired by a few of the more cautious evidently shows that those engaged in the trade are not too liberally remunerated.

"The author alluded to exaggerates the profits of bookselling, while he entirely loses sight of the frequently unsaleable nature of the commodity, and the daily depreciation of the stock of a bookseller, which, unlike that of a wine merchant, never improves by age; on the contrary, various causes combine to render it daily less valuable—such as the publication of new editions of the same work, or of new works on the same subject—thereby rendering the copies of the original work on hand nearly useless, or at least unsaleable. He also instances the cost of the production of his own work, as a proof that a much smaller scale of profit should be demanded by the retailer. This we shall allow, provided that 6, or 10, or 20, copies of his, or any similar work, could be sold daily or even weekly; but I venture to assert, no retail bookseller here has sold even six copies since its publication; nor would a reduction of price to the extent he proposes greatly increase the demand.

"It will be allowed, that in a trade where only small sums of money are turned over, and that often on long credit, the rate of profit must be comparatively large; and these disadvantages do notoriously exist, and are inseparable from the bookselling business.

"The exaggeration consists in asserting that the large discount frequently given by the publisher of a work to the wholesale houses in London (by whom the retail trade of the whole kingdom is supplied), is enjoyed by all the trade." This is not the case, as could have been readily ascertained by proper inquiry in the right quarter. On the contrary, the profit of the retail bookseller is frequently not above half of that stated, and very much depends on his taking a greater or smaller number of copies of the same work, which is only a temptation to overstock, or, in other words, to ruin himself.

"In illustration of the dead weight which constantly hangs over a bookseller, in the shape of stock in trade, the writer of this may state his own case. On commencing business, he made a considerable purchase, and at stated periods had the curiosity to examine the progress of his sales. At the end of the first year he found about one fourth of the amount sold, the second year carried off nearly the same proportion, while the remaining half began to get very dull of sale, and this dullness was in the lapse of every year increased; and at the end of ten years he found so much on hand as amounted to a considerable per centage on the original purchase. He has uniformly found, that in every order selected from the catalogue of a wholesale bookseller, there is always an unsaleable remainder, which greatly diminishes the rate of discount on the whole. It may be said that much depends on the choice of books, and knowledge of business; and in reply he may state, that it will be allowed that he possesses the necessary qualifications, at least on an average with those engaged in the same trade; one proof of which is, his success above most of those who entered into business about the same time as he did—though, with every feeling of gratitude to those who have so kindly patronized him, he cannot help thinking, that, had he exerted the same industry, perseverance, and talent, in almost any other line of business, he would have been a much richer man than he is at this day."

A Society for the Reformation of the Church, of which Lord Henley is chairman, has put forth a manifesto of principles and objects, in which "the inalienable nature of Church Property from ecclesiastical purposes" is asserted, though the intention is immediately afterwards professed of placing any measure of reformation upon a purely Scriptural and religious foundation.

The Parliament at present stands prorogued till the 11th of December.

By the Leeward Island mail, a variety of colonial journals to the 3d ultimo have come to hand. The Trinidad paper contains a "circular dispatch" to the governors of the West India colonies, announcing the important fact, that, in consequence of the appointment of committees by the Houses of Lords and Commons, to inquire into the present condition of the West India colonies, his Majesty's government had determined to suspend for the present the operation of the circular of the 10th December 1831, and that no further steps would be taken to induce the colonial legislatures to adopt the provisions of the order in council of the 2d November.

New Stage-Coach Act.—This act came into operation on the 10th ult. The licence for every stage carriage is raised to L.5 per annum. The mileage duty is to be regulated, not by the number of horses, but by the passengers carried, viz. one penny for four passengers, three halfpence for six, and one halfpenny for every three additional, exclusive of the coachman and guard. On railways the duty is one halfpenny for every four passengers. The Commissioners may compound with any person per day, week, or month, in lieu of the above duties. Supplementary licences may be had by payment of one shilling, upon any change of proprietorship, route, distance, days of travelling, or number of journeys or of passengers. Four-horse carriages may take ten outside passengers, and two or three-horse carriages may take six outside passengers, with four inside, or seven outside passengers, with six inside, besides coachman and guard. No luggage to be more than ten feet nine inches high from the ground on a four-horse coach, nor more than ten feet three inches on a two or three-horse coach. Two passengers additional may be carried on the roof if the top of the luggage be not more than nine feet nine inches from the ground, and the top of the boot not more than six feet. A measure is to be provided at every toll-gate, and to be used on demand. The penalty on coachmen and guards for carrying too many passengers, or too much luggage, for leaving horses without any one to hold them, allowing others to drive, quitting the box unreasonably, neglecting luggage, overcharging, insolence, negligence, furious driving, &c., is fixed at L.5 in all cases. If the driver or guard is not to be found, the proprietor is liable, unless he can prove that the offence was committed without his knowledge, and not for his advantage, and that he had used his endeavours to find the offender. Justices may award costs and compensation for loss of time to defendants and their witnesses, where complaints or information are dismissed or withdrawn, and may distrain for the amount, or commit for one month in default of goods to satisfy the distress. The licence to let post-horses is raised from 5s. to 7s. 6d. The duty per mile or journey as before.

* The booksellers technically term their own profession "the Trade."

Postscript.

The eyes of Britain are now intently fixed on the chances of peace or war, arising from the Belgian question. A treaty between France and England for the contemplated hostilities against Holland was prepared at London on the 23d, and returned from Paris, ratified, on the 27th. On the 26th, some new propositions by the King of Holland were read by the plenipotentiaries of the Five Powers, and rejected by those of France and Great Britain, while the remaining diplomatists retired without making any remonstrance. It is said that only a few more days will be allowed to the King of the Netherlands; and if these pass away without bringing his submission, the two liberal powers will make their combined attack, even at the hazard of a war. The military strength of Holland and Belgium are thus stated:—

	DUTCH.	BELGIAN.
Infantry Line	30,000	53,000
Garde Communale and Civic	30,000	20,000
Total Infantry	60,000	75,000
Cavalry, 29 squadrons.		Cavalry, 42 squadrons.

The Dutch army consists of three divisions and a reserve; the commanders are Generals Van Gien, the Duke of Saxe Weimar, Meyer, and Cort Heylegers. The cavalry are commanded by General Trip. The Belgian army consists also of three divisions and a reserve, commanded by Generals Hurd, Duvier, Goethals, and Clump. The cavalry is commanded ad interim by General Ghengy.

Reinforcements to the amount of 1650 men and 240 horses, including Sir John Milley Doyle, who has devoted himself to the service of Don Pedro, have already reached, or must immediately reach Oporto.

Price of Consols on Tuesday, October 30, 84½

By the commercial information from Canada, received to the 16th ult., we are glad to find that the diminution of cholera cases had so far restored confidence, that trade was carried on with as much activity as ever. The markets were improving daily, and purchasers from a distance were making their appearance. In the staple articles of wheat, ashes, flour, pork, and beef, no decided change as to value had taken place; the demand for those articles had suffered less diminution during the prevalence of cholera than any others. Dry goods had greatly improved in the face of a large supply. The autumnal sales, it was expected, would clear off any large stocks on hand. New grain was not abundant, but the samples were of good quality, and the crops in both provinces more than are usually produced. The prices of lumber were low, affording but a very scanty remuneration to the manufacturer. Real property was in very little demand.

Sir Peregrine Maitland, governor of Nova Scotia, having obtained leave of absence, is about to revisit his native country. This gallant officer, we believe, will carry with him the very best wishes of the people whom he has ruled with so much mildness and discretion.

Grand Continental Canal.—The plan for forming a navigable junction of the Maine with the Danube, by which means the German Ocean would be brought into direct communication with the Black Sea, has recently been published in ten large plates, with full details, at Munich. The new line of canal will leave the Danube at Kellheim, traverse the valleys of Altmühl and Ottmaringen, pass through Neumarkt, Nuremberg, Erlangen, and Forchheim, and meet the Maine by means of the Regnitz, which falls into the former not far from Bamberg. The length of the canal will be about three hundred English miles, and the expense of completing it is estimated at eight millions seven hundred and fifty thousand guilders, or somewhat more than L.350,000. The King of Bavaria has given orders for carrying this important enterprise into as speedy effect as possible.

Several government steam-vessels are now fitting out at Woolwich for the use of the navy. They are said to be destined for the Scheldt. The greatest activity prevails at Woolwich Dock-yard, where 800 shipwrights, and other artificers, have for some weeks past been regularly employed. As much bustle prevails in the arsenals as was ever known during the late war in fitting out stores for the service of the British fleet. The enlistment of sailors in the neighbourhoods of Tower-hill, Wapping, Shadwell, Ratcliffe, and Blackwall, is proceeding to a great extent. The Admiralty cutters are daily carrying away hundreds of able-bodied seamen from the Perseus guard-ship, off the Tower, the place of rendezvous for the tars. Large bounties are given to good seamen, and the Jew slopsellers are reaping a good harvest by the great demand for slops of all kinds.

The 10th of November is fixed for the removal of the royal family from Windsor to Brighton.

At the Old Bailey, a few days ago, the Recorder sentenced 13 criminals to be executed, 12 to transportation for life, 10 to transportation for 14 years, and 53 for 7 years; 1 to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for 12 months, 17 to 6 months, 7 to 3 months, 4 to 2 months, and a number which remained to various periods, from one month downwards to seven days.

On Monday, a masque was performed, at Covent Garden Theatre, in honour of the memory of Sir Walter Scott. It is from the pen of Mr Sheridan Knowles, and is written with considerable eloquence and power. The plot runs thus. In Dryburgh Abbey, seen by moonlight, the tomb of Scott is discovered, occupying the centre of the foreground. A poet in the garb of Scotland enters, and, after uttering some verses of eulogium on the genius of the departed bard, and of lament for his loss, deposits on his tomb a funeral chaplet, woven in haste, and under the impulse of an affection so eager that it would not wait. A slumber falls upon the mourner, and he reclines upon a bank. Fancy then enters, and invokes the Genii of England and Ireland, and the Spirit of the Mountains, who assemble round the tomb, and unite in bewailing the fate of him who, while alive, had shared their best gifts, and worn them to their honour no less than to his own. Immortality then rises from the tomb, consoles their griefs, by pointing to the lasting fame the poet has achieved, and to the undecaying monument which his genius has built upon his works. The clouds which have ushered in the approach of Immortality then dissipate, and the tomb disappears—in the distance are shown a succession of pictures, representing scenes from some of the best of the Waverley novels. The characters represented are dressed with accuracy, and the groups are arranged in the most striking manner. The first represents the meeting between the Knight of Snowdon and the Lady of the Lake. This changes to the scene in the cavern at Dorniecleugh, where the catastrophe of the novel of Guy Mannering is powerfully described. The next represents the sea shore, and the peril of Sir Arthur Wardour and his daughter, and the efforts of the old Beadsman to rescue them. In the fourth, a picture is given of the return of the enterprising marauder, Rob Roy, accompanied by his friend, the Bailie Nicol Jarvie, to his wife and sons, at the moment when they are mourning him as dead. The next scene is that in which the Duke of Argyll introduces Jeanie Deans to the Queen of George II., to sue for and obtain her sister's pardon. The next, and one of the best, nay, the very best of the whole series, represents the lists at Templestow, with the despairing Rebecca waiting in suspense and agony the approach of a champion to deliver her from the horrid fate which seems to approach her. The last scene represents the Court of Elizabeth in the Castle of Kenilworth. The series of tableaux thus concluded, a change ensues which represents Abbotsford, as it may be centuries hence, where a festival is held in commemoration of Scott, and in which the various personages who have occupied the preceding scenes are disposed in various groups. The effect of this last display is extremely good. The whole performance was well received, and was announced, with the unanimous approbation of the audience, for repetition.

An alarm of fire was given in the Coburg Theatre on Friday night, which produced the most frightful confusion, and the rush of the audience to escape was dreadful. Several persons were seriously injured in the passages, but luckily none lost their lives. The alarm was given by some miscreant, for whose discovery a reward of L.20 has been offered.

On the 23d, at St James's Church, Piccadilly, was married, Otway Cave, Esq. member for Limerick, to Sophia, the eldest daughter of Sir Francis Burdett, Bart. The bride, who is in her 40th year, was given away by her father. The bride-maids were the Duchess of St Alban's and the Countess of Guilford. The lady of Otway Cave, Esq. possesses a fortune of L.30,000. The happy pair, directly after the ceremony, set off for Stafford Hall, Leicestershire, where the new-married couple will pass the honeymoon.

We have received intelligence of the death of Lord Clinton at Milan. His Lordship, who had been in an ill state of health, had left England in the hope that the air of Naples would prove serviceable to him, but could not complete the journey.—Brighton Gaz.

A Caution to Ladies intending to kill themselves.—At the Thames Police-Office, Maria Thompson, a tall, well-looking young woman, has been committed to take her trial for having twice attempted self-destruction. From this it would seem that ladies have not "a right to do what they like with themselves." We do not know to what punishment the prisoner has subjected herself.

The city of Frankfort has passed a vote of thanks to Mr Campbell, the poet, for his public support of the cause of the unfortunate Poles.

On Thursday, the 25th, the Rev. George Houston, an aged Protestant clergyman, who had rendered himself obnoxious by collecting his tithes, was murdered near his own house, at Feighcullen, near Rathangan. Several persons have been taken into custody on suspicion.

Limerick, Oct. 25.—There will be another military district formed in Ireland, of which Limerick is to be the head-quarters, and Major-General Sir John Buchan is to have the chief command on the Staff.

The command of this garrison has devolved on Colonel Wemyss.

A coach full of witnesses on their way to Cork, to give evidence at the assizes against the persons charged with anti-tithe conspiracies, was attacked by the peasantry, and the witnesses severely handled. Some of them narrowly escaped with their lives.

At the Muir of Ord market, held a few days ago, more business was done than at any previous tryst for the last five years.

All the Dundee whale-fishing vessels have now arrived. The Alexander, Thomas, Princess Charlotte, and Ebor, came into the river on Friday, and the Advice on Sunday. The whole of them have been very successful, as will be seen by the following estimate of their cargoes:—

	Fish.	Tuns Oil.	Tons Bone.
Dorothy	35	290	18
Fairy	20	170	10
Horn	25	220	12
Thomas	28	240	15
Friendship	29	200	12
Alexander	26	215	13
Princess Charlotte	26	200	12
Ebor	22	165	8
Advice	24	240	15

At L.20 per tun, the value of the oil produced by the cargoes of the nine vessels will be L.38,800, and the baleen, or whalebone, at L.150 per ton, will be worth L.17,250—making the total value L.56,050.

The cholera is still on the decrease in Dumfries and its neighbourhood. Very liberal subscriptions have been made in this quarter for relief of the suffering families of the poor.

Scottish Constitutions Ascertained.—Caithness, 173; Dumbartonshire, 860; Edinburgh, 6042; Greenock, 983; Inverness, under 500; Mid-Lothian, 1134; Paisley, 1242; Kilmarnock, 593.

Paisley Voluntary Church Association.—There was a meeting held on Tuesday evening, in the hall attached to Mr Smart's church, for the purpose of entering into arrangements for the formation of a Paisley Voluntary Church Association. The meeting was strictly private, and consisted of a few individuals, selected from each of the sessions of the different united associate and relief congregations of the town, with a sprinkling of persons from some independent churches. A committee was appointed to draw up a code of laws for the contemplated society. When this is done, a more open meeting, it is understood, will be called.

Singular Challenge.—A farmer in the Upper Ward of Lanarkshire challenges "a braid Scotland" to produce three brothers whose united lengths shall equal that of his three sons, 18 feet 4 inches, to compete with them in the three following agricultural arts:—Ploughing, reaping, and stacking; and also in the three following manly and rational games:—Curling, quoits, and draughts.

Shoal of Herrings.—On Monday afternoon the Tweed and Berwick Bridge presented a scene of rare and striking beauty. From shore to shore tens of thousands of full grown herrings appeared sporting in the river, or for a moment glittering in the sun as numbers of them continued incessantly springing into the air. At intervals they suddenly disappeared, and the next instant they were seen rising, and playfully pursuing each other in numerous small circles. They remained but for a short time, and were not generally observed.

LITERARY NEWS.

Forty-five thousand copies have been sold of the Life of Sir Walter Scott, published, a month ago, as a Supplement to Chambers' Edinburgh Journal, and which contained the matter of an ordinary volume.

A work in two volumes octavo, under the title of "Jacobite Memoirs—illustrative of the Rebellion of 1745," will be published, in the course of a few months, by Messrs William and Robert Chambers. It consists of original narratives by the principal actors in the insurrection, the whole forming one connected view of that extraordinary campaign, together with the escape of Prince Charles, and his subsequent life. So valuable a collection of historical papers, or one calculated to afford so much entertainment to ordinary readers, has hardly ever been presented to the public.

Mr Blackwood is about to publish a work of much historical value—a "History of the Greek Revolution," by Thomas Gordon, F.R.S. The author is a gentleman of large property in Aberdeenshire; but, led by a generous enthusiasm, he left his native country some years ago, and engaged in the cause of the Greeks. His personal share in the subject of his history, and the means he enjoyed of procuring information upon all points, give reason to expect a work of first-rate interest.

A work is in preparation, and will speedily appear in a succession of numbers, under the title of "The Unknown Poets of Scotland." It will comprise accounts of many ingenious individuals in obscure circumstances, with specimens of their compositions.

HISTORY OF BRITISH PARTIES.

A GREAT struggle took place, about two hundred years ago, between the King of Great Britain and a portion of his people, the latter being anxious that he should rule with a greater deference to the will of his Parliaments, and less of his own will. Those who befriended the King in this quarrel were chiefly country gentlemen and members of the Church of England: they were called Cavaliers. Those who took the other side were principally merchants in London, and the mercantile classes of the people at large: they got the name of Roundheads. The two parties fought a good many battles between the year 1642 and 1648; but at last the King lost the day, and was beheaded as a traitor to his people. The party which cut him off set up a republic, which did not, however, last long, as the popular general, Oliver Cromwell, very soon contrived to usurp the chief power, under the title of Protector. The people in general suffered so much in the course of a few years under this irregular authority, that, in 1660, they consented to take back the son of their late King, and submit once more to a monarchy. The fear of running into any more such scrapes as they had lately suffered from, now induced the people, or the most part of them, to be as tamely submissive as they had lately been turbulent; and accordingly the royal power became greater than ever. Charles the Second tyrannised over his subjects, doing a great deal of mischief, particularly to the Scottish part of them, for five and twenty years, and his brother, James the Second, reigned as mischievously for other four. Only a few persons in England, and a small set of persecuted Presbyterians in Scotland, dared to express any uneasiness under this system: they got the name of WHIGS, it is not exactly known for what reason. However, the government had so many means of harassing its opponents, that little was done to resist it, till James the Second began to tamper with the religion of his subjects, and attempted to restore Catholicism. This was too much. The British lion could endure it no longer. So the Whigs, with the assistance of some of the best friends of monarchy, brought about what is called the Revolution. King James was sent to France, with his infant son, who afterwards was called the Pretender. His nephew, William Prince of Orange, became King in his stead, and the Protestant religion was secured.

After the Revolution, there was less cruelty exercised upon the friends of liberty; the Presbyterian religion was established in Scotland; and things, upon the whole, were a great deal smoother than they had been. The chief effect, however, was to make the King less powerful, and the nobility more so: little was done for the people. The administrations for some years were composed entirely of Whigs. William never had any children, and so the crown came to his cousin Anne, a daughter of the monarch sent to France. In the meantime, a number of considerable persons kept up an opposition to the government, in favour of the exiled family of Stuart. They were generally flaming zealots for episcopacy, and held, as a doctrine, that kings could never, by any fault, forfeit their crowns. From the Latin name of King James, they were at first called Jacobites; but in a few years they became more generally known by the name of TORIES. Queen Anne, being a Tory in her heart, though reigning in violation of the first article of the creed, took back that party into the administration, and endeavoured by their means to pave the way for restoring her brother the Pretender. However, this was not accomplished; and so, at her death in 1714, George, Elector of Hanover, a distant branch of the family, succeeded—such having been enacted as law some years before by a Whig Ministry. The Tories were now once more thrown into opposition, and the government, for a long time, was conducted by Whigs. Still little was done for the people. The Whigs, though professing less arbitrary principles than the Tories, were to all intents and purposes an aristocracy, and ruled, through the medium of the Houses of Parliament, simply by those means which the reform bill has at length put an end to. The Whigs, indeed, or rather the few nobles who gave the party its power, were at this period so domineering and irresistible, that the Tories, compared with them, looked like patriots, and really, perhaps, did possess more of the spirit of political freedom. Few men, we believe, have died with more of the sincere feelings of martyrdom than those of the Tory party who rebelled in 1745, and were executed as traitors. The great Whig aristocracy continued to triumph so long as there was any party in favour of a Catholic Pretender; but about the year 1760, when George the Third became King, that party was so nearly extinct, that the people did not see so much reason as before for supporting the Whigs. George the Third, therefore, thought he might resume some of that power of which the Crown had been so long deprived by the nobles. He formed a Tory administration under the Earl of Bute, a Scottish nobleman who had been his preceptor, and instilled into him, it is said, some high notions of the royal prerogative. The people had now the choice of supporting power in the King or in the Whig nobles—in the hands of one, or of a few. A great majority of the respectable classes of the community favoured the pretensions of the King.

The Tories now devoted to the Hanover sovereign all that attachment which they had previously bestowed upon the exiled Stuarts. The Whigs, on the other hand, mortified at the want of power, resumed those wild principles of civil liberty which they had trumpeted so much before the Revolution, but which they had kept so snug in their pockets all the time they had been in power since. The Earl of Chatham was their principal leader. A still more important, though less respectable one, was Mr Wilkes, a citizen of London, of great abilities, but the worst possible private character. Junius, also, the Great Unknown of the last century, wrote his bitter political letters on this side. Nevertheless, the Tory government went on, and the Crown resumed a great deal of the improper influence it had had in former times. At length, the ruling party got a dreadful shock from the American war of independence, which commenced in 1775. In asserting their grand principle of no taxes without representation, the Americans awakened in Britain those ideas of Parliamentary reform which have lately been realized. It was about this time that the people were first told, in the King's speeches, and other documents, of "our great and glorious constitution." The Whigs took the part of the Americans very warmly, opposed the war constantly in Parliament, and at length, at the close of the unhappy contest in 1782, the King was obliged to displace the Tories and admit the Whigs to his councils. The Rockingham administration, as it was called, contemplated a measure of Parliamentary reform, and that scheme of political regeneration was zealously advocated by the most brilliant orators of the day, Fox, Burke, and Pitt, the last of whom was then just entering public life. The death of the Marquis of Rockingham, at a critical period, suddenly blasted the prospects of the Whigs. Their broken bands had to coalesce with the Tories lately dismissed, and thus was formed the famous Coalition Ministry, which was the most unnatural alliance ever known in party history. An attempt to grasp the immense power and patronage of the East India Company rendered this Ministry so unpopular, that George the Third thought he might attempt to replace his favourite Tories in full and undivided sway. He accordingly formed a strong administration of that kind under Mr Pitt, who, for the time, was content to forget Parliamentary reform. The late Ministry having still a majority in the House of Commons, the King dissolved the Parliament, and the people sent up a new one exactly to his mind. At this time the Tories were decidedly the most popular party. The Whigs only commanded small detached parts of the community. With the view of regaining their former influence, they assumed principles verging upon the democratic, and endeavoured to raise a party among the people by addressing them upon all the most exciting topics. For about ten years they went on thus, in almost hopeless opposition, till at last came the French Revolution.

This great change in France took its rise in the principles professed by America when she shook off the thrall of kings. The fever of new ideas spread to Great Britain, like a very severe disease super-added to one comparatively slight. The Whigs gave every encouragement for a time to the propagation of what were called French principles; but yet no great progress was made, and the Whigs themselves soon shrunk back in a kind of dismay from the democratic movement. The Tory party, with George the Third at its head, saw that the progress of events in France threatened every other monarchical government, and therefore proclaimed war against the French republic. The nation, with an exception hardly worth naming, went heartily into the crusade, which was accordingly carried on for many years, at an immense expense. Now-a-days, the people repent of this war, and wish to throw the blame of it upon the monarchical and aristocratic government which existed at its commencement. But this won't do. If the generality of the people had not been either favourable or indifferent, the war could not have taken place. The well-known truth is, that, under the horror of French republicanism and irreligion, the liberal party in this country found their mouths completely closed. The bulk of the people had not that keen and considerate way of looking upon political subjects which they now have; and many, perhaps, were carried away by the mere bravado of military appearances, and the ridiculous notion that the French are our natural enemies. The people should learn from this to look well to the causes and objects of a war before they engage in it, and not wait till the reckoning is handed to them, before they reflect.

From 1783, when Mr Pitt commenced his administration—throughout the whole of the French revolutionary war—and down till the death of George the Fourth in 1830 (with the exception of a few months in 1806), the Tory party remained in power, while the Whigs, successively under Mr Fox and Earl Grey, stood in the light of an Opposition. At length, as is well known, his present Majesty found it necessary, from the pressure of public feeling, to form a cabinet of the latter party, with Earl Grey at its head. By this Ministry, the great measure of Parliamentary reform, after being dormant for nearly fifty years, has been carried, and the people at large, for the first time, admitted to have a direct influence in the management of public affairs.

Latterly, there has arisen a third party, not composed, as the Whigs and Tories are, of statesmen, but of the people, and upon whom the name of RADI-CALS has been conferred. The Radicals profess to place as little reliance upon the sincerity of the Whigs, in their measures of political improvement, as they would upon the Tories. They are not restricted by any particular veneration for ancient institutions, merely because they are ancient or already established; consequently they are not limited in their notions of reform, which they would carry to the length of putting down every specific abuse of power, no matter in what shape, and of elevating the people to a station in the commonwealth which they have never yet attained in this country. This party received a great accession of numbers during the recent ferment relative to reform, which, indeed, they take the credit of having urged to a successful conclusion.

It will be seen from the above sketch that the two principal political parties in Britain took their rise at an early period, and have long existed under different modifying circumstances, and with various fortune. The Tories have to boast, that, at various periods of our history, they prevented the monarchical principle from being too much depressed by the aristocracy, and latterly sustained it alive when threatened with utter extinction by a neighbouring democracy. The Whigs can point to the Revolution, to the Hanover succession, and to the Reform of the Commons' House of Parliament, as their great achievements. From the turn that public affairs are now taking, it is not likely that these distinctions, which essentially take their rise in an aristocratic system, will be much longer known in the country. The government will require to be conducted with such a close reference to the expression of popular opinion, that there will be no party worthy of the name, nor any rulers except those who are themselves willing to be ruled.

A WORD FOR THE WORKING CLASSES.

THOMAS THE RHYMER, a sagacious Scotsman of the thirteenth century, who, like Roger Bacon, obtained from his countrymen the reputation of possessing supernatural powers, among his other prophecies, foretold that the country at some future period would be more generally cultivated than it was in his own time, but that the food of the poor would not on that account be increased in quantity; or, in his own words—

The waters shall wax, the woods shall wene, Hill and moss will be torn in;
But the bannock will be ne'er the braider.

This vision of what was to come to pass has been at length partly realized; the country is now subjected to the best processes of a general cultivation, but there are still thousands of poor, who are as destitute as ever. While an improved system of agriculture has added manifold to the resources of the people, the wealth of the country has been prodigiously increased by the invention of different kinds of machinery. Nevertheless, the question continues to be agitated by an innumerable body of indigent workmen, "show us how all this improvement and additional wealth of the country is to do us any good." This pertinent question has been asked again and again by those suffering human beings whom machinery has thrown idle; and, somehow, the answers which they have received have been so singularly irrelevant, that they have still cause to profess their ignorance. Let us sift this matter to the bottom in a few plain sentences. When a master tradesman, who employs ten journeymen, sets up a machine which can execute the whole of his work, it follows that his ten men are thrown out of employment. We shall suppose that the wages of the workmen amounted to 20s. a-week each, or L.10 in all, and that the machine executes the same quantity of work for L.2. Here, then, is a saving of L.8 to the master. This saving is, however, more apparent than real; for other persons set up machines equally good; and as they compete in traffic, the goods produced have to be sold for less than before, so the actual saving may not be above L.3. Granting that there is a profit of L.3, we next ask what is done with that sum. On investigation, it will be found that about two-thirds of it are spent on a better style of living. More boots, hats, and clothes, are purchased; and this, of course, betters the condition, at least, of bootmakers, hatters, and clothiers. The remaining L.1 is most likely accumulated, or saved. With regard to the L.5 which is lost by selling the goods cheap, the public are here most decidedly benefited; for they can make their money go farther, or, in other words, they can live with comfort on a lower income. Further, this cheapness allows an extensive and lucrative export to foreign countries, where the people are less ingenious and wealthy than we are. By all these means the trade and commerce of the country are greatly the better for the introduction of machinery. But it will still be said by the workmen who have been thrown idle, that such a process is of no use to them. "That line of argument," say they, "is no doubt correct as regards the general good; but what is to become of us all the time? You see we make nothing by the saving—it is, in fact, a saving at our expense." Now, this is exactly the sort of question which no political economist seems willing to answer without shuffling. He seldom or never gets beyond the general good; to the poor starving workmen he says, "don't you, by these splendid inventions in machinery, get cheaper gowns for your wives? don't you get cheaper coats and umbrellas? and ought you not to be thankful that you can now buy fifty needles for a penny?" This is remarkably fine logic for people who have plenty of work or an ordinary supply of money; but, it must be confessed, it is miserable consolation for fifty thousand artisans who have been thrown totally out of employment, and who, most probably, will never see money again all the days of their lives, except in the shape of alms. We are persuaded that the general notion on this subject is, that the individuals thus thrown idle find some other species of work, either immediately or soon after they have been paid off—an opinion certainly erroneous. Sometimes they get work at some other business; but in a much greater number of cases they either sink into the condition of day-labourers, or otherwise receive such a pittance as wages, that we are afraid they reap very little benefit from the cheap calicoes, coats, needles, and umbrellas, which the economists take so much care to trumpet. For instance, were machines to be established in every large town capable of manufacturing 10,000 pairs of shoes in the week, at 6s. per pair, it is easy to see that the trade of shoe-making would soon be as effectually destroyed as that of weaving, or any other ruined profession, and that a vast body of industrious artisans would be left in a state approaching to utter destitution. What, then, is to become of these workmen? They have learned a trade which is of no use to them now. They cannot make clothes, nor house furniture, nor any thing else. A young man bred to be a grocer could easily turn tallow-chandler; a haberdasher would make a shift to sell hats; but take the artisan from his trade, and you finish him. Granting that he can turn his hand to some other trade, he finds that every profession is already overstocked with workers. The competition which he creates, consequently, sinks the wages of others, and the evil thus cuts in two ways. Supposing that the workmen so thrown idle by the introduction of machinery do get into employment, they most likely receive a wage of 4s. 6d. instead of 15s. per week; but we fail in observing that they realize the odd 10s. 6d. by the extraordinary cheapness of food, clothing, and lodging, which we hear so much about. Such, therefore, is the unhappy condition of nine-tenths of the masses of workmen who, as things go, are yearly thrown out of employment in this country.

We have often had occasion to be astonished at the childish backwardness of the political economists in not offering to the world some species of solvent for the evils here alluded to. Why they abstain from coming to the point with regard to what is to be done with the hordes of ruined artisans who press upon the country, and whose numbers, it is perfectly obvious, are rapidly increasing, is beyond our comprehension. The case is surely worthy of deliberate investigation, and is growing daily more so. Reasoning from what we observe has already taken place, and what there is a prospect of accomplishing, it is just to infer, that in a few years machines will be invented and brought into operation which will supersede the use of many hundreds of thousands of workmen now in employment. It need, we think, no longer be denied that improvements, whether in agriculture or manufactures, have a direct tendency to extirpate the working classes, or, to express it more leniently, to enable the higher and middle ranks to do without the aid of the working classes. There can be no question that these improvements vastly increase the exports, general wealth, and comfort of the nation, but all this, it is lamentable to think, is at the expense of the existing generation of workmen, and a century of misery may probably be incurred, if means be not adopted to remedy the grievance. It is assuredly an unfortunate state of things, when we find a portion of society steadily advancing into a condition of great accumulated wealth, and another, and by far the more numerous portion, sinking into the lowest depths of poverty, or becoming a mere burden upon the soil. Although certain nefarious regulations have been put in diligent action to assist in bringing about this frightful calamity, and although the rescinding of these injudicious arrangements might help to retard the ultimate apotheosis of human misery, no skill could now avert the effects of discoveries in science, or restore society to its equilibrium. The improvements in agriculture and manufactures are in the act of producing a tremendous alteration in the properties and structure of British society, and the working classes might just as well try to hinder the sun from shining, as to prevent this extraordinary change taking effect. Whatever may be done to diminish the heaps which the capitalists have accumulated, it is sufficiently obvious that Great Britain is no longer a country which can hold out a prospect of permanent remunerating employment to the workmen of a variety of professions. The only remedy for the evils propagated by the influence of capital and machinery lies in flight, now that the legislature permits such a measure. It is quite in vain for workmen to grumble, or to combine to force the payment of particular rates of wages, which cannot be paid, or to constrain masters to give employment, when they have none to give, or to break the machinery which science and genius have invented to simplify the arts of civilized life, or to resort to any other unmanly, un-British, and foolish project, to stem a current which no human power can now effectually oppose. Patience is also of no value, for things are always growing the worse with time. Flight, we say, is the only feasible cure for this universal distress. The only outlet for the growing superabundance of the working classes lies in emigration—emigration to a country not so far advanced in its condition as this overdone island. This process of relief will be found on trial much more efficacious than working at home for two or three shillings per week, and trusting to make up the difference by the cheapness of calicoes. We need hardly remind the industrious and well-disposed artisans of the kingdom at large, that various parts of North America are precisely in that state which requires the exercise of their moral skill and manual labours; and, at the same time, we need scarcely hint to the capitalists, who have been the winning party in the struggle, that it is expected they will legally contribute means to assist in the removal of their unfortunate countrymen. We have no doubt in our own minds, that a great and healing measure of this description will at no distant date be absolutely requisite, in order to facilitate the comfortable deportation of those masses of individuals who are no longer necessary in our commonwealth, and the country cannot be sufficiently thankful that there is placed within its reach so beneficial and simple a remedy for the miseries of an over-abundant population.

THE FUNDS.

THE Funds, as they are called, are pledges or promises of the nation to pay the debts which it has from time to time contracted. When it is said in the newspapers that government has funded so many Exchequer bills, or any other security, the meaning is, that it is issuing so many promissory notes in exchange for cash; in other words, it is contracting debts. When, on the other hand, it is said that it is purchasing Exchequer bills, or buying up so and so in the Funds, it is implied that the nation is buying back these promissory notes with cash, or reducing the amount of its debt. The term Stocks is only another name for the Funds. The debt of the nation is divided into various branches, with certain peculiar titles. Sometimes the money is borrowed at 3 per cent. of interest, at other times at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and so forth, according to the scarcity or value of money at the time; consequently, a new issue of promises is of one or other of these denominations, or of an entirely new denomination. By whatever name the different branches of the debt are known, it is seldom or never the case that the purchasers of the promissory notes buy them at the expressed value. For instance, if the note be marked L.100, it is perhaps sold for L.60, or as much as can be obtained; if the government rise into better credit, so also does the note; and the person who bought it for L.60 may sell it to another for perhaps L.70; but if the credit of the nation again decline, the second purchaser may not be able to get more than L.60 or L.65 for it, supposing he is inclined or compelled to sell. If he choose, he may retain it till the national credit again rise. These fluctuations in the value of stock are called the rising and falling of the government securities or Funds; and the transactions connected with them are described as buying into, or selling out of, the Funds. It is generally considered that the purchasing of stock is nearly as profitable a way of investing spare capital as any other connected with commercial enterprise. Although 3 or $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. may nominally be given as interest of the money laid out, in point of fact the lender gets 5 per cent., or thereabouts, because the interest is counted on the L.100, or expressed value of the share, and not on the L.60 or L.65 paid for it. Money laid out on stock is also considered to be as secure from absolute loss as if laid out on any species of property, for the national good faith is pledged to pay the debts incurred by the executive government, and because a national bankruptcy would lead to the dissolution of not only almost every institution, but, most likely, put a stop to the payment of every private debt throughout the country. As all, or nearly all, would thus be involved in the calamity of a national failure, every reflecting person is inclined to sustain the national good faith, and, consequently, those who lay out their money in stock feel a tolerable assurance that they will come to no decided loss.

In remote periods of English history, the kings were accustomed to contract debts to carry on wars, but the sums borrowed were regulated in their amount by the existing revenue, and were in their nature only anticipations for a few years of its collection; while, in modern times, finance ministers have contented themselves with providing, by fresh imposts, for the regular payment of the interest or annuity, without much thought or expectation of its extinction through the repayment of the principal money borrowed. The funding system, properly speaking, commenced in England shortly after the Revolution, in the year 1688. The expensive foreign wars in which this country was then engaged, joined to the unsettled aspect of political affairs at home, rendered it difficult to raise the necessary supplies within the year. For a few years following the accession of William and Mary, sums were borrowed for short periods, and partially repaid, so that the first transaction which assumed the character of a permanent loan was when, at the establishment of the Bank of England in 1693, its capital, amounting to L.1,200,000, was advanced to the government at an interest of 8 per cent. The first loans obtained on the credit of Parliament were contracted for in the year 1690. In the years immediately following, the public exigencies called for still further advances, and sums were borrowed upon annuities for lives, and for terms of years; the produce of various duties or taxes being mortgaged for the annual payments, but without any view to the redemption of the principal sums borrowed, the legislature resting satisfied with the certainty of the extinction of the debts at the periods fixed, or at the falling in of the nominated lives. In 1706 the national debt amounted to 16 millions. In 1714 it had risen to 54 millions; but in three years later it was reduced to within 48½ millions. In 1717 the first funding of Exchequer bills was effected by the conversion of their amount into perpetual 5 per cent. annuities. The year 1720 is memorable in the annals of British finance, for the passing of the South Sea Act, by which means it was sought to reduce all the public debts under one head of account, at a uniform rate of interest. This scheme, termed the South Sea bubble, and from which no good was derived, may form the subject of a separate article. In the year 1748, at the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, the national debt was increased to 78 millions. But the nation was now in excellent credit; and the interest it paid was reduced in 1757 to 3 per cent.; and thus commenced the account of stock, which has since been continued under the head of 3 per cent. reduced annuities, or 3 per cent. Red. An., as the newspapers contract the term. The termination of the seven years' war in 1763 found the national debt increased to 139 millions. During the continuation of the war with the American colonies, loans were contracted, which added £97,400,000 to the funded debt; so large a floating debt remained unliquidated, that, on the 5th of January 1786, the whole obligations of the government were found to amount to 268 millions, the annual interest of which was £9,512,232.

* Ten or twelve years since, there was a law in existence to prevent the emigration of the working classes.

In the month of March 1786, Mr Pitt brought forward his celebrated plan for the gradual extinction of the national debt by the establishment of a sinking fund. This project turned out a fallacy, for it came to pass that the debt was not bought up by an overplus of taxes, or by additional taxes, but by borrowing money at as dear a rate, if not dearer, than the interest of those sums which were paid off. It was as if a merchant were to try to pay off his debts by discounting fictitious bills, instead of reducing his expenditure. This absurdity in the project of the sinking fund was ultimately discovered, and the scheme in a great measure altered and abandoned. The contest with France during a space of ten years, till the peace of Amiens, added more than 360 millions to the debt, while, during the same period, the sinking fund had re-purchased not quite 50 millions of the capital. Nothing could be effected towards the reduction of this enormous burthen during the short interval of repose, and the scale of expense on which the renewed war was conducted, during thirteen years, occasioned loans to be contracted, and Exchequer bills to be funded, to an amount that added 420 millions of capital to the debt, which, after deducting the sums redeemed by the sinking fund, but including the amount of Exchequer bills outstanding, still amounted to 865 millions, causing an annual charge upon the nation of more than thirty millions. Since 1815, a reduction has been made in the national debt, chiefly, we believe, from allowing a diminished rate of interest. The total amount of capital, funded and unfunded, of the national debt, on the 5th of January 1831, was £840,814,022, the total annual charge in respect of which was £28,349,754.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

THE Convention between France and Great Britain, which we stated to have been so promptly formed at the end of October, has since been published. It proceeds upon the necessity of forcing, by military measures, the accomplishment of the mediatory arrangements dictated by the Five Powers for the separation of Holland and Belgium. Regretting that Russia, Austria, and Prussia, are not prepared to concur with them in these measures, the two Sovereigns agree to the following articles:—

Art. 1. His Majesty the King of the French, and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, will notify to his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, and his Majesty the King of the Belgians, respectively, that their intention is to proceed immediately to the execution of the treaty of the 15th of November 1831, conformably to engagements which they have contracted; and, as a first step towards the accomplishment of this end, their said Majesties will require his Majesty the King of the Netherlands to enter into an engagement by the 2d of November, at the latest, to withdraw, on the 12th of the said month, all his troops from the territories which, by the first and second articles of the said treaty, ought to form the kingdom of Belgium, of which the contracting parties to that treaty have guaranteed the independence and neutrality.

And their said Majesties will also require his Majesty the King of the Belgians to enter into an engagement on the 2d of November of the present year, at the latest, to withdraw, on or before the 12th of the said month of November, his troops from the territories of his Majesty the King of the Netherlands; so that, after the 12th instant, there shall be no Netherland troops within the limits of the kingdom of Belgium, nor any Belgian troops in the territory of the King of the Netherlands. And their Majesties the King of the French and the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland declare, at the same time, to his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, and to his Majesty the King of the Belgians, respectively, that if this requisition to their Majesties is not complied with, they shall proceed, without any farther notice or delay, to the measures which shall appear to them necessary to compel the execution of it.

Art. 2. If the King of the Netherlands refuses to agree to the engagement mentioned in the preceding article, their Majesties the King of the French, and the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, will order an embargo to be immediately put on all the Netherland vessels in the ports of their respective dominions; and they will also order their respective cruisers to stop and bring into their ports all the Netherland vessels which they may meet with at sea; and a French and English squadron combined will be stationed on the coasts of Holland for the more efficacious execution of this measure.

Art. 3. If, on the 15th of November, the Netherland troops shall be still in the Belgian territory, a French corps shall enter Belgium for the purpose of compelling the Netherland troops to evacuate the said territory, it being well understood that the King of the Belgians shall have previously expressed his wish for the entrance of the French troops upon his territory for the purpose above stated.

Art. 4. If the measure pointed out in the preceding article becomes necessary, its object shall be limited to the expulsion of the Netherland troops from the citadel of Antwerp, and the forts and places dependent upon it, and his Majesty the King of the French, in his lively solicitude for the independence of Belgium, as for that of all established governments, expressly undertakes not to occupy any of the fortified places of Belgium by the French troops which shall be employed in the above service; and when the citadel of Antwerp, the forts and places dependent upon it, shall have been evacuated by the Netherland troops, they will be immediately delivered up to the military authorities of the King of the Belgians, and the French troops will immediately retire upon the French territory.

Art. 5. The present Convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged at London within eight days, or sooner if possible.

The Convention is dated October 22.

In terms of this treaty, the two governments, on the 29th October, intimated to the King of Holland that he must evacuate the citadel of Antwerp by November 12th, or that a French and English force would be sent against it. The King of Holland returned an answer on November 2d, refusing to comply with the demand, on the ground that he was not bound to evacuate it till the treaty was ratified—he himself refusing the ratification on the ground that he might obtain better terms from Belgium by keeping the citadel in his own hands. This answer is quite in accordance with the circumstances under which Holland has all along professed to stand regarding the Conference and regarding Belgium. She has never yet allowed the right of the Five Powers, or any two of them, to dictate an arrangement for her separation from Belgium, though always professing herself willing to separate upon terms which shall be satisfactory to herself.

Some days previous to the receipt of the King of Holland's answer, a powerful fleet, composed of French and British vessels, had arrived at Spithead, to be ready to proceed to the Scheldt, in order to enforce the resolution of the two governments. The following is a list of the vessels:—

Donegal	74 guns	Vice-Admiral Sir Pulteney Malcolm.
Talavera	74 guns	Captain Fanshawe.
Rover	18 guns	Captain T. Brown.
Satellite	18 guns	Commander Sir W. Young.
Snake	18 guns	Commander Smart.
Suffren	90 guns	Rear-Admiral Ducrest de Villeneuve.
Melpomene	60 guns	Captain Kendrain.
Medee	44 guns	Captain Rabaudy.
L'Ariane	32 guns	Captain Troude.
Creole	24 guns	Captain Le Roy.
		Captain Dubreuil.

It was also understood that the following additional vessels would speedily join the combined fleet:—The Castor, 36; Vernon, 50; Southampton, 52; the Larne, 18 guns, Captain Sidney Smith; the Conway, 28 guns, Captain Eden; the Volage, 28 guns, Lord Colchester; the Revenge, 76 guns, Captain Mackay; and the French frigates Calypso, 56; and Resolu, 44.

The fleets arrived on the 9th at Deal, after having been temporarily separated by a gale.

On the 6th, it was resolved by his Majesty in Council, that the first step for the coercion of Holland should be an embargo on all Dutch vessels in British ports, or which might be found any where by British vessels. The following is the order to that effect, which appeared in a Supplement to the Gazette of that day:—

At the Court at St James's, the 6th day of November 1832, present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council:

It is this day ordered by his Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, that no ships or vessels belonging to any of his Majesty's subjects be permitted to enter and clear out for any of the ports within the dominions of the King of the Netherlands, until further orders:

And his Majesty is further pleased to order, that a general embargo or stop be made of all ships and vessels whatsoever belonging to the subjects of the King of the Netherlands, now within, or which shall hereafter come into, any of the ports, harbours, or roads within any part of his Majesty's dominions, together with all persons and effects on board such ships and vessels; and that the commanders of his Majesty's ships of war do detain and bring into port all merchant ships and vessels bearing the flag of the Netherlands; but that the utmost care be taken for the preservation of all and every part of the cargoes on board any of the said ships and vessels, so that no damage or embezzlement whatever be sustained; and the commanders of his Majesty's ships of war are hereby instructed to detain and bring into port every ship and vessel accordingly:

And the Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, are to give the necessary directions herein as to them may respectively appertain.

C. C. GREVILLE.

Though this measure is not one of the severest that could be taken for bringing matters to a speedy issue, it contrasts unfortunately with an almost contemporaneous resolution of the Dutch court to put no stoppage upon French and British vessels in the ports of Holland. It is given out as having been the opinion of the King of Holland, "that it would be unjust to retaliate on private individuals the consequence of state quarrels; and that, as an army on land would respect private property, so should combatants in naval warfare carry on their operations with a similar equitable regard to the property of individuals."

The following is the arrangement of the French army, as finally settled to march upon Antwerp on the 15th:—

Advanced guard—the Duke of Orleans—2d light, 1st hussars, 3d lancers.

1st division—Lieutenant-General Sebastiani; 1st brigade—General Harlet, 11th light, 5th of the line. 2d brigade—General Rumigny, 8th and 19th of the line.

2d division—Lieutenant-General Achart; 1st brigade—General Castellane, 8th light and 12th of the line. 2d brigade—General Woïrol, 22d and 39th of the line.

3d division—Lieutenant-General Jamin; 1st brigade—General Gœpfel, 19th light, 18th of the line. 2d brigade—General Georges, 52d and 58th of the line.

4th division—Lieutenant-General Fabre; 1st brigade—General Rapatal, 7th and 25th of the line. 2d brigade—General Dhencourt, 61st and 65th of the line.

Division of General Dejean—1st brigade—General de Rigny, 2d hussars, 1st light infantry. 2d brigade—General Latour Maubourg, 5th and 10th dragoons.

Brigade of General Laurestin—7th and 8th light infantry.

Brigade of General Simonet—4th light infantry, 3d hussars.

Cavalry of Reserve—Division of Lieutenant-General Gentil Saint Alphonse, 1st brigade—General Pellate, 1st cuirassiers. 2d brigade—General Gusler, 9th and 10th cuirassiers.

The 17 regiments of infantry have each three battalions, the 51 battalions amounting to 40,800 men: the 14 cavalry regiments have each four squadrons, the 56 squadrons making 7000 men. Thus, without reckoning the artillery and train, the army of the north amounts to 50,800 fighting men.

The answer of the Plenipotentiaries of Russia to the official communication of the Convention between France and Great Britain, was published in a Tory newspaper of November 2d, and is as follows:—

"The Plenipotentiaries of Russia act in conformity with the express directions of the Emperor, their master, in making the following declaration. The adoption of measures of coercion, which France and Great Britain have resolved to take against Holland, brings the circumstances of the case to that position in which the Plenipotentiaries of Russia, in virtue of the instructions with which they are furnished, and with the tenor of which the Plenipotentiaries of the allied cabinets are not unacquainted, find themselves under the necessity of retiring from the Conference. They will transmit immediately to their court a statement of the important circumstances, which, in altering the character of the pacific mediation in which they were invited to take part, permit them no longer to associate themselves in the labours of their colleagues. In suspending their participation in the Conference, the Plenipotentiaries of Russia await the ulterior determination of their court, founded on the important circumstances which have made this declaration imperative upon them."

The notice taken of the Convention by Prussia is of a still more remarkable nature. A declaration of the King himself has appeared in the Prussian State Gazette, and, after noticing the determination of England and France in respect of Holland, proceeds to say:—

"His Majesty the King, conformably to the declarations that he has made on every occasion, and in concert with Austria and Russia, has caused notice to be given to the governments of England and France that he must refuse to these coercive measures, not only all kind of co-operation, but also his assent; and that, on the contrary, he has resolved to place a corps of observation on the Maese, in order to be ready, on the entrance of a French army into Belgium, to avert the eventual consequences which the intended military operations might have with respect to the tranquillity of Germany and of his Majesty's dominions, and to the general peace."

The Belgian Chambers were opened on Tuesday the 13th ult. by King Leopold, who, after announcing the recognition of Belgium by most of the Powers of Europe, and his recent marriage with the daughter of the King of the French, thus proceeded:—

"After long delays, which, however, have been less prejudicial to the interests of the country than might have been expected, the moment has at length arrived when I have the happiness of responding to the wishes of the Chamber and the nation, by inducing the powers who guarantee the treaty of the 15th of November to assure its execution. The powers were convinced, that if they longer abstained from having recourse to coercive measures, they would place Belgium in the imminent necessity of doing justice to herself; and they did not wish to incur that risk of a general war. Bound by a formal convention, two of them are pledged to commence the immediate evacuation of our territory. The united fleets of France and England restrain the commerce of Holland; and, if these means of coercion be not sufficient, in two days a French army will come, without disturbing the peace of Europe, to prove that the pledges given were not vain words."

On the 20th, the French army, under Marshal Gerard, made its appearance in front of Antwerp, and commenced preparations for the siege. The final summons was to take place on the 27th, of the result of which we will be able to give an account in our next number.

In the meantime, the resolution of the King and people of Holland to hold out against the coercive measures of France and Britain, continues unabated. The dogged enthusiasm of the Dutch nation seems to be in its highest possible energy on the occasion, reminding the historical observer of the days when this extraordinary nation asserted its independence, and maintained its position, against the most powerful states of Europe. The King, in addition to the excellent regular army already in the field, has called out the arriere ban—that is, he has summoned the whole of the men capable of bearing arms to come forth in military array. The following is the order of the day issued by General Chassé, commander of the garrison of Antwerp, in expectation of the appearance of the French army before the citadel. It only breathes the spirit which seems to pervade the whole nation :—

“ Brave brethren in arms!—The moment when old Dutch courage and loyalty are to be put to a new test approaches. Within a few days a French army will appear before these ramparts, in order to compel us, if possible, by force of arms, to surrender this fortress and its dependent forts.

“ Full of confidence in the justice of your cause, and relying upon your well-tryed courage and loyalty for your King and your country, we shall intrepidly await this army.

“ Brethren in arms!—All Netherlands, and even Europe, have their eyes fixed upon you. Let you, collectively and individually, prove that the confidence which our beloved King has reposed in us has not been bestowed on the unworthy; and let us take the unalterable resolution to defend ourselves with manly courage to the last extremity.

(Signed) “ The General Commander-in-chief of the citadel of Antwerp, of its dependent forts, and of his Majesty's navy on the Scheldt,
“ BARON CHASSÉ.”

In this emergency, the city of Antwerp has been completely deserted by its inhabitants, their most valuable furniture deposited in cellars, and firemen prepared to act as well as they can, in extinguishing any conflagration that may arise from the operations of the siege.

The combined fleet of France and Britain arrived off the Dutch coast on the 23d.

FRANCE.

AFTER a series of adventures, which can be likened to nothing but those of Prince Charles Stuart after the battle of Culloden, the Duchess of Berri was seized, on the 7th November, at Nantes. Her capture is understood to have occasioned great embarrassment to the French government. By a law passed some time ago, she or any other member of the Bourbon family found in France may be tried for high treason. As a conviction, however, would place the King in an odious position respecting his kinswoman, he has simply issued a royal ordinance, directing that a draft of a law for disposing of the Duchess of Berri be submitted to the Chambers in the approaching session. The project consists of a resolution that the Duchess shall, without undergoing any form of trial, be banished for life, that her property be confiscated, and that her return to France, or any other member of the dethroned family, be punished with death. Her banker, M. Jauge, was arrested on Thursday at the Bourse of Paris; and M. de Charilles, an ex-prefect, has also been arrested in consequence of some discoveries made in letters found on the Duchess's person.

The manner in which the Duchess's retreat was discovered was quite accidental. She was found concealed in a small closet behind a chimney, the back of which was a large plate of iron which turned round on a pivot, and formed a double but small entrance into the closet. There were only a few feet space in that closet, and it had no window. According to information received by the authorities at Nantes, there were strong reasons to suspect that the Duchess was in the house, where she was in fact found. A strong military force of 1200 men, with double that number of national guards, accompanied by divers gendarmes and policemen, therefore, proceeded at six o'clock in the evening of the 7th Nov., to stop up all the avenues leading to, and approaches of, the house in question. The Mayor of Nantes, and two commissioners of the police, obtained entrance into the house after a good deal of delay, and threats of having its gates forced open. Search was made in every hole and corner of the premises, but, though indications were met at every step that the Duchess was not far off, she was nowhere to be found. Three gendarmes, however, were stationed in each room for the night, and every precaution taken to prevent escape until morning, when a more minute inspection was to be made. The gendarmes in one of the upper rooms, finding the weather extremely cold, procured some wood, and lighted a large fire in the very fire-place which was in front of the closet in which the Duchess and three of her followers were concealed. For eight hours they resisted the heat to the utmost of their power; but, finding themselves at last in danger of being suffocated, they called to the gendarmes to put out the fire immediately; and on this being done, the back of the chimney was opened, and they all crawled out, one after the other, more dead than alive, after the horrid torture they had endured all night. The Duchess immediately declared who she was, and desired one of the gendarmes to go in quest of General d'Erlon, the commander-in-chief of the garrison of Nantes, to whom alone, she said, she would surrender. The General soon came, accompanied by the Prefect, the Mayor, and other functionaries, and the Duchess and her three companions, viz. Mademoiselle Kersabiec, and Messrs de Menars and Guibours, surrendered as prisoners. At ten o'clock on the same morning, they were conveyed to the fortress of Nantes, and their capture was made known by proclamation in that city, at the same time that it was communicated to the French government by telegraph.

The sufferings of the Duchess and her three companions, during the time they were shut up in their hiding-place behind the chimney, must have been extreme. They remained there fourteen hours in a standing posture, during several of which the fire was lighted, and made their situation dreadful. They managed, however, to endure the heat, suffocating as it must have been; but towards morning the smoke began to work into their closet, and this they found impossible to stand for any length of time. They were, therefore, literally smoked out of their hole. The Duchess declared, after coming out, that a part of her person, which had been necessarily made to press against the iron door forming the back part of the fire-place, was absolutely baked.

The object of the Duchess in going to Nantes was to make preparations for the purpose of proceeding to Toulon, where she flattered herself that the great majority of inhabitants were in her interest, and would enable her to become mistress of the place. It was her intention to make a strong position of Toulon, as Don Pedro has done at Oporto; and she had been induced to believe that the whole of Provence, and indeed of the south of France, would speedily declare in favour of her son.

The Duchess has been transferred from the castle of Nantes to the castle of Blaye, near Bordeaux, which had been previously prepared for her reception. Every attention seems to be paid to her convenience and her feelings. The people of Nantes appear to have betrayed no vindictive or revengeful feeling on the occasion of her arrest; and the provincial journals, even of the liberal side, speak with commiseration of her sufferings, and with respect for her courage and rank.

The papers found at the capture of the Duchess of Berri will be most interesting documents. Among them are letters from the Duke of Nassau, the Prince Royal of Prussia, the King of Bavaria, Prince Augustus of Prussia, the King of Saxony, the Duke of Mecklenburgh, and the Elector of Hesse Cassel.

The French journals give the following account of the person—a German Jew named Deutz—who is said to have betrayed the Duchess of Berri to the government, for a bribe of 300,000 francs :—

“ He is aged thirty-one years, and a native of Cologne, where he was educated in the Jewish religion. In 1826 he resided at Rome with his uncle, the celebrated Deutz, Rabbi of that religion. He afterwards became a Catholic, rose to high favour with the heads of the church, and lived a long time upon the pecuniary supplies granted him by Cardinal Albani. In 1831 an individual named Drak, brother-in-law to Deutz, was introduced into the family of Charles the Tenth, as an attendant of the Duke of Bordeaux, and thus afforded Deutz the means of introducing himself to the Duchess of Berri. He soon gained the confidence of the Duchess, who amply rewarded him, and sent him on several delicate missions to foreign courts.”

The King of the French opened the Chambers on the 19th, with a speech containing no announcement or sentiment of particular importance. As his Majesty was proceeding to the Chambers, a pistol was fired at him by an individual of the name of Girovix de St Geniez, who is stated to be a member of one of the Political Unions. The aim of the intending assassin was marred by a young lady, who stood beside him, named Mademoiselle Boury. After firing, he escaped, and has not since been apprehended. It is therefore suspected that the whole affair was a project of the government, to increase the affection of the people towards the King.

SPAIN.

For some years this has been one of the countries in which absolute monarchical rule seemed most triumphant, and most likely to continue so. A few years ago, an attempt was made by a patriotic part of the nation to introduce an admixture of popular government; but the Constitutionalists, as they are called, were put down by the assistance of an army sent by Louis the Eighteenth of France, and, since 1823, the most of them have remained in hopeless exile in Britain and other countries, while Ferdinand the Seventh ruled without control of any kind, except that fatal kind which is sometimes held by a bigoted priesthood.

Of late, however, the King has found reason to become disgusted with his clerical advisers. He has been blessed with no child but a daughter, whom he naturally wishes to become his successor. By the former law of Spain, no female could succeed to the throne, and therefore his heir presumptive was to have been his brother Don Carlos. But the King caused a law to be passed, before his daughter was born, decreeing that females might succeed, and he therefore looks upon the infant princess as his successor. This has not satisfied Don Carlos, who, it seems, is a favourite with the priesthood. He has been intriguing deeply with those old friends of the King to have his right maintained, and for that purpose is supposed to have promised all that they could wish, or that he, being King, could bestow. All this was discovered on the late occasion of the King's illness; and he has accordingly found it necessary, for the security of his daughter's succession, to make friends of all who are not friends of the priests. His wife—a very spirited woman—who for some time has acted as Regent, enters fully and boldly into these views; and the Spanish court has all at once assumed an appearance of the utmost liberality.

The first step was to throw open the universities, for the encouragement of learning, and in order to diffuse that general intelligence, in which the safety of a constitutional government mainly resides. The Queen Regent next (October 15) published an act of pardon towards all the Constitutionalists who had to go into exile nine years ago. None are excepted but a certain number of the members of Cortes who, on a particular emergency, voted the temporary cessation of the King's royal functions, and those who headed armed forces against his sovereignty. This has diffused great joy in Spain, and throughout the liberal party in Europe generally: it promises that Spain will henceforth be the ally of English and French liberalism against the despotic governments of the east, and it cannot fail to take away some of Don Pedro's difficulties in liberalising the government of Portugal. The effort made by the Queen is of such a nature that she must be not only sincere in her resolutions, but prepared to follow them up in a very decisive manner. Already the royal guard has been disbanded, and a national guard appointed. The ministers, and many of the inferior agents of government, have been changed. These measures have encountered strong opposition from the Carlist party, but seem too popular to be resisted. The King and Queen returned from St Ildefonso, where he lay ill, to Madrid, on the 18th of October, and were received in the most affectionate manner. There is some talk of an union between the heiress apparent and the Duke de Montpensier, one of the sons of Louis Philip; an alliance which would certainly tend much to the permanency of a liberal policy in Spain. On the 8th of November, an insurrection of the Carlists was projected to have taken place, but it was discovered, and completely prevented.

PORTUGAL.

It was expected by the army of Don Pedro at Oporto, that the troops of Don Miguel would make an attack on the 26th October, the birth-day of their master. The day, however, passed off without any further hostilities than the throwing of a few shells into the town, by which some women and children were killed. On the 24th, the troops of the reigning Prince made another attack upon the Serra Convent, a very strong post of Don Pedro, in the immediate neighbourhood of Oporto. Their intention having been previously made known to the garrison, through the agency of an old woman who overheard the conversation of two Miguelite officers, and who had a son in the Serra, the whole plan miscarried. It is stated that a party of Miguel's troops came up with arms reversed, as if deserting from their own army, but in reality intending to surprise the garrison, and make room for a larger detachment, when, their secret being betrayed, they were fired on with deadly effect, and put to the rout. The Constitutionalists—so Don Pedro's troops are called—have lately been increasing very fast, in consequence of the large shipments of recruits from Britain: within the last month, at least four thousand must have been added to their number. It appears, however, that they are not in general a very select description of men. Many of them are poor raw lads, totally ignorant at once of the cause in which they are to fight, and of the art of fighting. Others are very vicious characters, the off-scourings of the streets of London and other large cities.

About the beginning of November, the Constitutionalists performed a daring and serviceable exploit, in carrying off 1000 pipes of wine from Villa Nova, which is in possession of Miguel's forces. A fortunate change has been made in the command of the Constitutionalists. The Count Villa Flor, a man of little capacity, has been displaced from the chief command, which has been assumed by Don Pedro himself. The British merchants who reside and carry on their business in Oporto have made several attempts to procure a piece of neutral ground in the neighbourhood, where they and their property may be secure from the hostile proceedings of both parties; but it seems that Don Miguel's troops cannot find any place which they may not themselves require in the course of their operations. It is in the meantime apparent, from the orders given previous to the attack of 29th September, that Don Miguel is resolved, in the event of gaining possession of Oporto, to respect the property of foreigners, however he may dispose of the houses belonging to the Constitutionalists.

On the 8th November, Don Miguel succeeded in putting the mouth of the Douro under blockade, which would seem to indicate that his fleet has the decided superiority of Don Pedro's. No vessel under any flag was thenceforward to be permitted to enter or sail from the Douro, so that Don Pedro's forces must now be considered as closed up in Oporto, without the possibility of receiving any more reinforcements, or the means of escape, in case of that termination of the enterprise being resolved on. On the 14th, a party of the constitutional forces, under Colonel Schwalbach, made a spirited and successful attack upon Villa Nova, silenced a battery, and took about two hundred prisoners, with a loss to themselves of forty-six killed and wounded. As a balance, however, to this victory, very serious discontents have broken out in the army of Don Pedro. Colonel Hodges, who was at the head of the British part of the troops, has resigned, and returned to England, on account of the neglect and calumny with which he found his own efforts and those of his men had been treated. Major Shaw and three other officers were put under arrest on the 12th, probably for the freedom they would naturally assume in speaking of this matter, and were not liberated till the 16th, when Major Shaw was again placed in his command. Upon the whole, though this enterprise cannot be described as desperate, its first and fairest hopes must be said to have entirely failed.

TURKEY.

In consequence of the triumphant and irresistible advance of Mohammed Ali upon Constantinople, the Sultan has been obliged to sue for peace, which, it is expected, will be settled without difficulty.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 20th October contains the following firman, published by Ibrahim Pacha on taking possession of Jerusalem:—"Jerusalem possesses ancient monuments, which are visited by Christians and Jews from all countries. But these pilgrims have cause to complain of the heavy impositions laid upon them on the road. As I am desirous of putting an end to this abuse, I command all Mussulmans of the pachalics of Saide, as well as of the districts of Jerusalem, Tripoli, and all the provinces bordering on the Mediterranean, to suppress all impositions on every road and every place without exception. I also command that the Christian priests attached to the churches in which the gospel is taught, shall in future be exempt from the arbitrary charges to which they have been subject.

We hear from Switzerland that the city of Basle still continues to defy the authority of the Diet, and shows an inclination to involve the whole Canton, and even the whole Confederation, in something very like a civil war.

It is mentioned in accounts from Stockholm, that an obelisk, sixty feet high, has been ordered, and is about to be transported to Upsala, to be erected in honour of Gustavus Adolphus the Great.

A universal famine has for some time prevailed in that once truly delightful and fertile group, the Cape de Verde Islands. Three years have now elapsed since they have been visited with rains in any considerable quantities. The land in the meantime has become parched and unfit for cultivation. The trees and all kinds of vegetation are withering and passing away. Most of the animals on the islands have died from starvation, and it would be difficult to present to the reader an adequate idea of the horrid condition in which the inhabitants are placed.

Accounts from the East Indies state, that at Madras, at the end of June, the market continued abundantly supplied with both French and English goods, and that sales by entire invoices were completely impracticable of every description of articles. Large arrivals of brandy since the previous accounts had rendered both the price lower and the demand less.

The empire of China has been convulsed during the summer by a formidable rebellion among the mountain tribes in the centre of the country. The Honan general had been killed by the rebels, who had taken the city of Keanghwa. The troops sent against them by the Canton government had been surrounded, and attacked at such disadvantage that they were compelled to surrender, and the officers were instantly murdered. The deputy-governor of the province was taken prisoner. The rebels were not expected to proceed farther into the Canton province, but would direct their course northward to Peking. The Viceroy of Canton was collecting his force to proceed against them in person.

Church Dissent in France.—A remarkable incident has taken place in the history of Roman Catholicism. A schism has broken out in the church of France—if there be such an institution—through the active exertions of a priest styled Abbé Chatel, formerly a chaplain in a regiment of guards, and who now draws immense crowds to hear his sermons. The Abbé has taken a bold start, and landed somewhere betwixt the Catholic and Protestant doctrines and practices. The following are the leading tenets of his new religion:—An utter denial of the infallibility of the Pope, or of Bishops in counsel assembled, and an entire separation between spiritual and temporal power—the clergy being at all times subservient to the government de facto. The temporal government is to protect the spiritual authorities, who, independent in their own affairs, are submissive to the "powers that be" in all that relates to their civil duties. Marriages are valid when performed before the civil magistrate, but the nuptial benediction is considered as a Christian duty. All Papal dispensations within the forbidden degrees of relationship are scouted, and the priests are desired to pronounce the benediction, on evidence of the performance of the civil contract being exhibited. The Bible is admitted as the only rule of faith. The seven sacraments are recognised, and the celibacy of the clergy is denounced as "contrary to religion, good morals, and civilization." Fast days and abstinence are abolished—confession is voluntary; and mass is performed, and the sacraments administered in the vulgar tongue. The veneration of saints is kept within bounds; preaching is prescribed to the clergy; and a hierarchy is established, with the Abbé Chatel as primate, and a series of bishops, priests, and deacons under him. The new eglise, or church, has already censured the present government for having permitted the French bishops to wait for the Pope's sanction to pray for Louis Philippe!

Chair of Columbus.—The Philadelphia Gazette says, "There is a curiosity now in port, on board the brig Georgina, which is well worthy the attention of patriots and antiquarians: it is an arm chair which is said to have belonged to Christopher Columbus. It is confidently asserted by the present owner, who obtained it in a very singular manner, to have been possessed by the great discoverer. The chair bears the most conclusive evidence of antiquity; it is curiously fashioned; the bottom and back are of most venerable-looking leather, fantastically tattooed in circles and sprigs, and divers flowery devices. The wood-work also is antique and odd, and the whole appearance of the article bespeaks its transmission from other ages."

ENGLAND.

MOVEMENTS AGAINST THE DUTCH WAR.

WITH the exception of an address from the inhabitants of Rochdale, on the 3d of November, there was no external symptom of dissatisfaction in Britain with the course pursued by Ministers respecting Holland, till the 13th, when a meeting of merchants and others, to the amount of 2000 persons, and in the highest degree respectable, was held in London. This assemblage took place in the City of London Tavern, and the chair was assumed by T. Wilson, Esq. late M. P. for the city. The object of the meeting having been stated by the chairman, Mr T. Baring, in moving the first resolution proposing the address to the King, said the present policy would inflict total ruin upon our trade; and other gentlemen explained the manner in which our manufacturing towns and their population would suffer by these first steps to a war, whose end it is impossible to divine. It was maintained that a trade which annually employed 380,000 tons of shipping ought not to be risked at this juncture, independently of the condition of the revenue, and the ancient alliance between the houses of Brunswick and Nassau; and, as was observed, it was painful to witness two flags, which have waved in political defiance of each other, united in a crusade that might involve this country in irretrievable ruin. Mr Baring adverted to the excuse which was sometimes put forward for Earl Grey, that the negotiation about Belgium was commenced by the Duke of Wellington, and said it ought to be recollected that Earl Grey was brought into power to correct rather than to follow out the errors of the Duke of Wellington. The resolutions were to the effect—1. Expressive of concern at the appointment of a squadron of British ships intended to co-operate with the French force against Holland, and of the embargo laid on Dutch shipping. 2. That the hostilities were unprovoked and unjustifiable. 3. Deprecating war without sufficient motive or justification. And, 4. That such war would be seriously injurious to our shipping, commercial, and manufacturing interest. The 5th resolution was to embody the foregoing in an address to his Majesty to prevent a rupture with Holland as highly prejudicial to the interests of the country.—The meeting was generally considered in the city to have been got up by the Conservative party for the purpose of embarrassing Ministers.

A meeting, composed of similar materials to the above, took place at Edinburgh on the 22d, Mr Trotter, late Lord Provost, in the chair. Most, but not all of the speakers, were Tories. The principal was Mr P. Robertson, advocate, who quoted the following passage of a speech delivered by the Duke of Wellington in the House of Lords, immediately before the end of his administration, to shew that the present warlike measures were by no means contemplated or prepared for by him:—

"There is no doubt whatever that these Five Powers, with whom this treaty was made, and who all signed it with the King of the Netherlands, have claimed to give an opinion upon the future disposition of the country in question. England cannot alone attempt to pacify the parties; nor can France alone, nor, indeed, any other Power in Europe. Whatever is done must be done by the Five Powers in concert with the King of the Netherlands. That concert we have endeavoured to establish with France, and we hope it will peaceably settle all difficulties. I am convinced the noble Lords see that there can be no intention on our part, nor on the part of any Power, to interfere in this arrangement by arms. Our desire is to settle it, if possible, by negotiation, and by negotiation alone. I hope that the negotiations between the different Powers will effect arrangements, as stated in the speech, which will be compatible with the welfare of both parties, in the kingdom of the Netherlands, and conducive to the general safety of Europe."

The following address to the King was carried unanimously, and has since been extensively signed:—

"We, the undersigned bankers, merchants, and others, inhabitants of Edinburgh, Leith, and the vicinity, humbly beg leave to approach your Majesty with feelings of the warmest loyalty and attachment to your Majesty's royal person and house.

"We beg leave humbly to express to your Majesty our deep conviction of the importance of preserving peace in the present state of the country and its finances, and we deem it to be our duty most respectfully, but most earnestly, to deprecate any war not called for by some injury to the interests, insult to the honour, or danger to the independence of the British empire.

"Influenced by these feelings, we view with concern and alarm the commencement of hostilities, undertaken by your Majesty's government, in conjunction with France, against the states of Holland, our ancient and much-valued Protestant ally, as not justified by any apparent cause, and as recognising a principle of armed interference with the affairs of foreign states, inconsistent with the true policy and interest of Great Britain.

"We cannot but consider the hostile measures which have been adopted, and the suspension of our extensive intercourse with Holland, and the great markets of the Rhine, as peculiarly injurious, in their immediate effects, to the commercial, manufacturing, and shipping interests of Great Britain, and as tending to involve this country in the dreadful calamity of a general European war."

After the address had been proposed and carried, Mr Johnston of Straiton, M. P. for the Stirling district of burghs, and who, though a zealous liberal, professes an entire independence on the Ministry, rose up and expressed his cordial concurrence in the object of the meeting. Upon the strength of this solitary circumstance, and in the hope that it may alienate from him the affections of his constituents, a new candidate, Lord Dalmeay, immediately started for that district of burghs.

Meetings entirely similar to the above have taken place in Leeds, Huddersfield, Bristol, Hull, Nottingham, Dudley, and East Kent. In the two first places the object was negated by an overwhelming majority, who passed resolutions approving of the Ministerial measures. It may also be mentioned, that the thanks of the Rotterdam merchants have been transmitted to the gentlemen who met at the City of London Tavern for the purpose of discountenancing the war.

THE ELECTIONS.

WE regret that neither in this nor in the preceding paper, we have been enabled to give any prospective intelligence regarding the coming elections. As the Parliament, however, is expected to be dissolved on the 3d of December, and the elections will take place soon after, we hope to be able to give a succinct view of this subject in our number for January. Meanwhile, the most remarkable canvasses in England are those for the county of Middlesex and the city of Westminster. In the former, Mr Hume, the present (Radical) member, is opposed by Lord Henley, an adherent of the Ministry; and it seems to be fully expected by one party, and dreaded by the other, that the ultra-liberal will lose his election. In Westminster, hitherto represented by Sir Francis Burdett and Sir J. C. Hobhouse, a party of the constituents (who altogether are 18,000 in number) have invited Colonel De Lacy Evans, an independent and ultra-liberal gentleman, to oppose the latter candidate, who, they say, is unfitted any longer to hold his place, by his refusal to pledge himself to the objects they wish, and his being bound up in general by his Ministerial character as Secretary at War. On the other hand, Sir Francis Burdett has announced that he will rather go out with Hobhouse than remain with Evans; and, as the electors have a high esteem for this gentleman, who was an early advocate of liberal measures, there is some doubt whether they may not give way to his desires, and rather take Hobhouse, with all his alleged disadvantages, than please themselves by choosing Evans.

FALLING OF HOUSES.

THE London newspapers of the past month record the accidental falling of a house in Westminster, by which several persons lost their lives. It seems that certain alterations had been making on the building, and that, for want of proper care, the calamity happened. The metropolitan press is loud in lamentation of this misfortune, more especially as it appears to be one which frequently occurs, and, according to The Examiner, is the cause of a serious "waste of human life." It is mentioned that the only functionaries who are immediately called upon to institute inquiries into the state of old buildings, with a view to the public safety, are the churchwardens, and in some cases what is called an annoyance jury, between which bodies the public, it is said, "regularly come to the ground." The editors of more than one London paper which has been indulging in remarks on this great topic of the day are Scotsmen, yet it is curious that not one of them has thought it worth while, or been able, to enlighten the English public as to the manner in which these matters are arranged north of the Tweed. We may mention, that accidents like that under notice seldom or never happen in Scotland. The public safety is most completely and satisfactorily guarded by an institution existing in every royal burgh, called the Guildry, a body composed of nearly all the master masons, carpenters, and other handicraftsmen in the place, presided over by an officer with the title of Dean of Guild. This body has the power of making investigations into the condition of all kinds of buildings within the town, encroachments on thoroughfares, nuisances from common sewers, weights and measures, &c. Before any species of alteration can be made in the exterior walls, or in the internal partitions of any dwelling, before so much as a new window or door can be broken out, this body must be warned of the circumstance; and, having examined the nature of the proposed change by actual observation, a warrant is either given to proceed, or an order to stop, as the case may be. By these means the public generally, and the coterminal proprietors in particular, are effectually secured against damage. These guildries are supported at no expense whatever to the community; they have neither the arrogance nor the indolence of royal commissions; they are themselves the public working solely for the public good; and so useful are they as a branch of the civic establishments of our burghs, that they might with great advantage be copied in every large town in the empire.

SUNDAY TRADING.

A SOCIETY has been formed, under highly respectable auspices, for the prevention of trading on Sunday, which, it seems, has gradually been advancing to a great height in the metropolis, inasmuch as to threaten the extinction of all observance of that day in certain classes of society. It were vain, at this time, if it were desirable, to attempt any thing like a restoration of the puritanical observance of the Sunday: we cannot suppose that any such object is contemplated by the present Society. Some good, however, may surely be done, though the design fall far short of such an object. The simple fact is, that a large proportion of the shops in the outskirts of London and other places are kept open all the earlier part of Sunday, in order to supply the working classes with necessaries, including not only food, but dress. This, in our humble opinion, is a secular evil, and endangers the interest of no class so much as the industrious classes themselves.

selves. The Sunday is the poor man's own day—the single breathing-space he has in the midst of his toils—the only time when he is permitted to seek the health of either body or soul. If he had not that, his life would be a ceaseless and uninterrupted routine of hard work, with probably no higher wages for his seven days than he formerly had for his six. Now, if traders are to be permitted to keep open shop on Sunday, it is but one step further to permit operatives to work! And we can entertain no doubt, seeing to what a height competition is carried in this country, that, let but a few begin, and all the rest would speedily be obliged to follow.

We, therefore, feel disposed to approve very highly of the object of this Society. It has been said by some who think otherwise, Why prevent humble traders from supplying the necessities of the working classes, and permit all kinds of labour which tend to the comforts of the wealthy, such as the operations of cooks, bakers, and domestic servants? But, supposing that labour of this kind cannot well be put down, is that a reason why other kinds, which can be put down, should not be so? The preparation of food, and the yoking of coaches to convey wealthy people to church, are, from their necessity, by no means such infractions of the Sunday as commercial dealings and exchange of money. Moreover, they tend to the very enjoyments which those who differ from us on this point would wish to become more general on Sunday. They should be considered in the same light as the entertainments of tea-gardens, &c., to which the Society, so far as we are aware, has no objection, and which are chiefly enjoyed by the classes beneath those termed wealthy. All Sunday employments whatsoever, which tend to innocent enjoyments and the relaxation of a hard-wrought people, might be preserved, and yet a great deal of Sunday trading might be put down.

The most effectual way to do this is to pay the wages of workmen on Friday. The Sunday is trenchant upon, because the wages are received too late on Saturday to be properly spent that night. Let workmen, however, get their wages on Friday, and their wives would have a whole secular day to spend them, and might do so, also, to far better purpose. They would be able to attend the markets generally held on Saturdays, and buy much country produce at the wholesale instead of the retail prices. [At present they must buy at a certain disadvantage.] The custom, moreover, of spending one jolly evening in the week would probably be broken up by the change of day, and, as the money would be far more at the disposal of the female part of the family, it would, we have no doubt, be upon the whole disposed of to much greater advantage.

Extract of a letter from Mr Richard Lander, dated Isle de Loz, coast of Africa, September 6, 1832, on board the Quorra steamer:—"I write merely to inform you that we arrived here on the 3d instant, all well, and leave for Cape Coast this evening. All the vessels have behaved very well; we have had several tornadoes; the lightning was felt more on board the Quorra than the iron steamer; it remained on our decks, but it merely struck the sides of the latter, and glided off into the water. This will give you an idea that an iron vessel is even safer than one built of wood. On board the Quorra we suffer much from the smell of bilge water, while the iron boat has not made one inch of water since she sailed from Liverpool, and she is never warmer than the water she floats in. The most important part of my work will soon begin, when I hope to send you some very favourable news."

Acquittal of the ex-Mayor of Bristol.—After a trial which lasted seven days, the jury found a verdict of acquittal for Mr Pinney, in the following terms:—"We unanimously find Charles Pinney, late Mayor of the city of Bristol, not guilty. We are also unanimously of opinion, that, circumstanced as he was, menaced and opposed by an infuriated and reckless mob, unsupported by a sufficient force, civil or military—deserted in those quarters in which he might reasonably have expected assistance—the late Mayor of Bristol acted to the best of his judgment with zeal and personal courage." The remaining trials have of course been abandoned.

Lady Caroline Barham, in crossing Margaret Street, Cavendish Square, on Wednesday, October 31, was knocked down and run over by a cabriolet. She died next Saturday, of the consequences of the injuries she had sustained from the accident. On examination of the body, it was found, that besides severe bruises, three of the ribs had been broken. The Inquest Jury found a verdict of manslaughter against the driver—a boy under fifteen years of age—and gave a deodand of £50 against the horse and cabriolet, to mark their sense of the gross impropriety of the owner in having intrusted the vehicle to so young and inexperienced a person. Lady Caroline Barham was only sister to the present and two last Earls of Thanet, and daughter of Sackville, eighth Earl, by Mary, only daughter of Lord John Sackville. She was in her 62d year, and has left three sons and two daughters. Her Ladyship was generally regarded as one of the leaders of the beau monde, and her house in Queen Anne Street was every season the scene of a brilliant succession of entertainments.

A weekly meeting of the creditors of the Duke of York was held on Wednesday, 7th November, at the Thatched House Tavern, at which it was resolved that a memorial should be presented to his Majesty, signed by all the creditors, stating the nature and character of their respective claims, and the manner in which the affairs of his late Royal Highness had been mismanaged.

Lords Stanley and Uxbridge, the Marquis of Tavistock, and Lord Grey, of Groby, the son of the Earl of Stamford, are to be created Peers.

Death of Lord Tenterden.—Lord Tenterden, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, died on Sunday morning, November 4, at his house in Russell Square. His Lordship was in the seventy-first year of his age, and the proximate cause of his death was inflammation in the bowels. The chief law seat in England, thus vacated by a zealous Tory, has been filled by Sir Thomas Denman, late Attorney-General, who has appointed his son, Mr Thomas Denman, his Associate and Marshal. The salary of this great law officer is to be reduced from £10,000 to £8,000 a-year.

Sir W. Horne has been appointed Attorney-General, in room of Sir Thomas Denman; and Mr John Campbell has been nominated Solicitor-General, in room of Sir W. Horne, thus promoted.

Penny Tribute to Ministers.—On Tuesday, November 6, Earl Grey, Lord Althorp, and Lord John Russell, were severally presented, at their respective apartments in Downing Street, by a deputation of forty gentlemen, headed by the Lord Mayor, with a gold cup, the produce of a penny subscription among the people. Upwards of 300,000 persons had contributed to the purchase of these cups, each of which weighs 85 ounces, and holds five pints of wine.

The defence of the Reverend Edward Irving was laid before the Presbytery of Annan on the 7th instant. He avows himself the author of the publications complained of by the Scotch church. The Presbytery have therefore proceeded to put the instructions of the General Assembly of the church in force.

Lord Mayor's Day.—Friday, November 9, being the day for the new Lord Mayor to commence the duties of his office, and for the old one to go out, the morning, according to ancient custom, was ushered in by as gloomy an atmosphere as ever tempted a discontented citizen to fling himself over Blackfriars' Bridge. Nevertheless, there was the usual throng from all parts of the metropolis. The procession was, like all former processions on similar occasions, most gorgeous. The ceremony of swearing in was performed in the Court of Exchequer with the customary forms, after which all returned as they came, the procession being joined in its way back by the Lady Mayoress and several of the invited guests. Guildhall was of course splendidly illuminated, and among the guests were—Earl Grey, Lords Milton, Althorp, Palmerston, John Russell, Henley, &c. The dinner was abundant, but the attendance bad; and a good deal of confusion was observable. The toasts were according to precedent, commencing with "The King and Queen," and proceeding with "Prosperity to the City of London, and its Trade," "The Lord Mayor," who announced that he was "a free-born Briton," and was determined to belong to no party, but to do all that he could to avoid giving offence to man, woman, or child. The health of the late Lord Mayor came next in succession, and this was followed by "His Majesty's Ministers," &c. &c. The festivities in the hall were followed by dancing in the Council Chamber, and nothing was omitted to keep up the charter of civic hospitality.—The gentleman who has thus been installed in the office of Lord Mayor is Sir Peter Lawrie, a Scotsman by birth, and, we believe, a companion in early life of the late Sir Richard Birnie.

Their Majesties went on Saturday, Nov. 10, to Brighton, where they were not merely well, but rapturously received. The Queen has repeatedly walked out since her arrival, and the same heartiness of feeling that welcomed has invariably attended her.

The following list of anticipated English county members has been handed about in the highest quarters. It is calculated up to the 26th October, and supposed to be very nearly if not absolutely correct:—Whigs, 99; Radicals, 5; Tories, 25; Waverers, 15. Ministerial majority on the whole counties, 54. Scotland will, it is believed, furnish 43 Whigs, 2 Radicals, and 8 Tories, being a majority for Ministers of 33. Of Ireland no estimate can yet be made; and the English boroughs are also uncertain, though very few of them will return Tories, and still fewer Waverers.—Spectator.—The same paper states that the number of Conservatives (about a third of them at least may be considered as Ministerialists) that will be chosen into the new Parliament is estimated at 150; the Ministerial list gives only 136. The extreme Radical members will be very few; the independent reformers very many. For all purposes of "the bill" the Ministers will have an overwhelming majority—the greatest, perhaps, that any Ministry ever enjoyed.

IRELAND.

The resistance presented in this country to the payment of tithes has received a severe legal blow in the convictions of various persons for attending anti-tithe meetings. At the Cork assizes, on the 29th October, Mr Hodnett, convicted of such an offence, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, a fine of £100, and to find securities, himself in £500, and two others in £100 each, to keep the peace for seven years.—On the same day, the indictments against two defendants, Kelleher and Quinn, were quashed, because of the prosecutor having sat on the grand jury when the bills were found. In the case of Mr Twiss, a third defendant, the plea of not guilty was withdrawn, on the advice of Mr O'Connell, who, after being long and earnestly longed for, had arrived that day; and a general plea of guilty was entered. The same plea was entered on behalf of Messrs Ronayne, O'Lomasny, and Sheehan.—At Clonmel, on the 2d November, Lord Galmoy, the Rev. Edward Brennan, Catholic curate, Messrs Doheny, John Hackett, proprietor of The Tipperary Free Press, Laffan, Mulcahy, Butler, O'Brien, and Larkin, were arraigned for attending an anti-tithe meeting. The usual interrogatories having been put by the Crown, all the persons accused withdrew their pleas, except the Rev. Mr. Brennan, and Messrs Doheny, Laffan, and Mulcahy. A jury having been sworn, the three last-named individuals were put on their trial, and pleaded not guilty. The Solicitor-General intimated by the court that there was no evidence against the Rev. Mr. Brennan. Mr Sheil defended the other traversers, who were convicted, after a short consultation by the jury.—It is not intended to proceed against Lord Galmoy or the others who have pleaded not guilty, as their acknowledgment of the illegality of their conduct is considered to be sufficient. The government must thus be considered as having gained a temporary and partial victory over the Catholic party in Ireland.

After an investigation of the Carrigeen affair, which took up eleven days, the inquest was on Friday, November 2, brought to a close. The jury brought in the following verdict:—"We find a verdict of wilful murder against Captain Burke, and a party of police under his command, for killing Catherine Foley and Joseph Sinnott, on the 8th of October, about the hour of twelve o'clock, on the lands of Liquidstown, in the parish of Portnascully, barony of Iverk, and county Kilkenny."

In addition to the above triumph, the Catholics have gained another of equal importance, and which has tended to console them so far for their defeat on the anti-tithe question. At the Cork assizes, November 2, Sir George Bingham was tried on a charge of assault and false imprisonment, preferred by Mr Hodnett. Sir George, it appeared, had obstructed the accuser on his way to an anti-tithe meeting, and afterwards put him into prison. The Baronet was found guilty, to the great delight of the multitude, who could not restrain their cheers even in the solemn presence of the judge.

SCOTLAND.

DEATH OF SIR JOHN LESLIE.

This distinguished individual died at his seat of Coates, in Fife, on the 3d ultimo: he had attained the 67th year of his age. Sir John Leslie was a native of Largo, in Fife. He was educated at the University of St Andrews, and had many struggles before reaching the eminent situation he latterly held. He acted at one time as travelling tutor to the sons of Mr Wedgewood, the celebrated potter, and enjoyed a pension of £300 a-year on that account as long as he lived. In 1805, after a severe conflict with the clerical powers of the city, by whom he was objected to on a charge of infidelity, he was appointed Professor of Mathematics in the University of Edinburgh. Here he distinguished himself by some important discoveries, particularly the process of artificial congelation. He was, however, a man of immense general information and high literary powers, in addition to all his acquirements as a philosopher. In 1820, he succeeded the celebrated Playfair as Professor of Natural Philosophy, and some time in the present year he received from his Majesty the honour of a knighthood of the Guelphic order. By an unvarying prudence of conduct, Sir John Leslie is believed to have accumulated about £20,000.

The vacant chair, the emoluments of which are about £700 a-year, has since been offered to Sir J. F. Herschell, but declined. It is generally believed that Sir David Brewster will be next in the choice of the patrons, who are the Magistrates of Edinburgh. The class is in the meantime taught by Mr — Russell, a young but highly promising individual.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

A MEETING of the creditors of the late Sir Walter Scott was held at Edinburgh on Monday the 29th of October, when an offer was made by the family of our illustrious countryman, to pay to the claimants, on the 2d of February next, a sum which, in addition to the funds in the hands of the trustees, and the amount to arise from life insurances, will give nine shillings per pound to all, and this for a discharge. The whole amount to be thus distributed will be about £53,000, which, with former payments to nearly the same extent, and dividends received from other quarters, is equal to the capital sum of the whole ranking against Sir Walter Scott in 1826. The meeting was very numerously attended, and the proposal was adopted without a dissentient voice. And in addition to the resolution accepting the offer, and directing the trustees to see the same carried into effect, the following was moved and carried with a like unanimity:—

"And while the meeting state their anxious wish that every creditor who is not present may adopt the same resolution, they think it a tribute justly due to the memory of Sir Walter Scott, to express, in the strongest manner, their deep sense of his most honourable conduct, and of the unparalleled benefits which they have derived from the extraordinary exertion of his unrivalled talents under misfortunes and difficulties which would have paralysed the exertions of any one else, but in him only further proved the greatness of mind which enabled him to rise superior to them."

In communicating this intelligence to our readers (says the editor of The Courier), we cannot help expressing our gratification, in which we are sure that all will heartily sympathize, that this matter has been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. The conduct of Sir Walter Scott, under the heavy and unexpected trials to which he was exposed, is above all praise, and has been, indeed, a subject of universal admiration. The honourable feelings by which he was actuated in his incessant efforts to pay his debts, could not fail to be duly appreciated by his creditors; and their ready acceptance of the present offer, as a final settlement, is a further proof of their favourable disposition towards him, who, from his exalted genius, as well as his sterling moral worth, has left behind him a name—"Above all Greek, above all Roman fame."

In London, a great association has been formed, including almost all persons distinguished in literature, and the patronage of literature, in the country, for the purpose of devising measures to preserve Ab-

Abbotsford House, as the best monument of the genius of Sir Walter Scott. A committee of this association met on the 9th November, at Bridgewater House, the seat of Lord L. L. Gower, and came to the following resolutions:—

"That a subscription be forthwith entered into for the purpose not only preserving Abbotsford, but of securing its proper maintenance in the family of Sir Walter Scott; that books be prepared for the collection of subscriptions, and sent not only throughout the British dominions, but into every part of the world where one of the books can be lodged; that the books be so prepared as to contain the name, description, &c. of the subscriber; that they be of one uniform size; and that, when the subscription shall be closed, the said books be gathered together, bound up, and deposited amongst the most honourable of the archives of Abbotsford."

A spirited subscription is now in progress in the neighbourhood of Melrose and Abbotsford, for the purpose of erecting a monument to the memory of Sir Walter Scott. It is proposed to build the monument on the top of the Eildon Hills (the Trimontium of the ancients). From the conical peak, 1330 feet above the level of the sea, one of the most picturesque and commanding in the south of Scotland, it will be seen from thirteen counties. A more appropriate site could not be selected, situated in the same parish, and skirting the estate of Abbotsford. From this point the scenery of the Abbot, Monastery, Bride of Lammermoor, St Ronan's Well, Black Dwarf, Guy Mannering, Redgauntlet, and the numerous skirmishes immortalized in the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, can be distinctly traced.

County of Selkirk.—The Justices of the Peace and Clergy of the county of Selkirk, at a meeting recently held, at which Lord Napier presided, agreed to give some suitable mark of respect to the memory of Sir Walter Scott, and nominated a most respectable committee to consider and report whether a pillar, statue, or portrait, would be most appropriate.—Sir Walter, independent of his general claims to admiration and regard, acted for upwards of thirty-two years as Sheriff of the county.

The King has been pleased to express his cordial concurrence in the plan of raising a monument to the memory of Sir Walter Scott, in Edinburgh, and has ordered that his name may be put down for the sum of three hundred pounds. His Majesty has also granted a pension of two hundred a-year to Miss Anne Scott, Sir Walter's unmarried daughter.

Desecration of the Sabbath.—A meeting of the inhabitants of Edinburgh, with the view of concurring in the measures expected to be adopted by Parliament for putting a stop to the desecration of the Sabbath, was held at St Andrew's Church, on Tuesday the 27th, when certain appropriate resolutions were adopted, embracing a petition to Parliament, and an earnest and respectful commendation to the ministers of all denominations throughout the country to impress on their congregations the importance of similar petitions. This meeting was numerous, and its objects praiseworthy; but we again regret, that paying the wages of workmen on Fridays would do more to cure the evil than the exertions of the whole of the clergy in Great Britain, and the Three Estates of the kingdom to boot, especially if accompanied with a rigorous enactment against selling spirituous liquors on Sunday. In the large towns in Scotland, the number of public houses is absolutely disgraceful, and, as they are licensed at a low rate, with the view to raise a revenue to the state, it may be justly said that the legislature in reality sanctions the desecration of the Sabbath.

A Case of Religious Importance.—A matter of dispute as for some time been before the inferior church courts of Edinburgh, relative to the power which any individual metropolitan clergyman, with concurrence of his kirk-session, has of dispensing the sacrament of the Lord's Supper at periods not appointed by the Presbytery, or of uniform with the practice of the other churches in the city. The case of the Rev. Henry Grey and his kirk-session, for dispensing the sacrament four times instead of twice in the year, at the request of a large body of communicants, came before the Synod of Lothian and Tweeddale, on Tuesday the 13th ultimo, when, after a fair debate, the sentence of the Presbytery, condemnatory of the innovation, was reversed by 20 to 12; but Dr Lee, Dr Inglis, and Mr Simpson, protested in name of the Presbytery, and appealed to the ensuing General Assembly. Should the General Assembly affirm the reversal of the Presbytery's decree, a very important victory will be achieved by the evangelical over the moderate party in the church, serviceable to the interests of genuine piety; for it is obvious that the celebration of one of the most holy ordinances which distinguishes our beneficent faith ought, in every instance, to depend on the frame of mind of the recipients, and not on the opinion of any church court, or any inveterate usage whatsoever.

Dr McCrie on Church Establishments.—At a meeting of the Anti-Patrons Society, held at Aberdeen on Tuesday evening, October 30, a letter from the Rev. Dr McCrie of Edinburgh was read on the subjects of patronage and ecclesiastical establishments, from which it appeared that that reverend gentleman was a warm friend of the system of an established church, and only desired the correction of evils in the present Kirk of Scotland, not its overthrow. The Doctor concludes his letter in words similar to those we used in an article on the subject of church establishments in our first number:—"It is now nearly thirty years (says he) since those with whom I was in immediate religious fellowship gave warning of the coming agitation, and I am sorry to say that it was but little regarded by those whom it most nearly concerned. No defence of establishments, how able so ever it may be, will be effective on the public mind, in opposition to felt grievances and undeniable corruptions." (How many thousands of friends to church establishments will cordially assent to this sensible remark!)

Popular Education.—While the education of artisans is advancing in every part of the country, it is gratifying to find that the dissemination of useful knowledge among the middle classes, by means of lectures on scientific subjects, is not neglected. Several gentlemen in Edinburgh have commenced courses of popular lectures on useful and entertaining science, which, being delivered in the evenings, many of the respectable middle classes have an opportunity of attending. The first lecture was given by Mr Combe, on phrenology, in the Clyde Street Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 6th ultimo; and the second lecture, by Dr Murray, on chemistry, in the Waterloo Rooms, on Thursday evening following. On both nights the rooms were crowded to excess, and the lectures gave great satisfaction. The course on geology commenced on the following Wednesday, and it is gratifying to learn that the support met with has exceeded all expectations, tickets having been already sold to the amount of upwards of L.120.—In addition to these useful lectures, Mr Rhind has commenced a course of lectures on natural history, which it is anticipated will prove equally instructive.

Mechanics' Institution.—One of these exceedingly useful institutions has been opened in the town of Peebles, under promising auspices. Several excellent and appropriate lectures on scientific subjects have already been delivered to attentive audiences.

Constitutional Volunteering.—About 600 young men in Glasgow have enrolled themselves into a regiment, under the title of "The Glasgow Constitutional Volunteers," to assist in forwarding the constitutional cause in Portugal. They sailed a few days ago for Oporto.—In London there has been a similar movement relative to the cause of Portugal. The last detachment of a cavalry regiment, composed entirely of English, Irish, and Scotch, discharged cavalry men, amounting to 500 men, have left the city to embark at Woolwich on board a steamer, which proceeded, on Tuesday the 6th ultimo, for Oporto. This regiment is allowed to be as well disciplined as any under the British Crown.

Burgh Reform.—At a meeting of the magistrates of Leith, on Tuesday October 30, a report from a committee, appointed to wait upon the law officers of the Crown on the subject of burgh reform, was read, from which it appears that a general measure of burgh reform will, at an early period, be brought before Parliament, and the law officers of the Crown are in the meantime willing to receive any suggestions or information on the subject from places having peculiar cases to bring forward.

In the course of the past month of November, there has been a good deal of foggy disagreeable weather in different parts of the country, particularly at Glasgow and Edinburgh. On Wednesday and Thursday, the 7th and 8th, the navigation of the river between Glasgow and Greenock was obstructed by a dense fog, which so completely obscured the atmosphere that several accidents took place among the steam-vessels navigating the river.

At Leith and Edinburgh placards have made their appearance on the walls, advertising that recruits are wanted for the naval service.

The Speaker.—As Mr Manners Sutton was travelling through Haddington, on a visit to his relative Mrs Nisbett, at Beil, a crowd of people mistook him for Mr Fergusson of Raith, the reformer; they immediately took the post-horses out of the carriage, and pulled him through the town, notwithstanding the expostulations of Mr Sutton, and his telling them he was "no reformer!"

On Wednesday the 21st ultimo, the house of Avoch, Ross-shire, belonging to the Dowager Lady Mackenzie (widow of the celebrated traveller in North America), but then occupied on lease by another family, was burnt to the ground, part of the furniture alone being saved.

CITY OF EDINBURGH.

The annual account of the finances of the city of Edinburgh has been published in the newspapers, from which it appears that the expenditure, as usual, has been very considerably above the income for the past year. The total payments from October 1831 till October 1832 have been L.64,805, 6s. 10d., while the total receipts have amounted to L.51,143, 5s. 4d., leaving an excess of expenditure of L.13,662, 1s. 5d. At a meeting of the Town Council, held subsequent to the publication of this account, it was stated by the Lord Provost that the assets of the city were much more than equal to pay the debt of the corporation, but that to prevent embarrassment, by creditors demanding payment of the sums they had lent, it was expedient to raise money by selling the feu-duties belonging to the town. This is a fatal announcement. The feu-duties, which amount to about L.9000 annually, are almost the only species of available property which the city possesses to meet an acknowledged debt of L.260,353, 15s. 7d.; besides L.72,000 borrowed on the ale and beer duty, which requires to be paid up in five years, when the duty ceases; as also a large encumbrance on the Leith docks. The feu-duties are likewise nearly all that the life annuitants on the town have to look to for payment of their incomes. The Lord Provost's announcement is nearly equivalent to a declaration of insolvency of the burgh, and appears to be esteemed as such throughout the metropolis.

CHOLERA.

It has pleased Divine Providence to remove so much of the severity of this pestilence during the past month, that we deem it unnecessary to enter into its details.

PREFERMENTS.

The Rev. Dr Dewar, of the Tron Church and parish, Glasgow, has been appointed Principal of the Marischal College, Aberdeen, and has resigned his parochial charge.

On Sunday the 11th ult. the Rev. Robert Morehead, D.D., minister in the Scottish Episcopal Church, preached his farewell sermon in St Paul's Chapel, York Place, Edinburgh, previous to his leaving Scotland to take possession of the living to which he has been recently appointed.

The Kirk Session of Arbroath have elected the Rev. John Cooper, late assistant in the parish of Clackmannan, to the assistantship of the parish of Arbroath, vacant by the translation of the Rev. Mr Doig to Torryburn.

The Earl of Hopetoun has presented the Rev. John Ramsay, A.M. minister of Ormiston, to the church and parish of Gladsuir, vacant by the death of Dr Hamilton, and has also nominated Mr James Bannerman, preacher of the Gospel, to be minister of Ormiston.

The Marquis of Queensberry has been pleased to present the Rev. Robert Gillies, A.M., presently assistant in Brechin, to the church and parish of Caerlaverock.

Mr David Thorburn, preacher, has been presented to the second charge of the parish of South Leith, vacant by the death of the late Dr Robertson.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

During the past month, the accounts from various manufacturing districts have been of the most gratifying description. In various branches of manufacture the trade is increasing in briskness as the winter advances, while the abundance in the land, from the late excellent harvest, has the effect of lowering the price of food both for man and beast. In the manufacture of various woollen fabrics, as stockings, flannels, cloths, and tartan shawls, trade is particularly brisk both in England and Scotland. With regard to tartan shawls, several large orders have been received by Glasgow houses for the supply of the London market, but so great is the home consumption, that they have only been partially executed, although the manufacturers have been employed all summer in preparing for the winter sales. It is said that these articles have found their way into several of the foreign markets, and it is anticipated that large orders will be received from the Continent. The tartan shawl weavers are earning at present from twenty to thirty shillings per week. At Hawick, the manufacturers of goods from lambs' wool are busy. The Sheffield newspapers have reported that the trade of that industrious town is also improving, particularly in the export of goods to America. The country trade, they state, is likewise improving, and that money is more plentiful, and the orders larger. We can with confidence state that almost never was the manufacture of paper for printing so brisk as at this moment among the mills in Mid-Lothian. This branch of manufacture is comparatively new in Scotland, but none has made such rapid advances within these few years. The printing papers made by machinery on the Esks are now esteemed superior to most of those made by English houses. Paper-making is one of the most promising trades in Scotland.

FAIRS AND MARKETS.

The abundance of rural produce now in the country has tended to keep up the value of stock during the past month.

The winter cattle fair at Langhorne took place on the 6th. The weather was favourable, and the show of cattle considerable, especially of stirks and cows; purchasers from Annandale and England were numerous, and the sale brisk. Feeding cows brought good prices.

Paisley Martinmas fair, which took place on Thursday the 8th, was uncommonly well attended, but the show of cattle was inconsiderable.—At Rothbury fair, held on the same day, there was an excellent show of cattle, which met with an unusually brisk sale, at an advance upon Newcastle fair prices. A great many horses were shown, most of which met with purchasers. Upon the whole, it was an excellent fair, a great deal of business having been done at improving prices.

All-Hallow Fair.—This great annual Edinburgh fair commenced on Tuesday the 13th ult., in a field on the west side of the Dean, near Ravelston, about a mile from the city. The weather this year was singularly favourable, and in the afternoon of the day there was a respectable turn-out of the citizens. Business was also pretty brisk. There was, it is reported, a short-coming of cattle, compared to last year, of one-third, principally in large cattle, and the demand for this description did not seem to be so brisk as for that of small and inferior sorts. The former advanced in price about 15 per cent. from that of last year, and the small cattle, from L.3 to L.6, were from 30 to 35 per cent. above the last year's prices, with a very quick demand. The whole was nearly sold off on the first day, a very rare occurrence, for the fair generally lasts three days, and, when a dull market, for the space of a whole week. Fat beasts were not plenty, and those that did appear brought high prices. Indeed, the show of this description of stock was very miserable both in point of quantity and quality, and has been for a long time past, and will continue so until they come off turnips. Coarse and inferior sorts were also in good demand, and sold readily at from 5s. to 6s. 6d. per stone. There was a short supply of sheep in the Grassmarket on Wednesday, and prices on the advance, about 2s. a-head above last market day.

It is proposed to establish a regular weekly market for agricultural produce of all kinds—horses, cattle, sheep, grain, &c.—at Blairgowrie, the increasing trade and importance of which place will greatly favour the proposed institution.

CRIMES.

The criminal prosecution for some time carried on against the person who entitled himself the Honourable Adolphus Frederick Ponsbury, under which high sounding name he had the address to impose on a number of respectable shopkeepers and others in Edinburgh, last year, has been abandoned by the Lord Advocate. The trading classes of Edinburgh have for many years been subject to a regular invasion of individuals of this stamp, at the rate of about once for every twelve months. It is not long ago since a pretended prince, apparently on a northern classic tour, imposed upon the credulity and liberality of a number of the shopkeepers.

The High Court of Justiciary met at Edinburgh on Thursday the 8th, for the first time after the vacation, and was occupied with the trial of several cases of theft, in all of which verdicts of guilty were found, and the prisoners sentenced to various periods of transportation. On Friday several cases of the same nature were gone through, and like punishments awarded. On Monday following, a trial of some interest took place, for an assault made by three colliers on an individual of their own profession in the parish of Monkland, Lanarkshire. Two of the prisoners were sentenced to transportation for life, and the third for fourteen years. On Monday the 19th, the Court sentenced Alex. Hutton, a boy, for shop-breaking, to seven years' transportation.—Thomas Earl Pearce, lately clerk to Edward Curtis & Company, clothiers, Prince's Street, Edinburgh, for theft, breach of trust, and embezzlement, to twelve months' imprisonment.—And David Scott, groom, and George Sinclair, shoemaker, for uttering base coin, to twelve months' imprisonment and hard labour. On Monday the 26th, the Court sentenced William Neilson, charged with picking a poor woman's pocket, aggravated by his being habit and reputed a thief, to fourteen years' transportation; and Margaret McGillivray, accused of stealing a man's hat off his head, and picking his pocket, to seven years' transportation.

Execution at Perth.—John Chisholm, in pursuance of the sentence passed upon him at the late Circuit Court of Justiciary, was on Wednesday, October 31, executed on a scaffold erected outside the wall of the jail, opposite the Greyfriars' burying-ground. Chisholm asserted his innocence of the murder to the last, declaring that he never could bring himself to do so, and had no inducement to commit it. The religious exercises having been gone through, he prayed silently for some minutes; the drop then fell, and he died without a struggle. After remaining suspended the usual time, the body was lowered into the coffin, which had been placed below the scaffold, and immediately interred in the north-west corner of the criminal jail. The multitude assembled to witness the execution was very great, such a spectacle not having been exhibited in Perth since the same day fifteen years ago. Chisholm was a native of Inverness-shire, but for the last forty years has carried on business as a grocer in South Street, Perth. After his first wife's death, he married the unfortunate woman for the murder of whom he has now forfeited his life. He maintained the character of a respectable citizen, but by his neighbours was generally regarded as a man of a harsh and stubborn disposition, possessed of no great share of the milk of human kindness. He was about 76 years of age, and his late wife was much about the same time of life. He has left several members of his family, whose characters are highly respectable.

Execution at Glasgow.—On Wednesday, the 6th ultimo, George Doffy, an Irishman, convicted at the late Circuit Court of the murder of his wife, was executed, in terms of his sentence, in front of the jail at Glasgow. Since his condemnation, Doffy, who was a Roman Catholic, was attended by the clergy of that persuasion. He continued during his confinement to deny having committed the barbarous deed for which he suffered, alleging that his wife had fallen into the fire in a state of intoxication; but he fully confessed his ill usage towards her, and admitted that that might have been remotely the cause of her death. His body was interred in the north court-yard of the prison.

The police establishment of Edinburgh, in its criminal department, is now on so efficient a footing, that there are few depredations on the public in comparison to what was the case some time since. At present the number of prisoners in Bridewell is comparatively small. Nothing perhaps would be of such public service as the institution of a horse night patrol for the roads in the neighbourhood, these being still haunted by rogues and vagabonds, who occasionally waylay and rob the passengers.

It is mentioned in The Birmingham Journal, that there never was a period when Birmingham exhibited fewer instances of the commission of even ordinary crime. For some days the jail was absolutely tenantless.

Daring and Ingenious Robbery.—On Monday the 5th ultimo, Mr John Jennings, a respectable cattle-dealer from Cumberland, who was on his way to Doune market, took up his lodgings for the night in Mrs Brock's inn, Dennyloanhead, where three notorious Irish characters called the same night for a similar purpose, and were accommodated with an apartment on the same floor with that of our traveller. Previous to his going to bed, Mr Jennings carefully deposited his money into his breeches pocket, which he placed under his pillow. During the night the three light-fingered gentry contrived to effect an entrance into Mr Jennings's bedroom, whom they found so closely locked in the arms of Morpheus, that they found no difficulty in securing the prize, leaving the unconscious cattle-dealer minus £165, the whole in £5 notes of a Glasgow bank. Having so well effected their purpose, the next consideration of the thieves was how to get off. The legal mode of egress was denied till it should be ascertained whether or not there was any thing wrong; an altercation ensued, during which one of the party made his way up stairs, and leaped from a window, carrying with him no less than £150 of the booty. The remainder of the money was found on the floor of the bedroom. The other two less fortunate associates were secured and conveyed to Stirling, where they underwent an examination by the Sheriff, and were thereupon committed to jail. They are well known to be regular attenders of all markets, being notorious thimble-men and chain-droppers.

Forged notes of the Greenock Bank have lately been making their appearance at Aberdeen, the style of engraving and appearance being dexterously copied.—A person called James Raney has been seized and committed for trial for issuing forged notes of the Glasgow and Greenock Bank, in Renfrewshire.

Sporting Intelligence.

Archery.—The St Roman's Bowmen of the Border met on the banks of the Tweed, in the neighbourhood of Innerleithen, on Friday the 26th of October, to compete for a prize bow given by the club. The competitors were rather numerous, and, after a very keen and anxious contest, the honour of the day was declared in favour of the Ettrick Shepherd, who beat Mr Stewart of Glenomston by a single shot. A sweepstakes was afterwards shot for, which was also gained in beautiful style by the Old Shepherd. At five o'clock, the bowmen, together with their friends, sat down to an excellent dinner, in Cameron's inn, Innerleithen. During the evening many of Mr Hogg's beautiful songs were sung in excellent style.

The autumn meeting of the Strathearn Coursing Club was held on the 1st and 2d ult. The coursing took place on the usual ground, near the Bridge of Forvie, of the property of A. H. M. Belcher, Esq. of Invermay. The weather being fine on the first day, the club was honoured with the presence of almost all the ladies of the neighbourhood.

The Northern Coursing Club met on the 6th ultimo at Skelbo, Sutherlandshire. Twelve couples of dogs were entered to run for a cup given to the meeting by Mr Dempster of Skibo. The weather was very favourable, and the field mustered numerously. The hares were found strong, ran well, and afforded excellent sport.

We are informed that there has been some excellent hunting this season in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright. Many old foxes and their cubs have been killed in first rate style.

A match at golf was played on Burntsfield Links on Tuesday the 6th ult., between five Lowlanders and five Highlanders, all known crack golfers. The match, which was to play 75 holes, was gained by the Highlanders who numbered no fewer than 29 holes a-head of their antagonists.

Melton Mowbray.—The arrivals at this fashionable place of winter resort include Sir Harry Goodricke, Mr an Lady Elizabeth Norman, Mr Gilmour, Sir James Musgrave, Lord Rokeby, Lord Gardiner, Mr Mahre, the Earl of Harborough, &c. &c. Sir Harry, as usual, takes the lead with his admirable dinner parties, which comprise all that the sportsman or man of taste can desire.

Canine Fancy.—The admirers of canine sports have been all on the alert, and highly amused by their favourite pastime, at Roche's pit. On Monday the 5th, Nere attended by Roche, fought and conquered the Shadwell "Lion," to the astonishment of the spectators. And on Thursday "Old Rumbow" bore off the laurels from "Ratler," after a battle which lasted one hour and twenty minutes. The combatants weighed 17½ lbs. each.

Pitchford Chase.—The Duchess of Kent and Princess Victoria have been regaled with a spectacle which highly delighted them. The Shropshire fox-hounds, under the direction of Sir Edward Smythe, Bart., assembled at Pitchford Hall, and such a field of sportsmen accompanied them as has rarely been seen in Shropshire.

At present that inexhaustible record of English sports, Bell's Life in London, abounds in notices of hunting appointments at places all over the country. Merry time they are for fox-hounds, harriers, and "curs of low degree."

Postscript.

The preparations of the French army for besieging Antwerp are upon a very extensive scale, and promise, in particular, the employment of a vast quantity of shells, and even some new and more destructive engines of the mortar kind, against the citadel. The King of the Netherlands, it is stated, looks with perfect confidence to Russia and Prussia for support, and the latter power is said to contemplate the occupation of Hanover, as a preliminary step towards a general war. The King of Prussia is at present in an insecure state of health, and it is anticipated that, in the event of the Prince Royal speedily acceding, measures against France and England would be more unscrupulously adopted.—The King of the Netherlands has ordered a general fast of his subjects for the 2d of December, being the nineteenth anniversary of his return to his dominions.

M. Dupin has been elected President of the Chamber of Deputies, which is a triumph for the Doctrinaires, or, Ministerial party, who have also succeeded in carrying the selection of seven of their own adherents, and two of M. Dupin's party, to form the committee of nine, which is to prepare the answer to the King's speech. Nothing further has been done respecting the attempt to assassinate Louis Philippe.

It is rumoured that Viscount Goderich, present Secretary for the Colonies, is about to retire from office, and that he is to be succeeded by Mr Stanley, whose place of Secretary for Ireland will then be conferred upon Sir John Cam Hobhouse.

POSITION OF PARTIES.

Since our last publication went forth to the world, a great historical event has taken place. The last Parliament of the old kind—the kind which has assembled in this country for many centuries—has been dissolved; and the first of the reformed order, according to the acts passed in summer, has been chosen by the people. Such a change, it may safely be said, has never before taken place in our constitution, nor one which has so thoroughly awakened the mind of the nation.

At such a period as this, it may be proper in a historical newspaper to attempt something like a delineation of the state of the public mind. If large bodies of men were perfectly stable in their views, the subject might be left, perhaps, to its own best chronicle. But every thing changes, and nothing so quickly, or with such minutely-shaded and almost imperceptible degrees of alteration, as the political sentiments of a nation. It is therefore proper that an attempt should be made to fix down in print, for the use of readers at after times, or, say, for the use of the nation itself next year, the present aspect of general feeling and opinion. Were the nation confronted every now and then with a picture of what was their general mood at the distance of a brief period, they would, in almost every instance, be much surprised: in one case, perhaps, they would wonder at the unaccountable fervour in which they were two years ago; in another, they would be astonished to think that they could have at any time been so servilely tame, or so sluggishly indifferent.

Were a Tory of the right stamp left to describe the state of his party at the present time, he would probably give a very flattering account of it. The true and zealous Tory never desponds: he sees the means of consummate triumph in every little accidental circumstance that is in the remotest degree favourable to his views. He believes, like Charles the First, that his own cause is right, and that it therefore will not be permitted to sink; he never thinks, like King William, that there is a chance in favour of the fullest battalions and the best-directed bullets. Even if he be reluctantly compelled to own that his cause is for the present unprosperous, he plants himself, like a becalmed fisherman, on the gunnel of his boat, and whistles on the wind of reaction, with a fondness of hope, or a patience of despair, that says much, at least, for his constancy of mind. The thorough Tory is, in fact, an enthusiast so liable to the deception of his own best feelings, that he never could have become the subject of such general suspicion and dislike among the people as he now is, but for the unfortunate position in which he was placed by the reform bill, being then compelled, by his abstract theories as to the danger of innovation, and what he thought the proper balance of the three branches of the constitution, to stand up as the defender of all kinds of abuses and anomalies, which the common sense of the people at large had utterly condemned, and which he himself, perhaps, wished anywhere but where they were. In reality, the Tory party are a band of politicians who have no chance at an ordinary time. As forming a government of defence against anarchy, when the public mind is disposed accordingly, they may be said to find their proper position. But when the people are in no fear of anarchy, and a Ministry of a liberal complexion is at the head of affairs, with the Monarch going fully along with it, the Tories, as a band of statesmen, cannot be expected to have any extended influence among the King's subjects: their system is, for the time, in the condition of an exploded dogma in philosophy. Such is the present condition of a party, which, in more favourable circumstances, has been in the highest degree popular, though, with the proverbial inconstancy of state affairs, it has now hardly a friend among the people to take its part. It is all in vain that they contend against these disadvantages. When the people are seen to be so spited against them, as even to approve of what they would not otherwise, perhaps, approve of, in their opponents, merely to prevent the Tories from having the least grain of triumph; when they are seen to reject the highest statesman-like qualifications, if accompanied by the unfortunate stigma of opposition to the reform bill, and adopt, in preference, for their representatives, men who have as yet shown no merit but a favour for that measure; when they are further seen, in some cases, to forget entirely the gratitude of 1829, for the concession of the Catholic claims and other liberal acts, in favour of the gratitude of 1832, for a measure larger in degree, but hardly superior in character; all of the party who have any reflection ought to abandon the cause as hopeless, and only to be made worse by all efforts to the contrary. The Tory party are, for the time, completely prostrated—hardly left with a representation in the House of Commons—possessing only the shadow of power in any other quarter—held, in short, in as much odium and disgrace as if they were a set of dethroned tyrants, and not (what they are in fact) a party of which, less than three years ago, one large portion were in a more conceding position than even the present Whigs, while the other, and the smaller, acted as an opposition, and were, finally, by alliance with a more natural kind of opponents, the cause of their overthrow. Time alone, and the changes which time produces, can be expected to efface, in any considerable degree, the marks of public disapprobation which have been so emphatically fixed upon every thing bearing the name of Toryism.

On the other hand, the party of statesmen termed Whigs must be considered as at the very height of the political wheel of fortune. Their constancy of principle during a long period, when liberal principle was more laudable, abstractly, than it was practically safe, and their having ultimately carried their principles, and especially the measure of Parliamentary reform, into practice, have obtained for them a meed of grateful feeling from the people, sufficient, and more than sufficient, to atone for all their former depression and despair. The natural disposition of the people to give their suffrages to those men who enabled them to have suffrages to give, along with a pretty general feeling of favour, among the middle classes, for the juste milieu or moderate liberalism which the Ministry profess, has sent them a House of Commons, which, it is to be feared, has too little admixture of any thing like an Opposition. All this is so unlike any thing that ever before took place, that it is hardly possible to foretell what may be the result. The Tories have all along believed that the Whigs would be obliged, by a reformed House of Commons, to go on reforming and reforming, till they plunged the country into ruin. But this evidently proceeds upon mistaken views. The Tories, in forming such a supposition, have strangely overlooked their favourite principle of reaction. It is already probable from the elections, that, though further minor reforms will be considered and adjusted, there can hardly be such an impulse of liberalism behind as to push the Parliament into any extreme or dangerous measures. The Radicals have acquired very little more representation in the new Parliament than they had in the old.

The people, in general, that is, the middle classes, who are almost every where the electors, have chosen men, no doubt, of liberal views, and who were friendly to the reform bill, but not men who have habitually less fear, as the Radicals have, of the elision of an abuse, than of its being permitted to continue. The system of pledges, it may be remarked, has in very few cases been enforced—though it seems to be beyond dispute, that, if the electors contemplate any measure which has been long argued, and is generally understood, they are rationally and constitutionally entitled to take their representative bound under a general promise on the subject; it being something like mockery to say of certain questions, that they must still further be considered. Now, if the class which the reform bill has satisfied, thus use their power of nomination, there seems little chance of the class who remain dissatisfied producing anything like that influence upon Parliament which the mass of an unrepresented people brought to bear on the last. The best of that strength, by which we mean the middle ranks of the community, has been placed in a state of contentment and indifference, leaving the lowest and least influential class in a state approaching to impotency; the Parliament has seven clear years of existence, or the tenure of the King's will or life, to hold by, and is not likely to be very subservient even to the body of its electors, far less to those who have nothing to say. The Radicals, therefore, however just or well-argued their views, however good their intentions, are likely to be placed very soon, if they are not so already, in much the same state of discontent with the Tories; and though there may still be a very general wish to see certain matters of church and state put upon a better footing, still we apprehend, judging from the way the elections have gone, that there will be a sufficient mass of conservative feeling, taking every man's portion into account, to give all subsequent reforms a very cautious and gentle character.

Upon the whole, the estimate which we have been enabled to make of the present state of parties, is justified by what is generally observed in life. Nothing that is vehement, or rapid, or ardent, ever long continues so. The natural state of things seems to be moderation. There may be many vacillations between the two extremes, but the pendulum always settles at last. The Radicals, who are perhaps the sincerest and most straight-forward of all politicians, exclaim, "Why moderation?—would you be moderate in desiring a cure for a severe disorder?—would you think it safest to be only cured to a certain extent?" But if mankind in general be so disposed, all argument of that kind will be unavailing. Now, we think it quite obvious, that the great bulk of the people, including almost all who have any thing to lose, are naturally moderate and cautious, many even being so to such an extent that they would be almost afraid to want the evils they feel most directly pressing upon them. The very existence of such Ministries as those of France and England is a proof of the general timidity of those liberal nations; a timidity, moreover, only apt to be increased by any extra urgency which the more zealous reformers might exemplify. In a country where there is so much knowledge, so much private virtue, so much mutual kindness among men, as in Great Britain, it is not likely that a dangerous policy, or one likely to lead to civil convulsion, can ever receive encouragement; and though the Radical party may be most unjustly suspected of a tendency to such conclusions, the suspicion alone—the bare apprehension—is enough to keep them down, and to cause a proportionate degree of conservative feeling to arise.

THE CURRENCY.

WE proceed to follow up this subject, by an account of the Principles of Exchange, or the Premium for Transfer of Money.

It is not because money is abundant here, or scarce in France, that there is a premium or reward for transmitting to France, but because at that particular time, more money is required to be paid in France from England, than from France to England; nor is it because money is more valuable in England, that there is a premium for transmitting to it, from almost every other country, but because more money is required to be paid in ENGLAND by those countries, than from England to them. It is, therefore, in general agreeable, rather to have the exchange in favour of a country than against it, because the flowing in of money indicates the liberal purchase of labour or property; but it has no reference to the plenty or scarcity of money in either country, or to the value of their circulation. A country may have occasion to export money, when it is by no means abundant, or consequently depreciated, but, on the contrary, scarce and valuable for every purpose; for it may have to export for debts (rents or interests, for example), or for goods, or articles of subsistence, or even of luxury. The first is the situation of many poor countries in reference to us; and the second may be our situation, if we borrow largely, encourage our citizens to reside in great numbers abroad, or allow the free admission of foreign industry.

Thus, the exchange with England is always against Scotland; not because circulation is more abundant in Scotland than in England, or of less value, but because Scotland, for rents and taxes, and many species of goods, has constantly more to pay in England than to receive from it; in short, is materially nourishing it. Ireland is in the same situation. It must send to England the pigs and cows that should feed its people, to pay for rents and manufactures; and the exchange will be more against it, in proportion as it is less active in manufactures than Scotland is. In like manner, the exchange between England and the Brazils, and South America generally, is constantly against those countries and in favour of England; not because their circulation is excessive or low in value—for it is the reverse—but because they are deeply indebted to England, and constantly requiring to send to it more than they have to send.

Precisely, also, in the same manner, the exchange is almost always in favour of Great Britain with every country, because Great Britain is the most industrious of states; and from being the entrepôt of the produce of its colonies, has the greatest variety of products to offer of any country in the world. These are evidences, therefore, that it is not a scarce and enhanced circulation that turns the exchange in favour of a country, but the simple fact, that more money is required to be paid to that country than from it.

In consequence of this very simple, and, it would seem, obvious fact, the exchange may be in favour of a country with ninety-nine states, and greatly against it with the hundredth, if from that hundredth it requires, or fancies it requires, to purchase more than is purchased from it. Should we determine, for example, to take our silks exclusively from France, and, above all, import corn from Poland, instead of manufacturing both at home, we should speedily find the exchange against us with those countries, with whatever other countries they might be in our favour. This is a true difference of exchange, and from distinct causes—what our ancestors, properly, termed the Balance of Trade. But it is ridiculous to say that the effect thus produced is to be attributed to the fullness of our circulation, or to be cured by restricting it. That, on the contrary, only cramps our industry, and aggravates our misery.

We see, therefore, that circulation, though most indispensable to all the functions of the body politic, as it is to the natural body, is yet not strength, but the means of strength; and as blood, which is the circulation of the natural body, can be formed from various substances, so, and precisely with the same effect, can the circulation of the body politic; and it further happens, that in the one as well as the other, it may better be made from substances that are unexpensive, than from those that are expensive.

Some people would insist that bankers should be the mere custodians of gold; but in that case the banker must be paid for his trouble. If he must keep gold beside him to answer all demands, though he might make a living, he could only have half interest for his capital, for he must always have a supply beside him to accommodate the public, and nothing to indemnify him; and if every one had gold and silver for his purposes, then gold and silver would soon become of little value. The use of a bank is, to economize capital, by receiving any surplus from any hand, and lending it out where wanted. It in this manner not only economizes capital, by making almost every particle available, but wonderfully sustains its value, by keeping down its amount. If credit is added to capital, through a circulation in paper, the economy is increased, and the power of sustaining its value is perfected. By introducing a cheap and native substitute for the foreign and expensive articles of gold and silver, by occasionally adding credit to capital, and, the purpose being served, again absorbing the temporary increase, banking, as it is known in Scotland, has given to the circulating medium and power of exchange, a faculty of expanding or contracting with occasion, and, consequently, of retaining a mean value, in the last degree important in an active and accumulating state; and all consistent, or capable of being made consistent, with the most perfect safety. It has rendered the credit of the country, proceeding on fixed and floating property, equal to actual currency; and so has not only increased prodigiously the power of enterprise, without occasioning a sacrifice of property in the first instance to obtain the means, but also without swelling the mass of the circulation, so as to destroy its value in the end. Every one considering the subject must see, that these are great, and almost inestimable powers; and that, properly regulated, they are capable of leading to the greatest wealth, without producing any of the bad effects of great wealth, namely, depreciating the abounding subjects; for while the banker's obligation remains in the field while wanted, and, though put there for little, performs all the purposes of gold and silver, the moment it is not wanted it ceases to exist; it cannot overabound; it returns to its source; and neither depreciates the currency of which, while wanted, it made part, nor occasions any loss when it retires, for it embodied no actual value; it only represented value. In short, by bringing all the surplus circulation of a state in common, and by adding, on occasion, or substituting generally, credit for actual currency, and, by the facility of contraction inherent in that species of currency, banking, as it is now known, has not only given to currency the utmost economy and the utmost power, but it has corrected a defect inseparable from the exclusive use of a metallic currency, that of losing power, exactly as it increases in amount. To return us, therefore, to ACTUAL CURRENCY, as it is termed, that is, a circulation wholly consisting of the precious metals, would not only be impracticable, but even the attempt would be the most powerful measure that could be devised for retarding, embarrassing, and permanently impoverishing the state.

This, therefore, is the conclusion: With undoubted security for banks, a circulation of paper is as sure as if in gold, and certainly much more economical and convenient. We should never propose, that, after a very large quantity of coin has been provided, at much expense to the country, and with many sacrifices to individuals, that coin should be unnecessarily relinquished, and the country again exposed to the consequences of those frenzied panics for which it is equally impossible to account or to find excuse. Confidence is of the utmost consequence in a country; and it would be improper to relinquish the grounds of confidence that have been purchased so dearly. But we cannot but say, in consistency with truth, that the large importations of bullion that have latterly been called for, and its conversion into coin, are equally unphilosophical and useless, and, in connection with the sudden cessation of the demand for the necessities of war, have led to all the difficulties that have long afflicted this country.

Foreign News.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

In our last paper, we left the French army making preparations for the siege of Antwerp, and the Belgian Chamber of Deputies commencing its sittings, after having heard King Leopold's speech.

The first remarkable incident in the progress of events in Belgium, was a defeat sustained by the Ministers of Leopold, on the motion for the address to the Crown. The debate terminated on the 26th November, when an amendment was carried, on an amendment which conveyed a direct censure on the Ministers. The amendment which was carried implied a censure for their having complied with the demand of the Conference to deliver up Venloo, Limburg, and part of Luxemburg, to Holland, on condition that Holland should deliver up the citadel of Antwerp. It was only by a majority of 2, in a house of 86 (the majority including 3 Ministers, moreover), that even this gentler censure was substituted for the more severe. The consequence was, that the Ministers immediately tendered their resignation, which, however, was not accepted by his Majesty. This conduct on the part of the Belgians arises from exactly the same feelings as that which is so generally reprehended in the Dutch; and the liberal papers in this country have been so indignant at it, as to call in question the right of the Deputies to interfere with the Executive—one of the most fundamental principles, it is superfluous to remark, in the constitution of a liberalised state.

This conduct on the part of the Belgians—for it must be considered as indicating the spirit of the nation at large—is supposed to have arisen in some measure from a jealousy of the French army which had come to put them in possession of Antwerp. A difficulty of a very important character arose at the very commencement of operations before that fortress. The French wished to enter the town, and make use of the batteries which had been erected there by the Belgians, by which they would have been able to reduce the citadel in a few days, with little loss of men. But, as Chassé, in that event, would have fired upon and destroyed the city, the Belgians desired that the French should attack the fort from the side towards the country, by which there would be no excuse left for injuring the city. After some hesitation, and a communication on the subject with Paris, Marshal Gerard agreed to expose his army on the open field and commence what could not fail to be a comparatively protracted siege. His summons was sent in the fort, November 30, and was as follows:—

Summons made in the name of France and England, Marshal Gerard, Commander-in-Chief of the French army, to General Chassé, Commander of the Citadel of Antwerp.

“Head-Quarters of Borgenhout, under Antwerp November 30, 1832.

“Arrived before the citadel of Antwerp, at the head of the French army, with instructions from my government to reclaim the execution of the treaty of the 11th of November 1831, which guaranteed to his Majesty the King of the Belgians the possession of this fortress, well as the forts dependent on it, on both sides of the Scheldt—I hope to find you disposed to acknowledge the justice of this demand. If, contrary to my expectations, it should be otherwise, I am commanded to inform you that I must employ those means which are at my disposal to occupy the said citadel.

“The operations of the siege will be directed to the exterior fronts of the citadel; and, notwithstanding the weakness of the fortifications on the side of the city, as the shelter afforded me by the houses, offer every advantage for the attack, I shall not profit by it. I have therefore, every right to hope, conformable to the laws of war, and to customs constantly observed, that you will abstain from all kinds of hostilities against the city. I shall cause to be occupied a portion of it, from the motive of being prepared for anything that may expose it to the fire of your artillery. A bombardment would be an act of useless barbarity, and a calamity for the commerce of all nations.

“If, notwithstanding these considerations, you should fire on the city, France and England will exact an equivalent indemnity for the damages caused by the fire from the citadel and its forts, as well as from the ships of war. It is impossible for you not to foresee that in this case you will be personally responsible for the violation of custom respected by all civilized nations, and the disasters which may result from it. I await your answer, and am persuaded that you will see the propriety of immediately entering into negotiations with me, for the purpose of putting the citadel of Antwerp, and its dependent fort into my possession.

(Signed) “COUNT GERARD,

“Commander of the Army of the North

Answer of General Chassé to the Summons of Marshal Gerard.

“Citadel of Antwerp, Nov. 30.

“M. LE MARSHAL.—In reply to your summons, which I have just received, I have to inform you, M. le Marshal, that I shall not yield the citadel of Antwerp until I have exhausted all the means of defence within my reach.

“I consider the city of Antwerp as neuter as long as the exterior works depending thereon, the fire of which can be directed against the citadel and the Tete de Flakkers, comprising therein the forts of Burcht, Zwynendrecht and Austreweel, as well as the flotilla stationed in the Scheldt before Antwerp. It is of itself understood, that the free communication of the Scheldt with Holland, that has taken place up to the present, is not to be interrupted. I learn with surprise, that while your Excellency opens negotiations, there has been a commencement of hostilities by works of attack to the southward, under the fire of our cannons, as to which I have the honour to inform you, that if at mid-day there be not a stop put to those works, I shall find myself under the necessity of preventing them by force.

“Accept, I beg you, M. le Marshal, the assurance of my high consideration.

“The General of Infantry,
“BARON CHASSÉ.”

Another interchange of correspondence took place on the same day between Gerard and Chassé, relating to the free communication of the Scheldt, which the former objected to as equivalent to “besieging without a blockade,” and to certain hostilities which he already commenced between the besiegers and the besieged. The French had begun, on the evening of the 29th, to open trenches, and Chassé, in conformity with his threat, fired next morning at the men who were working at them. Dropping shots continued to be fired during the day, by which a few individuals suffered, but which did not in any degree impede the progress of the besieging force. A battery was speedily completed in a garden between Fort Montebello and the Lunette St Laurent, the latter being a point in the citadel against which the besiegers had resolved to direct a considerable portion of their force. Seven thousand men were set to work on the batteries, and the dint of great exertion, nineteen were nearly completed on the 3d of December. The labour was of the severest and most disagreeable kind, many of the men working up to their knees in water; but, to the surprise, very little annoyance was experienced from the citadel, the protectors of which seemed inclined to wait till all should be ready on the part of the enemy before commencing the operations of defence. During the nights of the 30th Nov., and 1st and 2d Dec., the garrison fired shells at the rate of about thirty a hour. There was a sortie of a few troops on the morning of Sunday, December 2d, chiefly for the purpose of taking a peep at the besiegers' works. It was driven back at the point of the bayonet, the muskets of the French being so wet that they would not fire. A Dutch sergeant and ten men, who had been wounded, were made prisoners, and twelve men were killed. The French lost three men; and five were wounded.

and two made prisoners. A second sortie, which led to nothing, took place at night. On Tuesday, December 4th, every preparation being at length completed, the French commenced firing from thirteen out of their sixteen batteries, nine of them being mounted with guns, and four with mortars. The fire was, it may be supposed, from the vivacious impatience of the people, and from their skill and discipline, of a muchelier kind than had up to that time been displayed by the enemy, and it was proportionally effective. The tire number of guns and mortars which were in action on the 4th and 5th, was estimated at eighty-six, sixty of the former and twenty-two of the latter; other account made the numbers eighty-seven guns and forty-four mortars. On the latter day, the firing from the citadel became a good deal more brisk than before.

On Thursday, the 6th, the French had pushed their works close to the covered way of Fort St Laurent, the guns of which were then dismounted, and a very severe firing was carried on all that day between the two parties, the French shells repeatedly setting fire to the buildings within the citadel. The firing was continued with equal vivacity on both sides during the 7th and 8th, by which time the French were stated to have had only 100 men put hors-de-combat (killed, wounded, and sick), notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, and the exposure of the army on the bare ground, where many have to pass the night without either couch or covering.

On Saturday, the 8th, seven Dutch soldiers on a hidden issued from the citadel, with a view to signalise themselves by exchanging shots with their opponents. The whole of the little party instantly fell by the French fire. Six were killed on the spot, and the seventh died before he could be removed to the hospital.

The first parallel had been formed, at the commencement of operations, within four hundred and fifty yards of the citadel, and a zig-zag pushed forward from it within musket-range. A third parallel towards the bastion Toledo was now commenced, for the purpose of erecting breaching batteries. In these new operations, the besiegers were much galled by musketry from the garrison. The King of the Belgians, who had come to Antwerp some days before, visited the whole of the works on the 9th, and seeing a poor wapper carried away wounded, spoke to him, and concluded by giving him a cross of merit from his own breast. The Duke of Orleans, eldest son of the King of the French, visiting the trenches about the same time, observed a soldier stoop to avoid some balls which he heard whistling past him: the Duke immediately advanced into the midst of the men, saying, "Make yourselves easy, my friends; the Dutch are too high—you see I am taller than you, and their balls do not touch me."

According to a calculation, of which we have no means of testing the accuracy, the number of balls discharged by the besiegers between the 4th and 8th December, was as follows:—

From the 4th to the 5th,	1149 bullets of 24lb.
	630 ditto of 16lb.
	950 howitzers and 766 bombs.
5th to the 6th,	1235 bullets of 24lb.
	626 ditto of 16lb.
	969 howitzers and 723 bombs.
6th to the 7th,	1515 bullets of 24lb.
	752 ditto of 16lb.
	1043 howitzers and 835 bombs.
7th to the 8th,	574 bullets of 24lb.
	511 ditto of 16lb.
	655 howitzers and 536 bombs.
In the whole,	4473 shot of 24lb., 2519 of 16lb., 3617 howitzers, and 2860 bombs; making, in actual weight of metal, above 477,000lb.

On the 12th, after an almost incessant bombardment of nine days, the citadel was inspected from a distance by a correspondent of one of the London papers, who thus described it:—

"The appearance of the citadel, at which I gazed during an hour and a half this evening, is hideous—its buildings in ruins; its parapets and embrasures torn; its fire nearly extinct; not a creature passing within it, while the French bombs continued to shower upon it. The defence, which was hitherto so decided, seemed to relax. Scarcely a cannon was fired off in it, but a considerable fusillade was kept up from the right flank of the bastion Fernando. Judging from the direction of this musketry, it would appear that the works of the French approach near to the counterscarp of the left flank of the demilune, between the bastions Toledo and Pacietto. The French bombardment from Fort Montebello, and one or two batteries near it, was incessant. This continual fire, which is now as resolute as ever, is, as it appears, one of the proceedings of a regular siege; and has for its object to prevent the besieged from all attempts at new constructions in the citadel, and also to protect the workmen in the trenches. The French engineers are amused with the siege, which they say is but an easy practical lesson, in which they can take their own time."

On the evening of the 12th, a French miner, who worked in the trenches, met his death in a frightful manner. A howitzer discharged from the citadel fell in the parallel. The workmen immediately fell on their faces, to avoid its effects as much as possible. One of the soldiers, however, wishing to prevent the loss which he saw must follow its bursting, threw himself down upon it to extinguish the fusee, but was too late! The shell burst at the instant, and tore him to atoms; but he alone was the victim of this act of courage and humanity.

By far the most remarkable event in the siege was the taking of Fort St Laurent, which took place on the morning of the 14th. The mode determined on for accomplishing this object, was to place a mine in the flank of the lunette.

On the 10th, a raft was constructed under the blindage near the fosse. During the night, fourteen workmen of the engineers, led by an officer, crossed the fosse, and, fastening themselves to the left flank of the fort near the saillant, they remained there five hours, during which every means that art could suggest produced no other effect than that of removing two bricks. Though almost despairing of this plan, they renewed the attempt next evening at six o'clock, still unobserved by the besieged, who, however, could not direct their fire at this part of the works, and whose attention was distracted by the designedly brisk fire of the besiegers, who, on this evening, it is said, expended 77,000 cartridges. After working hard for several hours, and employing petards, or small exploding shells, to facilitate their operations, the men at length succeeded in destroying a coating of brick and a thick layer of cement, which enabled the miners to commence the necessary excavation. It was not till the 13th that a large enough chamber was formed for containing the powder; and all this time the besieged continued in ignorance of what was going on—unless it be true that the officer commanding in the lunette sent to General Chassé to communicate his suspicions, and was answered that he must be mistaken. As already mentioned, the explosion took place on the morning of the 14th. A quarter of an hour after, three companies of the flower of the 69th regiment, destined for the honourable duty of mounting the breach, approached the place d'armée of the lunette. At the same moment, the 29th grenadiers and a company of voltigeurs, destined to assault the gorge of the lunette, advanced—the first for the right, the second for the left side of this work. The grenadiers, after having passed the fosse on the fascines which had been laid for them, formed a platoon at the foot of the breach, and, at the same instant, commenced the escalade in the most intrepid manner, advancing with fixed bayonets. Having reached the parapet, they found the garrison in order of battle on the bastion of the lunette. At the sight of the grenadiers, the Dutch lost all confidence, and, without striking a blow, or offering even the slightest resistance, threw down their arms. The officer who commanded them then advanced towards M. Richepaise, commander of the staff-battalion, which headed the first grenadiers that mounted the breach, and addressed him in these words—"Sir, do with me as you think proper; but, pray, pardon my men." A cry was instantly heard from the French—"We bear not arms against those who surrender themselves." The officer sent his sword to the garrison, and was made prisoner. The garrison had been composed of 108 men, with a first and second lieutenant; but 47 of these had retired before the first explosion. Of the French force, only two men are said to have fallen in the operation of storming this important outwork.

The besiegers lost no time in converting the ruined fort into a battery; and it was expected that it would be of material service in facilitating the operations directed against the bastion of Toledo, which now became the principal object of attack. The lunette, however, did not prove of so much value as was expected. On the 18th, the French, being elated over much by their success, General Haxo found it necessary, in order to prevent discontent among his men, to make an assault upon the half-moon covering the bastion of Toledo, by throwing a bridge of fascines across the ditch. The attempt was repelled, with the loss of forty-six men. Immediate operations, however, were commenced to fortify and erect breaching batteries in the captured fort, with the view of battering the opposing bastion, which was justly reckoned a point of much importance, as it communicated both with the only other bastion which the besiegers could operate against, and with the citadel itself. Nothing was done, however, till the forenoon of the 21st, when, General Chassé having rejected another summons to surrender, the batteries began to play, but were responded to with such tremendous energy, that they were soon silenced, and were unable to renew their breaching fire till next morning. On that day (Saturday the 22d) the contest was renewed with redoubled vigour, and the besiegers and besieged seemed both aware that the crisis of the strife was now approaching. An immense piece of ordnance, denominated the "Monster-mortar," and calculated, it is said, to throw 1000 lb. weight of metal at once, was this day brought into play by the French, being erected behind the Fort Montebello. It was found, however, more likely to prove destructive to its workers than their foes, and it was laid aside. The battering guns, however, did immense execution (the outer walls of the bastion being found of much softer materials than was anticipated), although with heavy loss of lives to the besiegers—a major of artillery, and three officers of the line, being amongst the slain.

SURRENDER OF THE CITADEL.

Sunday, Dec. 23.—The final and impending result of the siege now became so apparent, and further resistance so useless, that General Chassé, in order to save the further waste of life (or, as some reports say, in consequence of private instructions from his monarch), resolved to capitulate; and on Sunday noon (the 23d) two field-officers proceeded with a flag of truce from the citadel to Marshal Gerard's head-quarters at Berchem, with instructions to negotiate terms of surrender. As one of Chassé's propositions, however, was, that himself and garrison should leave the fortress with all the honours of war, and be allowed to take the matériel of the garrison with them, they were at once rejected. A second and third mission was despatched with equal effect, the batteries all the while continuing to play on the citadel, until the evening, when Chassé agreed to surrender at discretion; and, at half-past nine, a French battalion took possession of the stronghold. The greatest sympathy, it is said, prevails in the French army towards the Dutch, whose bravery has excited their warmest admiration. There may be a little affectation in this, however. It is no bad policy (though somewhat hackneyed) to extol the prowess of a fallen foe. There has been some pretty severe skirmishing, during the siege, between the troops of Sebastiani and the Dutch gun-boats, the latter of which were burnt by their commanders, to prevent their capture. Marshal Gerard, it seems, has intimated his determination of holding Chassé and his troops as prisoners of war, until the dependent forts of Lillo and Liefkenshoek be also surrendered, which, it is said, King William has expressed his determination not to do. These forts are situated on opposite sides, and command the navigation of the Scheldt. They are very strong, owing to the facility of laying every approach to them deeply under water. The accounts of the loss of lives on both sides are of the most contradictory description. According to the Dutch journals, upwards of 5000 of the besiegers have perished. The Belgian and Parisian papers, again, estimate the total of killed and wounded as under 600! Probably the truth may lie about mid-way between the two. The loss on the part of the citadel appears to have been very trifling, notwithstanding the shattered and dilapidated state in which it was found when taken. The amount of the ammunition expended must be immense.

A correspondence has been published in the London journals, which passed between Earl Grey and Baron Van Zuylen de Nyevelt, the Dutch Minister, previous to the commencement of the siege, by which it would appear, that at a very early period of the protracted London Conference, England and France separated their policy towards Holland, from the other mediatory powers. The correspondence relates to various overtures by the court of Prussia, to effect an equitable adjustment of the disputes between Holland and Belgium, and to obviate the necessity for hostilities. All these, however, Earl Grey pointedly refused to entertain, designating them as mere quibbles to procrastinate a settlement. In his last reply, the Dutch Minister states, "that he did not expect such evasive objections from the Prime Minister of William the Fourth. He had been taught from his childhood to revere the honour and the justice of England; he had been reared in the belief that English principles were based upon humanity and liberality, and that any terms offered even at the last hour, having for their object the prevention of the calamities of war, would gladly be entertained by an English Minister. He regretted to say, that his opinions of British magnanimity had undergone a serious change. He could no longer look upon the government of England as the ardent friends and the ancient and faithful allies of Holland."

The French army, it is said, has received orders immediately to evacuate the Belgian territory—an order which, we doubt not, will prove most agreeable news to the Belgian yeomen, who have been complaining grievously of the levies exacted from them for the maintenance of their allies.

Looking to the whole conduct of the King of Holland, since the first-threatened coercive measures on the part of France and England, it seems beyond a doubt, that, however unfounded the expectation might be, he fully reckoned upon the friendly aid, or at least interference in his behalf, of one or other, or all, of the three despotic governments of Europe. Nor is it unlikely, that, knowing the natural alarm entertained by our English merchants and manufacturers at the prospect of so profitable a mart of commerce as Holland being shut against them, he has been misled, by the exaggerated statements of our violent anti-ministerial prints, into an over-sanguine hope of the resistance likely to be offered by the nation to the hostile measures of government. In such a view of the case, King William may claim credit, not less as a politic prince, grasping at all chances for the interests of his people, than as a brave and resolute man. Now, however, that all prospect of assistance from either of these quarters has vanished, his persisting in exhibiting a hostile attitude, which he knows well he cannot maintain, and which can only occasion a farther bootless effusion of human blood, must be considered as little creditable to his feelings as a man, or his judgment as a monarch.

FRANCE.

It was expected, when the French Ministry was lately appointed, that they would have no support in the Chambers, on account of their being chiefly Doctrinaires, that is, liberals of too superficial a character. Whether owing in part to the attempt, or supposed attempt, at assassinating the king, we cannot say; but the result has turned out quite different from what was anticipated. The Ministry possess immense strength in the Chamber of Deputies. The address in reply to the royal speech—which is always considered a test of the ministerial influence—was voted, without amendment, on the 3d of December, by a majority of 233 against 114—fully two for one. The juste milieu, or moderate system of liberalism, seems thus completely established in France, forming the best possible assurance of the permanence of the same system in England.

The Chamber afterwards voted 900,000 francs, or 36,000 pounds of our money, to erect a column in honour of the Three Days.

It is stated upon good authority, that, upon the remonstrance of the English government, the French army is immediately to be reduced by the amount of 150,000 men, upon a positive assurance from England, that in case any of the continental powers shall attempt to disturb the peace of Europe, she will then enter into a treaty, offensive and defensive, with France.

The Duchess of Berri, in her captivity, is watched with unceasing vigilance. A few evenings ago, a boat, in which were some workmen returning from their daily labour, attempted to cross the river upon which her prison stands, after the evening gun had been fired; but the vessel was seized, and its cargo sent to prison. In other respects she is allowed every reasonable indulgence. She enjoys perfect liberty in the interior. Whenever the state of the weather permits, she takes her walks on the ramparts. Kiosks are to be erected on various parts of the citadel, to enable the Duchess to draw landscapes of the environs. The Duchess has been indisposed for some days with a slight inflammation in the chest, which it is expected will soon be removed by the physician who has been called in to attend her.—French paper.

PORTUGAL.

WE left Don Pedro and his army in a state of blockade within the city of Oporto, Don Miguel's batteries permitting no vessel to go in to his assistance, though as many as please to leave him are allowed to do so. A sortie of 1500 men took place on the 17th November; but the little good which it did in destroying batteries, &c., was too dearly bought by the loss of 136 men. On the 16th, there was a meeting among the English, two hundred of whom marched up to the palace, with bayonets fixed, to demand the arrears due to them, and full clothing and bedding. It was with difficulty they were appeased.

For some weeks after these events, Don Miguel's batteries continued to bombard the city, and did much mischief, by means of shells. In one night, no fewer than twenty-one persons were wounded by these engines of war. On the 7th December, four vessels trying to go into the harbour, three of them were sunk by the batteries, and only one got in. On the 13th, a very heavy bombardment took place, which did considerable damage. All these details sink in some measure into insignificance before a disaster which took place in connection with this unhappy expedition. The vessel Rivals, which left the Clyde in November with about 450 recruits, was lost on her passage off the coast of Galway, on the night of the 5th of December, and not a soul survived to tell the tale.

Lisbon Gazettes of the 30th Nov. contain an official letter from Viscount Santarem to the Conde de Lourenço, stating that Admiral Parker had made a formal complaint of the insult to the British flag by firing on the Raven, and that orders had been issued by Don Miguel for trying by a court-martial the officer who had been guilty of this act of aggression. There is also another official notice relative to a complaint made by Admiral Parker, of some musket shot having been fired from an eminence upon the English ship Orestes, and respecting which orders are given to institute an inquiry.

AMERICA.

AN excitement has for some time prevailed in the Southern States of the American Union, and more especially in the state of South Carolina, on the subject of the tariff acts, which have been denounced as unconstitutional and oppressive, inasmuch as they throw a heavy tax upon the population of the south, in order to foster and encourage the manufactures of the Northern States. Unavailing remonstrances have long been made in Congress against those measures, and threats have been held out of a determination to refuse obedience to the tariff laws, under the new coined word "nullification." It now appears, that, despairing of all other measures, the people of South Carolina are about to determine, and probably have determined, by their delegates, in full assemblage at Charleston, to dissolve their connection with the other states, and resist them by force of arms if necessary. Should Virginia, and the states south of that, make common cause with South Carolina—and these are all equally affected by these obnoxious tariff laws—it may be hard to say what effect the dispute will have upon the future fortunes of the great American republic.

Mr Charles Carrol, of Carrollton, the last survivor of those who signed the American declaration of independence, July 4, 1776, died in November, aged 96. To his honour, the President of the United States ordered the government offices to be closed for a day. Great sickness prevailed about the beginning of November, in New Orleans. Cholera, yellow fever, and cold plague, were at once prevalent, and in one day there took place 177 interments.

The Queen of Spain has issued a manifesto, declaring her hostility to all innovations, religious or political, and a determination to observe neutrality in the struggle now going on in Portugal. There is reason, however, to suppose that this is only a measure of temporary caution.

Mr Stultz, the well-known tailor, who retired to France a few years ago, and was created Baron Stultz, died on the 17th of November, at his estate called Aires, in the south of France, after an illness of nine days. This estate cost him upwards of L.100,000 (we believe L.103,000). He had another large estate near Baden-on-the-Rhine. About a year ago the Baron sent the Emperor of Austria a present of L.40,000, to do with it what he pleased, for which present he received in return the Order of Maria Theresa, and the patent as Count Gothenburg. The Baron had great wealth in the bank at Vienna (Rothschild's). His property, besides these estates, exceeded L.400,000.

A violent eruption of Mount Etna, which took place on the 17th and 18th November, destroyed Bronte, a town situated nine leagues from Catania, and containing a population of 10,000 persons.

The Emperor Nicholas has issued orders for the transplantation of five thousand families of Polish gentlemen from the province of Podolia to the Steppes on the line of the Caucasus. The order is dated November 21st. The men are to be sent in the first instance—their families are to be sent after them. The selection of individuals is to be regulated by the share which they took in the late disturbances, and by the supposed danger to the state from their mode of living and their general conduct. The University of Warsaw, except the faculties of Medicine and Theology, is abolished. The library and collection of medals are ordered to be transported to St Petersburg. By a second ukase, trials of the first class of criminals are to go on, but no new matter is to be gone into. Criminals of the third class are to be pardoned; criminals of the second class are to be given over to the military governors of Minsk. The sentences may be commuted or remitted, on representation to the Emperor by the local authorities.

Letters from Alexandria to the 16th October contain intelligence of a new victory gained by Ibrahim Pacha over the Turkish force between Adanat and Koniet. The Turks lost two pieces of cannon; and Ibrahim, we are informed, was to establish his winter quarters in Mesopotamia, where he was fortifying himself in defensive positions.

Accounts from Jamaica to the 31st October are highly favourable. The colony is recovering from the devastating disorders which had lately prevailed throughout the island. The address of Lord Mulgrave to the House of Assembly was hailed as a manifestation of the adoption of a more enlightened system of emancipation on the part of the government. From the address it appears that the obnoxious Order in Council of November 2, 1831, is withdrawn, and that the Colonial Office intends to proceed on the judicious resolutions of Mr Canning, agreed to by the House of Commons in 1823.

The accounts from the Leeward Islands announce that the beautiful town of Paramaribo, in Surinam, had been nearly destroyed by fire, fifty-eight houses having been entirely consumed. The greater part of these consisted of stores and magazines. No lives were lost.

ENGLAND.

WE have this month to record the remarkable circumstance of an ambassador from the Sultan of Constantinople arriving at the court of Great Britain, to induce England, if possible, to avert the destruction of the Ottoman empire, now apparently about to take place by the warlike operations of the Pacha of Egypt. Russia, we are informed, has already shown considerable desire to prevent this catastrophe, by aiding the Sultan in divers ways; but whatever may be the true cause for this anomalous interposition, we sincerely hope that our government will show more good sense than follow its example. At present, Great Britain has its hands sufficiently full of employment, both at home and abroad; and to embroil us with the barbarous powers in the Mediterranean and Levant, would be seriously injurious, as well as altogether preposterous on the common ground of humanity. In the opinion of all sensible persons, it is fully time that the savage sway of the Turks in Europe, Syria, and Egypt, was fairly finished, and something better established in its place. Perhaps Mohamed Pacha is not so enlightened or so liberal in his policy as could be wished; but he seems to have arisen, as an instrument in the hand of Providence, to modify the despotism and ignorance of the Mahomedans, to whom he himself belongs, and to prepare the way for the full introduction of civilized usages from Christendom. He has already done much to civilize the modern Egyptians; and if his power be permanently secured in Syria, we shall at once have the whole of Palestine—a country upon which no Christian can look unmoved—laid open to the free settlement of Europeans. An effective police will be immediately established in Judea, so that travelling to Jerusalem, or any other place in the Holy Land, will be of as easy accomplishment as is now the case with any continental territory. The good which may be effected for mankind by this change alone, is altogether incalculable. Let us, therefore, hope that Great Britain will not now, on any pretext, become the protector of a nation of barbarians and robbers, as the Turks undoubtedly are, and have always been. Independent of the present source of disquietude to the Sultan, it is evident that the time is fast approaching when the Turkish government must fall in pieces, from the mere decay of its parts; and it would be equally idle and disastrous for Great Britain, or any other state in Western Europe, to interfere to prevent so desirable a termination to its ignorant and brutal career. For a history of the rise, progress, and decline of the Turkish power, we refer to an article of popular information in the 48th number of our Journal, published on the 29th ultimo.

ASSESSED TAXES.

On Wednesday, November 28, a general meeting of the metropolitan and Middlesex population, with both their present representatives and candidates for future representation, was held in the City of London Tavern, to deliberate on petitioning Parliament, and memorialising the Treasury, for a repeal of the house and window taxes. Mr Hume, who acted as chairman, after deprecating the notion that the meeting was held with any view of embarrassing Ministers expressed a conviction that either these taxes, amounting to two and a half millions, might be dispensed with, or that the deficiency might be easily made up by something else. The old Parliament taxed industry, not capital and wealth: he would wish to see a legacy tax on landed property, instead of personal property, which came most severely on the poor; and such a tax, he was sure, would supply the place, if necessary, of that proposed to be repealed. Mr J. Nicholson, who proposed the first resolution of the meeting, mentioned the following facts illustrative of the inequality with which the house-tax pressed on individuals of different ranks. "The Marquis of Hertford," said Mr Nicholson, "who sent six members to the old Parliament, took with his family, the Seymours, L.20,000 out of the taxes. What amount of house-tax did the meeting suppose he paid? He had a mansion in Suffolk which was supposed to be worth L.200,000, for which he paid a house-duty of L.14, 3s. 4d. only. How was this to be accounted for? The Marquis being one of the governors, or rather one of the kings of this country, appointed commissioners, who in their turn appointed surveyors and collectors, who swore to make faithful returns of the value of every house; and those gentlemen had sworn that the noble Marquis's house was worth only L.100 a-year. Proceedings had been instituted against Mr Nicholson by the King's Attorney-General, on a charge of having defrauded the revenue of 2d. in the payment of the house-tax; but if the public had their Attorney-General, would not the Marquis of Hertford be brought into the Exchequer for the amount which he had defrauded the public of during the last thirty years? The Duke of Grafton had a mansion in Suffolk. His family received only L.15,000 a-year out of the taxes, but the amount of house-duty paid by him was exactly the same as in the former case—namely, L.14, 3s. 4d. The Duke of Northumberland with his family, got only L.14,000 a-year out of the taxes; but he had not found the surveyors and collectors so pliant as his noble friends had, and he was therefore taxed comparatively high. His mansion, which was calculated to have cost half a million of money, was rated at L.200 a-year, and he paid in duty L.28, 6s. 8d. The Duke of Marlborough paid L.44 a-year house-duty for Blenheim House, which was a large sum for an aristocrat. At Hereford, the Bishop's palace was rated at L.60 a-year, and paid L.5 duty."—Mr Chas. Pearson showed, that of the house-tax, five-eighths was paid by London alone, and of the window-tax, two-thirds, though the population of the metropolis was only a seventh of the whole.—Mr Babbage, candidate for Finsbury, and one of the most distinguished scientific men in the empire, said, "the principles on which I would reduce taxation are these: I would first remove the taxes on knowledge; I would then remove those on prudence, such as that on insurance against fire; I would then take off those which press upon the productive industry of the country. If the taxes on houses and windows cannot be removed, they ought certainly to be regulated so as to remove their unequal pressure. Much as I object to what has just been called a 'tax on the light of heaven,' I object more to a tax on the light of knowledge."—It was in conclusion agreed, that the resolutions should be submitted to Earl Grey by Mr Hume and a deputation from the different metropolitan districts, and also that petitions founded on them should be prepared for signature, in order to be presented to Parliament as soon as it met.

Another meeting, for the same purpose, consisting of deputations from the parishes of Westminster, was held on the preceding day, when similar resolutions were agreed to. A deputation from the meeting, accompanied by Sir Francis Burdett and Sir J. C. Hobhouse, waited upon Lord Althorp on the 29th, to learn his Lordship's sentiments respecting the probability of these taxes being repealed. Lord Althorp said that his business was to look to the public creditor; the revenue was going on well enough at present; but if these taxes should be repealed, as well as some others he had been applied to to have repealed—the taxes on knowledge—some others would be required.

[To judge by their ideas respecting taxes, it would appear that governments in general have very little acquaintance with the feelings and necessities of domestic life throughout the country. Both the late and the present Ministry have made considerable reductions of taxes; but the effect has been in a great measure lost, from an infelicity in selecting the taxes to be reduced. One has thought it good to take a penny a pair off shoes; another has expected universal gratitude for making tobacco more accessible. No one has ever seen that the assessed taxes—the taxes payable in actual money—are the only real taxes. We know it is the opinion of some political thinkers that these taxes should be retained, because, while the poorest class is altogether exempted from them, they all most heavily upon the higher orders of society; but, even overlooking the strange statements made by Mr Nicholson, we think it must be evident that the house and window duties produce difficulty, distress, and misery, almost universally throughout the middle and industrious parts of the community, and are the only tax that directly do so. We are convinced that the repeal of these odious imposts would tend more to make a government popular than almost any other measure now contemplated.]

THE DUTCH WAR.

At a meeting of the county of Hertford, on the 1st December, called for the purpose of censuring Ministers respecting the Dutch war, the original resolutions were defeated by an amendment declaring the inexpediency of an interference with one of his Majesty's prerogatives at the present time.

Earl Grey, in his reply to the Huddersfield address, called to mind the original principles on which the Ministers took office, one of which was "peace;" and declared their inflexible determination to pursue the course they had then tracked out. At the same time, he adverted to the peculiar circumstances in which they had found the Belgian question, and expressed a hope that all will yet conclude in peace. The reading of this document, in a popular assembly, was followed by deafening cheers.

The Gazette of the 4th December contained a proclamation, directing the immediate release of all Dutch vessels having on board perishable cargoes.

A public meeting, limited by advertisement to those who disapproved of the warlike proceedings of the Ministry, was held on the 28th November. An attempt was made on this occasion, by a party of gentlemen friendly to the Ministers, to gain admittance; but it was resisted by sheer force. The resolutions adopted by the meeting, and the address founded on them, strongly deprecated the war as both unjust and dangerous. The address subsequently received two thousand signatures. On the 1st of December, the ministers held a public meeting without limitation as to the opinions of those who should attend it, and which was most respectfully attended, at which it was agreed to form an address, expressing confidence in the Ministers, and disapproving of "the attempts of a party, always the advocates of war against liberty, and the determined enemies of reform, to embarrass his Majesty's Ministers on the eve of an election, by a line of conduct more likely to produce than to avert the war which they profess to deprecate."

[The misunderstanding which very generally prevailed at Glasgow on this occasion, between the two parties, as to the right of any party to call an exclusive meeting, points out the necessity of some standard being arrived at, by which parties may act amicably under such circumstances. It is clear that a minority should have liberty to meet and express their sentiments, as well as a majority, upon any public question; but some formula of advertisement should be fixed upon, to obviate the possibility of the sentiments of the minority being represented or understood as the sentiments of the public at large. With some such guard as this, we conceive that even six people, dissenting from as many hundreds of thousands, could meet without disturbance, and address their sovereign or the two houses of Parliament, to any effect they pleased.]

Sir Stratford Canning proceeded early in the month to Madrid, on a mission referring, it is presumed, to the present contest in Portugal.

The Board of Control, as at present constructed, contains five Scottish gentlemen, viz. Mr Charles Grant, the President; and Messrs Robert Gordon, Stewart Mackenzie, Robert Grant, and Holt Mackenzie, Commissioners. Mr C. Grant and Mr S. Mackenzie are candidates for the representation of Scotch counties. Mr Macaulay, the Secretary to the Board, and the newly-elected M.P. for Leeds, gains an increase of salary to the amount of £600 per annum, by his translation from a Commissionership of the Board to the office of Secretary.—M. Herald.

The British army consists at present—of Field-Marshal, 6; Generals, 90; Lieutenant-Generals, 197; Major-Generals, 219; Colonels, 292; Lieutenant-Colonels, 582—Total, 1386; and the Majors are nearly as numerous; making an aggregate of upwards of fifteen hundred Generals and Field-Officers actually receiving pay from the British government. The whole of the national force hardly exceeds one hundred thousand.

We believe we may venture to say, that the projected ministerial plan of church reform has already made considerable progress. There are to be, it is understood, two bills on the subject; one to prevent future causes of complaint in the disposal of benefices, with a view to the complete abolition of pluralities and non-residence; the other for a more appropriate (also future) equalization of the revenues of the church, from whatever source arising. The outline of the plan has been drawn up by the Lord Chancellor, and approved of generally by his colleagues.—Court Journal.

A single Vote.—The number of important questions that have been decided by the majority of a single voice is not a little extraordinary. The great General Washington owed his seat as President of America to that majority; Ireland preserved her Parliament by that majority; it is well known what the House of Brunswick owes to that majority; the fortifications in 1786 were overthrown by that majority; the East India Company gained their great question relative to sending four regiments to India, by that majority! Tottenham in his boots saved the keeping of the public money raised in Ireland, in the Bank at Dublin, by that majority; the Catholic question was once lost in the House of Commons by that majority; the Duke of Cumberland lost £5000 a-year by that majority!

It appears from the December number of the "Herald," a periodical conducted by the committee of the British and Foreign Temperance Society, that the number of persons members of Temperance Societies in England is 40,047.

Important to Shipowners and Sailors.—An order has lately been issued from the Treasury, for the purpose of relieving the shipping interest, by allowing the duty to be returned on the following articles, when consumed at sea, viz. beer, ale, porter, tea, soap, refined sugar, British-manufactured tobacco and vinegar, and other goods to be shipped from the bonding warehouses free from duty.

GENERAL ELECTION.

In a Supplement to the London Gazette of December 3, appeared the proclamation dissolving the late and calling a new Parliament, the writs to be returnable on Tuesday the 29th of January. The following is a list of very nearly the whole of the returns, distinguishing those who are reformers from those who opposed that measure:—

The remainder of the Irish members will be given in our next.

The first general election under the reform acts has been chiefly remarkable for the facility and quiet with which the proceedings in general were conducted. From the admirable arrangement of polling booths, where the number of voters exceeds a certain number, the strength of the excitement, which formerly used to be concentrated round the hustings, is effectually dissipated; and the result is, that several thousand votes are polled with the same external tranquillity as so many signatures are given to an address or a petition. The general smoothness of the system was in hardly any place so conspicuous as in London, where ten thousand voters must have been polled for the city alone. The absence of violence is perhaps to be ascribed in some degree to the very small opposition which the popular wishes had in general to contend against. In the most of places, the Ministerial candidates carried their elections easily, so that the inferior populace had hardly the shadow of a pretence for what is commonly called "getting up a row." In one of the instances where a contrary event had taken place—Sheffield—a riot took place on the 14th, and the magistrates, finding it impossible to quell the disturbances before night-fall, were under the necessity of ordering the military to fire, when five persons were killed, and twenty-five wounded, of whom five afterwards died—making the whole amount of lives lost ten. This restored tranquillity; and though such a scene of destruction is to be greatly deplored, it perhaps saved the town from worse evils. At Bath, an altercation took place on the hustings between two candidates, Messrs Foster and Roebuck: the latter struck his opponent in the face, after which the parties were separated. At the Lanarkshire election, the ultra-reforming and least successful candidate, Mr Hamilton, younger of Dalryell, pushed his opponent, Mr Maxwell, younger of Pollock, with his foot, and the parties required to be separated by their friends. In another case—at Hertford—one gentleman gave another the lie. Such is the amount of injuries mutually offered among the candidates themselves. In no instance in England has any violence been committed by the populace upon any candidate: in Scotland, only, Lord John Scott, the conservative candidate for Roxburghshire, suffered in this way.

With respect to bribery, which used to be one of the grand evils attending elections, nothing of the kind has been observed in Scotland, and in England, it only appeared in those places where there still remained a large admixture of the old popular constituencies. At Liverpool, no fewer than 1200 persons are stated to have accepted of bribes, generally amounting to about five pounds; at Norwich, 400 persons were tempted by similar means; and in St Alban's, about 50. At the two former places, the degrading practice was successful; but it is probable that the returns will be successfully opposed.

Some remarkable revelations of Ministerial feeling and intentions have been observed in this election. Great efforts were made by the Ministers and their friends to oppose the return of Mr Hume in Middlesex. They preferred to this independent and somewhat troublesome statesman, Lord Henley, who is described as every thing but an anti-reformer. It was, however, eventually found necessary to withdraw this nobleman from the contest. In the Westminster election, Sir Francis Burdett and Sir John Hobhouse, the latter of whom is a Minister, while the former is an adherent of Ministers, are described as having conducted themselves in a manner by no means conciliating towards their electors, refusing to give the least pledge for their conduct in Parliament; and yet, it will be observed, they enjoyed a large majority over the independent candidate. In addressing the electors of (South) Northamptonshire, Lord Althorp said, "You

I know that in bringing forward the reform bill, I proposed it to be a final measure. I make the same proposition still, and I intend to act on that profession. It is my intention, in case any alteration should be proposed to the reform bill, to resist it to the utmost of my power." In reference, moreover, to the corn laws, he declared that he intended, for the present, to "leave them untouched." In the same spirit, Mr Stanley, Secretary for Ireland, addressed the voters in (North) Lancashire. His Majesty's government," said he, "had known that to great body of the people was sound: and, knowing that they would have been unworthy of holding the reins of government had they refused to extend the franchise; it had been done, and granting to them the right of electing representatives, and thus sharing in the government of their native land: and having now thus extended the franchise, he and the government would be deceiving the people, and contradicting all the professions that they had made, and with which they had come forward, they should not be strenuous in their resistance of any attempt to carry the extension further. The government did come forward with a complete measure of reform, which the people had adopted as the new charter of their liberties; it had been so extensive as to alarm many, who, however, consented to go the length of it upon the strict pledge that it was to be taken as a final measure; therefore, it should be attempted to bring forward any measure for shortening the duration of Parliament, or a still further extensive alteration, by the protection, as it was lately called, of the vote by ballot, he now announced (and he spoke the sentiments of his honourable colleagues) that any such measure would meet with their most decided opposition."

The nomination of members for Edinburgh took place on Monday, the 17th, on hustings erected at the Cross— an object fully as remarkable as any other connected with the history of the country that ever appeared on the same spot. The street in front was completely filled with spectators. At twelve o'clock, the Sheriff read the usual papers of form, and Sir J. G. Craig then nominated the right Hon. Francis Jeffrey, Lord Advocate for Scotland, which was seconded by Mr Wilkie, Convener of the trades. This nomination was received with unmingled cheers. Sir F. W. Drummond then appeared, to nominate Mr Forbes Hunter Blair; but his speech was hardly audible, owing to a contest between approbation and disapprobation, which lasted throughout. This having been seconded by Sir J. S. Forbes, banker, the Right Hon. James Abercromby was nominated by Mr A. Black, seconded by Mr A. Skene. To the election of this gentleman, a protest was presented by Mr Forsyth, advocate, on the plea that Mr A. was a pensioner of the crown. The candidates subsequently addressed the people. The polling took place on Tuesday and Wednesday, and showed the following final result:—

Lord Advocate	-	-	4058
Mr Blair	-	-	1519

On Friday, the Sheriff made the official publication of his result from the hustings, in presence of a similar multitude; and Messrs Jeffrey and Abercromby, who were declared to be returned as members, were subsequently chaired in a triumphal car through the city, attended by the trades with their banners, and the cheers of a multitude of spectators.

The election for Leith took place there, on Tuesday the 18th, when, Mr Aitchison having withdrawn upon the hustings, Mr John Archibald Murray was declared duly returned, and was subsequently chaired by the trades in a similar manner.

The nomination for the county of Mid-Lothian took place upon Wednesday the 19th, from the hustings at the Cross. At the close of the poll on Saturday, the following was the result:—

	Sir G. Clerk.	Sir J. Dalrymple.
Edinburgh	193	196
Dalkeith	271	245
Mid-Calder	72	160
	536	601
Majority for Sir J. Dalrymple		65

The nomination for Glasgow took place on the 17th, when no fewer than six candidates were moved and seconded, Mr. Douglas and Sir D. K. Sandford, who are ultra-liberals, being honoured with the greatest show of hands. The following, however, was the state of the poll at its close on the 20th:—

Ewing,	-	-	3251
Oswald,	-	-	2837
Sandford,	-	-	2168
Crawford,	-	-	1851
Douglas,	-	-	1341
Dixon,	-	-	1005

Total number of votes, 12,453

Messrs Ewing and Oswald, the most conservative of all the candidates, were consequently returned for one of the most generally liberal of all our Scottish constituencies. The causes of this are stated to be the union of Messrs Ewing and Oswald (who may be described as Tory and Whig), so as to split votes with each other, and the dissipation of the strength of the opposite party over twice the number of candidates.

The nomination for Perthshire took place on the 21st, and the polling on the 26th and 27th. The contest for this county excited great interest throughout the country generally. It was disgraced by several acts of fire-raising which took place previously, through the violence of the inferior orders of the populace against the friends of the Tory candidate; among the more respectable of his opponents there was a feeling of regret that a man generally so liberal as Sir George Murray, and whose services, both in the field and the senate, have been of some importance, should expose himself to certain defeat. The final result of the poll showed for Lord Ormelle 1664, for Sir George Murray 1090; and the former was accordingly elected.

IRELAND.

Captain Burke, against whom a coroner's inquest returned a verdict of wilful murder, for commanding at Mooncoin, where twelve people were killed, on the 8th October, has been admitted to bail, himself in L.1000, and two sureties in L.500 each.

Mr O'Connell, who has been returned for Dublin, is said to have arranged a very strange plan for procuring the repeal of the Union in the ensuing Parliament. He and some other members devoted, like himself, to that object, will attend every night, and all night long. They will every one of them have as many petitions as they please, and they will contrive, in presenting them, to take up the entire time devoted to petitioning. Every one of them will have fifty motions, on which all the band will speak, and an equal number of amendments, to be as pertinaciously supported, to every motion of every body else. They thus calculate upon being able, without difficulty, so to petition and amend, that neither Whig nor Tory, Conservative nor Radical, shall be able to speak one speech, or to do one act of real business, from the beginning of the session to the end. The Ministry will thus be worried, the Opposition wearied to death, the people will become impatient, and all parties will at length conjoin in dissolving a union which is productive of equal annoyance to all.

On Thursday night, the 29th November, a large armed party surrounded, and set fire to the house of a man named Maddocks, within eight miles of the town of Wexford. There were in the house, Maddocks, his wife, a son and daughter grown up, and two children, together with two policemen, who had been placed there for protection, it having been burned before in August last. The alleged cause was Maddock's having taken some ground over a former occupant. Of the two policemen who first rushed out, one named Wright was shot dead, the other escaped; the mother and daughter were shot through the heart; the son, who still lives, but almost hopeless, was shot through the breast and shoulder-joint, and left for dead; and the father was likewise left senseless and for dead, most barbarously mangled in the head; his case is hopeless. The children escaped, whether by accident or not is not known.

Mr Maurice O'Connell fought a duel, November 30, at Tralee, with Mr Blennerhassett. Three rounds were fired, but no harm was done to either party. The cause of quarrel was Mr Blennerhassett's having canvassed electors who had promised Mr O'Connell their votes. Mr O'Connell declared, that no other gentleman in Kerry would have done it. An English paper remarks upon this point, "we should think the insult, if there were any, was offered, not to Mr Maurice O'Connell, but to the electors, whom Mr Blennerhassett imagined wore their faith so lightly."

Government issued orders for the suspension of all proceedings (whether by process or otherwise) for the collection of tithes, during the progress of the election in the various counties.

On Saturday, the 15th December, the Rev. Chas. Ferguson of Timoleague was murdered by the populace. He was proceeding in a gig, at an early hour in the morning, on his way to Bandon, accompanied by another gentleman, when, perceiving a number of persons running through the fields towards his vehicle, he sought refuge in a neighbouring house. He was pursued, overtaken, and murdered on the spot.

The Dublin Gazette of the same day contained a proclamation, declaring the western part of the county of Cork (in which county the above murder took place) to be in a state of disturbance, and requiring an extraordinary establishment of police.

At two o'clock on the morning of Monday, 26th Nov. Baron Smith's house, at Newton, in the King's County, was attacked by a number of armed persons. One bullet penetrated a very strong hall door, and lodged in folding doors which separated the outer from the inner hall. A second bullet passed through the window-shutters of the dining-parlour, struck the opposite wall, and was found upon the floor. Those within were repeatedly summoned by loud knocks to open the door; but the summons was not obeyed, and the door was too strong to be forced. All the windows of the front and back gate-houses were broken, the sashes also broken, and the lead taken from the roof. The Baron is said to have received threatening letters, denouncing him for his charges at Maryborough, and at the late commission in Dublin. He had given employment to many, and had never had any difference with any of his tenants.

A fatal collision between the peasantry and the police took place at Carrickmacross on the 5th Dec., connected with the forcible levying of tithes. The police became irritated by the rude treatment they experienced from the people, and fired upon them, when two of the latter were shot dead, and one badly wounded. One of the police was also killed in the affray, which was ultimately suppressed by the approach of the military.

SCOTLAND.

On the 13th, some gentlemen representing public bodies in Edinburgh, waited upon the Lord Advocate and Mr Abercromby, to ascertain the sentiments of these gentlemen respecting the city taxes. The Lord Advocate professed his readiness to introduce a bill for extending the taxes over the legal class who are now exempt, and reducing the expenditure for the clergy, by limiting their salaries, and permitting the collegiate charges to die out. The gentlemen representing corporations professed to be satisfied with this; but those who appeared for the Inhabitants' Committee (a body constituted for the purpose of procuring a modification of the ecclesiastical tax, called annuity) would not be content with any thing short of a total abolition of that tax.—[The annuity tax is one of six per cent. on rental, for the support of the clergy, while the people who attend the city churches, at the same time, pay for their seats. In Glasgow, an efficient body of clergy is supported by seat-rents alone; and the citizens of Edinburgh are naturally anxious that a similar system might be established in their city. The proposed bill of the Lord Advocate would reduce the tax a little to those who at present are liable; but the Inhabitants' Committee are of belief that this would, without giving much immediate relief, render a total emancipation more hopeless than it is at present. Such a bill would, in fact, be the greatest misfortune that had befallen the city for many years.]

Sabbath Profanation.—The Presbyteries of Glasgow and Paisley have agreed to petition Parliament upon this subject, praying for a legislative enactment in reference to a due observance of the Sabbath, and to prevent the open desecration of that sacred day.

Early in December, the workmen employed in removing the buildings which formerly constituted what was called the Back Stairs, near the Parliament Square, discovered a fragment of the older wall of the city, which included only the High Street, and was built in the reign of James the Third. It was about fifty feet long, nearly twenty in height, and six feet in thickness. In a map of Edinburgh, drawn in 1647, by Gordon of Rothiemay, and engraved by De Witt, a Dutch engraver, this identical fragment is seen in the then vacant space south from the Parliament House; but it has been covered by buildings almost ever since that time.

In the course of last summer, a great many fishing-boats in Shetland, with their crews, were supposed to have perished in a tremendous gale. It would appear, however, that one of these boats had been picked up during the storm by a vessel on its way to America, and the whole boat's crew, except the skipper, who was crushed to pieces by the collision of the ship and boat, were hauled on board by fixing ropes round their waists. After being carried to America, they were brought to Liverpool, and from thence, to the astonishment of their countrymen, they arrived at Lerwick by the George Canning, on the 13th November. They were received as the dead alive again, with every demonstration of joy and kindness. The return of this boat's crew has raised hopes in the breasts of the widows and orphans of the other sufferers, in regard to their supposed safety. But, notwithstanding the extraordinary deliverance wrought out by an inscrutable Providence for the boat's crew in question, there is no just ground for inferring that the other boats have been equally fortunate.

The Findhorn suspension bridge, recently erected by Captain Brown, R.N. by general subscription, was opened, December 7, in presence of about 2000 spectators.

On the evening of the 3d December, between five and six o'clock, Sir James M. Cunningham was attacked in his carriage, which also contained Lady and Miss Cunningham, about a mile and a half from Galston, on the road to Ayr. The assailants were three, one of whom got upon the carriage, and endeavoured to throw down the servants. Sir James, in leaning from the carriage window to learn the cause of the disturbance, received a blow in the face, which wounded him very severely. The coachman, fortunately, was able to drive off, leaving the ruffians behind. Three men were afterwards apprehended at Kilmarnock, on suspicion of having been concerned in the outrage.

The fate of the convict Janet Stewart has now been finally decided on. The sentence of death has been commuted to that of transportation beyond seas during her life.

Destructive Fire in Leith.—We regret to state, that the magnificent premises of George Goodlet & Co. Leith, commonly called the steam mills, baths, &c., situated in the Broad Wynd, were early on Saturday morning, the 29th ult. burned to the ground. The fire was discovered between one and two o'clock in the morning, and before any effectual means could be brought to bear in order to subdue it, the whole extensive range of building was in one sheet of flame, to which, in spite of every effort, the whole premises soon became a prey. The premises destroyed were seven or eight storeys in height, and, it is said, were erected at a cost of from L.25,000 to L.30,000. In regard to the insurance on the premises, we understand that the sum of L.13,000 was insured in four different offices. The loss sustained by the proprietors is therefore still great.

We learn from an authentic source that Ministers, after having almost dropped the intention of making the reduction of the taxes on knowledge a Cabinet measure, have recently become so convinced of the strong feeling that exists on this subject in the country at large, that the reduction of those taxes will form one of the earliest measures of the Ministry in the new Parliament.—Evening paper.

A piece of plate, voted at an open-air meeting at Glasgow, in May last, and since procured by a ten-thousand penny subscription, was presented to Mr Hume in September. From the correspondence on this occasion, recently published, it appears that the following is the inscription on the testimonial:—"Presented to Joseph Hume, Esquire, M.P., by upwards of Ten Thousand Reformers, assembled at the great reform meeting, in the Green of Glasgow, May 17th, 1832, in testimony of their admiration of his bold and patriotic conduct during the temporary retirement of Earl Grey's administration, when the House of Peers refused to pass the great measure of Parliamentary Reform. Glasgow 1832."—The treasurer of this subscription (Mr Bennet, of the Free Press) used the following expressions in his letter to Mr Hume, in presenting the plate:—"To you, Sir, this proof of popularity must be a source of proud satisfaction—arising, as it spontaneously does, from the enthusiastic gratitude of a generous and public-spirited people, too intelligent and manly to bow their heads to any species of tyranny, or pay deference to any by whom such tyranny is supported; yet affectionate, grateful, and confiding towards all whom they feel convinced are sincerely honest in defending their rights, and desiring their welfare. Of all this they feel convinced in reference to you; and I am sure you will not blame them for mingling with their wish to do you honour on that account, a patriotic desire that, by making such honour public, posterity may be enabled to see, appreciate, and profit by the example of their forefathers."

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

A meeting of the admirers of the late Sir Walter Scott has been held in the Committee-room of the Leeds Library, for the purpose of promoting, in Leeds and its neighbourhood, a subscription to aid in carrying into effect the proposal to settle Abbotsford and its collection on Sir Walter Scott's descendants. Benjamin Gott, Esq. presided. J. S. Morritt, Esq. of Rokeby, a member of the sub-committee appointed at a meeting in London of the subject, attended, and entered into a detail of the proceedings adopted by the London Committee to promote their object. It was resolved that a subscription should be commenced in Leeds, and a committee was appointed to conduct the same. The subscription ready amounts to upwards of one hundred and thirty guineas.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the Celtic Society, held at Edinburgh on December 1, Mr Macdonald of Staffa in the chair, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—"The Society, being fully sensible that, from its formation, the late Sir Walter Scott has always manifested the greatest zeal and anxiety in promoting the objects and interests of the institution, and by his unwearied exertions and constant attendance at its meetings, both for business and conviviality, contribute more than any other to its character and prosperity cannot allow the present opportunity to pass without testifying their sense of the many obligations which he conferred on the Society, and, at the same time, as a tribute of respect and admiration for his worth and transcendental genius, unanimously resolve to subscribe the sum of twenty-five guineas towards the fund now being raised for the purpose of erecting a suitable and lasting monument to his memory, in his native city of Edinburgh."

A public meeting has been held in New York on the same subject, and a subscription has been set on foot for erecting a monument to the memory of Sir Walter Scott at that city.

NEW YORK THEATRICALS.

Charles Kemble and his daughter have been very warmly welcomed in America. Notwithstanding the ravages of the cholera, the New Yorkers rallied to support them. They played twelve nights to an average of L.280 the box price being 4s. 6d., and the pit 2s. 3d. The fashionable of New York are at present occupied principally with an Italian opera-house; a company of fifty-two performers arrived there from Italy in the midst of the cholera. An establishment was taken for them; and the box tickets sold at 6s. 9d. sterling, and those of the pit for 4s. 6d.: a whole box, for three months, brought in auction nearly L.160 sterling. They opened to about 1400 dollars (£300). The poet of the Italian company, when they caught the first sight of the American shores, burst into an improvisation, which was instantly repeated by the rest in an improvisational piece of music. This effort of poetic skill has been thus translated into English verse by a New York poet:—

"Oh, rapture! oh, vision! oh, voice of delight!
 The land we have loved in our dreams is in sight!
 And the moment long sighed for has come, when the heart
 Away from its temple bids sorrow depart."

Let us breathe, then, together in transport our song
 To the shores that the voice of our greeting prolong;
 All glory and triumph, fair land, is thy meed,
 Which Columbus discovered, and Washington freed!

Ye are free, ye are blessed, ye airs we inhale!
 There is life in the zephyr, and joy in the gale
 That kisses the soil, or that sweeps from the coast,
 Where crushed, and for ever, was tyranny's boast.

Oh, union, whose triumph the free heart adores!
 Asylum of liberty, hail to thy shores!"

The French army are on their march homeward and will all have arrived in France in the course of this week. This is satisfactory intelligence, and demonstrates that the peace of Europe will be permanently preserved. As to the forts of Lillo and Liekenshoek, the refusal of the Dutch King to give them up is considered by some of little consequence, without them he would have the command of the Scheldt.

Advices have been received at Liverpool from America, stating that four cutters, with 200 artillerymen had received orders to sail immediately to blockade Charleston.—For an explanation of this procedure, we refer to an article under head of America.

AMERICA.

THE articles of information hitherto given in the Historical Newspaper referred exclusively to the countries of Europe in which a struggle is taking place between the people and the old institutions under which they have grown up. It may now be worth while to describe a country in which the object of that struggle has been attained—namely, a complete exemption from all rule founded on birth or rank, or any thing but the accumulated suffrages of the people. The country in which this order of things is to be found is the United States of America, which may be described as an off-shoot of Great Britain, and is in every respect one of the most interesting, most powerful, most promising countries on the face of the globe.

When we say that the United States of America is arrived at the ultimatum of political improvement, it could be also stated that this was not the result of a struggle similar to that at present carried on in various countries of Europe. The nations of the Old World have taken form under the dominion, generally, of single monarchs, hereditary peerages, churches connected with the state, and other institutions independent of the voice of the people. From habit, from interest, and from a sentimental preference of what is ancient to what is new, many persons support these institutions; but, even if they had no friends, there is a kind of danger in abandoning all at once a species of rule to which it has been found at all possible to command obedience, for the purpose of establishing one, of which the merits are untried, and which, though better as a system, may fail to answer the real end of government, namely, the keeping of all men in a state of inoffensiveness towards their neighbours. Thus, before the old Gothic governments can be altogether renewed, or reformed, several ages will probably pass away—simply because it is difficult, as a poet has said, "to erase the marks of that which once hath been." Now, the United States of America stood in quite a different position from the nations of what is called the Old World. Having originated in the form of British colonies, there was no institution of any kind for them to contend with, besides the authority of the mother country. When that was thrown off triumphantly fifty years ago, the people found themselves a nation of equals—no king, no peers, no church, no limitation of suffrage; of course, it was not only easy, but it was unavoidable, that they should form themselves into a Republic, a form of government in which every organ of authority is created by the voice of the people at large. Being much exasperated against the monarchical and imperfectly-representative system of Britain, which had been gradually led to visit them with great oppression and misery, they set off with a decided and almost unanimous attachment to their new system, which has rendered their career quite smooth ever since, and seems to have founded a strong national spirit among them, in the highest degree promising of continued union, strength, and internal peace. The difference between the two cases is this: America was like a young shopkeeper setting up business for himself, who fits up his shop after his own taste, selects a stock of the freshest goods, adopts the latest improvements in bookkeeping, and has every thing in the best possible order; the old countries, on the contrary, are like old firms in business, where the enterprise of the new partners is greatly clogged by the sage maxims of the old, and the half of the goods are of antiquated pattern and fabric. Till the timid members of the house die out, and none but the young and venture-some remain—till the capital has been disengaged somewhat from old stock, and applied to new—and the shop get so beplastered and repainted by a series of repairs, that it is thought better to knock it altogether down, and build a new one—operations all of them requiring time—there can be no equality of circumstances. Political improvers, therefore, must just wait as patiently as they can, till time shall fit the communities of the elder continent for those changes, which, to hurry on too rapidly, would only be to provoke new alarm and hostility against them. It is not more true that there is a time for every thing than that a time is required for every thing. TIME is, after all, the great revolutionist. With time, the minds of individuals become open to the operation of arguments, which, suddenly presented, might knock in vain for admission. With time, whole nations change their sentiments, and adopt ideas which they formerly rejected. The reason of this being necessary as well as argument, is, that, when a man (and the same may be said of a nation) once professes an opinion as his own, it becomes identified with his self-love, which being a more powerful principle with most than what reason is, he would rather offend the latter by holding to an exploded doctrine, than the former by owning its absurdity.

America dates as an independent country only from the year 1782. It was then left by the British armies, exhausted in its strength, and confused in all its internal and external relations. Yet in the short period which has elapsed since then, the country has, by the blessings of union and peace, and, we may add, the British character inherent in the people, acquired a degree of political importance in the highest degree respectable. The extent of the country is now upwards of a million of square miles, the population about twelve millions, the exports eighteen millions of pounds sterling, the imports nearly the same, the shipping annually cleared from port about a million of tons, the national militia upwards of a million, and all the other features of the country are upon an equally great scale. Influenced by the example of Britain, the American government encourages native manufactures, by imposing high duties upon all articles of the same kind which might be sent from other countries. But this is generally considered by enlightened men in Britain as an erroneous policy, seeing that the readiest and greatest resources of the country are in its agriculture, which is of course depressed by every measure tending to prevent other nations from coming to buy raw produce. In fact, the Americans are just introducing into their country one of those artificial and unnatural systems, which, in ours, form the great obstruction towards improvement, and are so anxiously sought to be eradicated. It is the more to be regretted, as in some of the states—South Carolina, particularly—the tariff protecting American manufactures forms nearly a complete bar to their peculiar mode of making a livelihood, and has thus occasioned, it is to be hoped, a temporary rebellion against the general government.

There is another and still more unfortunate circumstance in the condition of America. Slavery having been much encouraged in the country when it was subject to Britain, there are now in most of the states a vast proportion of negroes, who are exposed to all the evils of that condition—hardly protected by the laws, liable to every kind of insult and injury on the part of their masters, and forming altogether a painful problem in American society, seeing that, even when emancipated and possessed perhaps of fortune, the white people treat them still as an inferior race.

The inferiority of American manners has long formed a favourite subject of amusement to John Bull, under which figure the English nation seems to be conceived, whenever any want, on its part, of humanity, of courtesy, or of rationality, is desired to be described. The Americans are not perhaps so polished a people as the existence of a large leisurely and aristocratic class has rendered the British. But yet, with the exception of one or two particular habits, the average of American middle society does not appear, from the accounts of the most credit-worthy travellers, to be much inferior to the average of the same rank in England. One thing has been rendered clear by the recently-published work of Mr Stuart, that the people of the United States are the most generally educated in the world; a matter which will go far, or we are much mistaken, to render them speedily the best-bred also—at least in the mass. It is a circumstance worthy of notice, that America has no rabble, like Great Britain. All work; all, therefore, support themselves; and all are independent. A body of hopelessly depraved and destitute persons, such as is found in every considerable British town or city, is unknown in America. The practice, however, of comparison, is as odious as it is unnecessary in this case. America is a nation of intelligent, active, British people, constantly improving in their physical and moral condition: whether some of the habits of the people are more or less elegant than the corresponding manners of other nations, is of little importance.

As affording a curious contrast between the working of a republican government, and one like ours, in which most of the institutions of the middle ages survive, we present our readers with the following extract from the work above alluded to*—with which we shall conclude the present article:—

"5th November 1823.

"I had been at Ballston Spa but a very few days, when a meeting for election, one of the most important that has ever occurred in this country, was held.

This being the last of the four years of the presidency of Mr John Quincy Adams, and he and General Jackson being candidates for the chair for the four years commencing in the month of March next, the people had to give their votes by ballot, the method of voting now almost universal in the large states, for electors of a president and vice-president of the United States. They had also at the same time to give their votes for the governor and lieutenant-governor of the State of New York; for a senator, and representative to the Congress of the United States; for three members of Assembly of the State of New York; for a sheriff; for four coroners; and for the county clerk.

Some short general explanation may be necessary to make the particulars of this election understood.

The North American Confederacy is now composed of twenty-four states; among which, representatives and direct taxes are apportioned according to their numbers, of which, therefore, a census is taken at the end of every term of ten years. Each state, whatever its population may be, has at least one representative in the House of Representatives; and is not entitled to have more than one for every 30,000 inhabitants. The number of representatives was at first between sixty and seventy; it now exceeds 200. Each state, whatever its population may be, sends two senators, and no more, to the Senate of the United States. The Senate of the United States, therefore, at present consists of forty-eight senators.

* Three Years in America, by James Stuart, Esq. 2 vols.—Mr Stuart gives a remarkably clear, candid, business-like account of the Americans—in fact, the only one we have seen, in which the writer gains the entire confidence of the reader as to the impartiality and comprehensiveness of his observations.

The representatives are elected for two, and the senators for six years.

The House of Representatives and the Senate are styled the Congress of the United States.

The mode of election of representatives and senators to Congress is regulated by the legislature of the respective states.

The president and vice-president of the United States are elected for four years by delegates, neither representatives nor senators, appointed by the people of the respective states, according to forms, which, although an attempt has already been made to amend them, have been found troublesome in practice, and will therefore probably be altered.

The powers of the president and of Congress relate to peace and war, the support of the army and navy, the militia, the imposition of taxes for the expense of the general government, contracts for public loans, coining money, regulation of commerce, the post-office establishment, the punishment of piracy, and offences against the law of nations, and the establishment of the necessary tribunals for the adjudication of all cases touching the general constitution, arising between the states themselves, and between citizens of the states and foreign states; but under the express declaration, that all other powers are reserved to the states respectively; and most especially, that Congress shall make no law respecting a religious establishment; and that in all the states a prisoner shall, in criminal trials, have the assistance of counsel for his defence, and that the right of trial by jury in all cases exceeding twenty dollars shall be preserved.

Each of those states, now twenty-four in number, has its own separate government, and (with two exceptions of small states, in which there is no senate, and some other trifling exceptions) its own governor and lieutenant-governor, its own house of representatives and senators, and manages the whole affairs of its municipal government and internal regulation; the establishment of its code of laws, civil and criminal, without the slightest right, or attempt to interfere on the part of the Congress, or of the general government. The president of the United States has no better right to pardon an offender convicted of murder or fire-raising in the State of New York, than he has in England. Neither has the general government the slightest power to put down slavery in any of the states, or to make any regulation as to the liberty of the press.

This distinction is very often overlooked, at least in ordinary conversation, in England. The United States are considered a slave-holding country; while, in point of fact, there is not a slave in Pennsylvania, New England, the State of New York, the new but great State of Ohio, in Indiana, Illinois, or in by far the greatest and freest part of the confederacy. There are as different regulations in the different states as to the liberty of the press, as respecting slavery. The liberty of the press can hardly be said to exist in Louisiana, or Georgia, while in most of the northern states it is enjoyed, almost, I may say, without control.

The union, in fine, is limited to distinct objects. In other respects, the twenty-four states are separate republics, with which the congress and general government cannot in any shape interfere.

In most of the states, Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York State, and a very large portion of the confederacy, elections are conducted by ballot, which is becoming more and more universal; the states of Connecticut, Kentucky, and Louisiana, having lately adopted it instead of the vote viva voce. The right to elect is generally, but not without considerable exceptions in some of the states, bestowed on all males, twenty-one years old, excluding persons against whom infamous punishments have been awarded.

In the State of New York, the Senate consists of thirty-two members, elected for four years; the House of Assembly of 128 members, annually elected. All white men have a right to vote who have resided a year in the state, and half a year in the town and county, where they tender their vote, and are possessed of qualifications, which all have, by payment of a tax, however trifling, on real or personal property, or by being called out to work on the highways. Free men of colour are entitled to vote after three years' residence, provided they are possessed of a freehold estate of the value of 250 dollars.

The State of New York, the population of which now considerably exceeds 1,800,000 persons, and comprehends 46,500 square miles, is divided into fifty-six counties, each consisting of from 700 to 900 square miles.

Each county has its sheriff, coroners, and clerk, and is divided into townships, each containing from seventy to ninety square miles, sometimes a little more, each of which has its supervisors, assessors, clerk, constables, and road-oversers. The townships are arranged in subdivisions, each of which has school-oversers and road-surveysors.

All the appointments are made by the male inhabitants, twenty-one years old. Most of the office-holders, except the sheriffs, who are elected for three years, are appointed every year; but there is no objection to the same persons being re-appointed.

Each township is a district for the elections to the Congress, and to the local state, which take place together at three stations chosen by the town officers, named annually by the people, the election being thus to be completed on 3d, 4th, and 5th November 1828. No voter has in this way to travel above a few miles, in order to exercise his franchise, nor is he necessarily detained from his occupation above a few hours.

Ballston Spa is the county town of the county of Saratoga, which consists of twenty townships, the whole population of the county being, as nearly as can be ascertained from the last census, about 37,000, and that of the township of Ballston about 2000. The officers of that township had thus only in the course of three days to collect the lists for ballot-boxes from about 2000 people; at Ballston itself, probably from a smaller number than 300 persons.

It was on the 5th November that I was present at the election at Ballston Spa, held in one of the hotels, about the door of which twenty or thirty people might be standing. My friend Mr Brown introduced me, and got me a place at the table. I must confess that I have been seldom more disappointed at a public meeting. The excitement occasioned by the election generally was declared by the newspapers to be far greater than had ever been witnessed since the declaration of independence in 1776. And at Ballston Spa, any irritation which existed had been increased by an attack made a few days previous to the election by the local press, and by handbills, on the moral character of one of the candidates—a gentleman who had filled a high office in Congress, and who resided in the neighbourhood. I was, therefore, prepared for some fun, for some ebullition of humour, or of sarcastic remark, or dry wit, to which Americans are said to be prone. But all was dumb show, or the next thing to it. The ballot-boxes were placed on a long table, at which half a dozen of the inspectors or canvassers of votes were seated. The voters approached the table by single files. Not a word was spoken. Each voter delivered his list, when he got next to the table to the officers, who called out his name. Any person might object, but the objection was instantly decided on—the officers having no difficulty, from their knowledge of the township, of the persons residing in it, and to whose testimony reference was instantly made, in determining on the spot whether the qualification of the voter was or was not sufficient. I need hardly say, that I did not attend this excessively uninteresting sort of meeting for any long time; but I am bound to bear this testimony in its favour, that so quiet a day of election, both without and within doors, I never witnessed either in Scotland or England. I did not see or hear of a drunk person in the street of the village or neighbourhood, nor did I observe any thing extraordinary, except the increased number of carriages or waggons of all kinds, three or four of them drawn by four horses, one by six. We were residing close by the hotel where the election took place, and in the evening the tranquillity was as complete as if no election had occurred.

The county canvassers for the twenty townships of this county of Saratoga afterwards met, and made up their returns for the county, in all of which, as well as in the whole of the state, the same quietness and perfect order prevailed. The number of votes given in this state for the electors of the president was 276,176, in a population of upwards of 1,600,000; and that this part of the election was most keenly contested, is obvious from the recorded fact, that the majority for Jackson over Adams in this state only amounted to 5350. The total number of votes given in the presidential election on this occasion was afterwards ascertained to be nearly 1,200,000, in a population of about twelve millions, of which the whole states are composed.

Thus, in a state far exceeding Scotland in extent, and almost equalling it in population, the votes for the chief magistrate of the United States and his substitute—for the governor and lieutenant-governor of the state—for a senator and representatives to Congress—for three representatives to the State of New York—for four coroners, a sheriff, and a clerk to the county—were taken, and the business of the election finished with ease, and with the most perfect order and decorum, in three days. All voted by ballot, which is here considered the only way to obtain independent and unbiased votes; and if so in this country, how much more in the British islands, where the aristocracy and higher orders are so infinitely more powerful, influential, and numerous. The late eminent Dr Dwight, President of Yale College in Connecticut, describes an election meeting in New England very much as I witnessed it here. After declaring that he had never known a single shilling paid for a vote, he says, 'I have lived long in New England. On the morning of an election day, the electors assemble either in a church, or a town-house, in the centre of the township, of which they are inhabitants. The business of the day is sometimes introduced by a sermon, and very often by public prayer. A moderator is chosen. The votes are given in with strict decency, without a single debate—without noise, or disorder, or drink—and with not a little of the sobriety seen in religious assemblies. The meeting is then dissolved; the inhabitants return quietly to their homes, and have neither battles nor disputes. I do not believe that a single woman, bond or free, ever appeared at an election in New England since the colonization of the country. It would be as much as her character was worth.'

The act against bribery in elections, or for any elective office in the State of New York, is extremely strict. Punishment by imprisonment and fine, to be awarded against all persons, whether candidates or their friends, or persons acting for them, who, with a view to promote their election, furnish entertainment, pay, or engage to pay for it, or give compensation of any kind, to any person or persons, in order to promote an election. The expense of printing in all ways, by handbills, &c. is excepted, and to the press, accordingly, the candidates and their friends resort not unsparingly.

Very soon after this election, the excitement created by it appeared to us to have altogether subsided, and no traces of ill humour seemed to remain with those most opposed to each other. They associated with each other as if nothing had happened to interrupt their harmony. We have heard it often observed in this country, that differences on political subjects, at election meetings, are unattended with those estrangements which they occasion elsewhere, where votes, and the rights to vote, are subject of purchase and sale. The truth of this remark was strikingly demonstrated on occasion of La Fayette's arrival in the United States, in the autumn of 1824. At that period, the contest between Adams and Jackson, for the presidency for the four years commencing in March 1825, was carried on with the greatest keenness, and the newspapers were almost filled with statements of the claims of the candidates, and political squibs relative to the election. On La Fayette's appearance, a total change took place. The newspapers closed their columns against all such effusions; the disputes of party seemed to be at an end; the supporters of both candidates vied with each other in showing attentions to the guest of the nation; their broils were forgotten, and they associated together as if no cause of difference existed between them.

La Fayette was himself at Washington on the day when it was announced that Adams was elected, and in the evening present at a large party given by Mrs Monroe, the wife of the president in office. He was there in time to witness the first meeting after the issue of the election was known between Adams and Jackson, who, the moment they recognised each other, hastened to meet, and to take each other cordially by the hand."

LIBERIA.

LIBERIA is the name of a colony of free and civilized blacks, situated on the south-west coast of Africa, between the fifth and seventh degrees of north latitude. It was established eleven years ago, by the voluntary removal of a few negroes from the United States of America, at the instigation of a private association, called the American Colonization Society. The objects of the colony were twofold. The principal one was—to line the coast of Africa, if possible, with a population of civilized negroes, who, by cultivating the arts of peace, and bringing their barbarous brethren to do the same, might form a bulwark for the prevention of the slave trade. The inferior object was to separate the black from the white freemen of America, it being hopeless that the two races, however equal in wealth or education, can ever live amicably together. The colony met with great difficulties at first but it is now in a most prosperous condition. It contains about 2000 settlers, among whom are only two white people; it has already extended its territory for about 150 miles along the coast, and reduced 25,000 native Africans to a relish for the arts of civilized life. The chief town, called Monrovia, consists of neat and comfortable dwellings, has places of worship for Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Baptists with Sabbath, infant, and day schools; publishes a newspaper; and enjoys the advantages of a library and reading-room. The colonists have an independent governor, and freedom of election. During the past year, 26 sail of British, and 32 American vessels visited the port, and the exports of raw produce, including gold dust, amounted to 175,000 dollars. One settler, who a few years since was a slave, has recently completed a coffee-plantation of 20,000 trees. The climate, being that designed by nature for the colonists, agrees with them better than that of America where, at the siege of New Orleans, the cold, it is well known, cut off many black soldiers every night. So lately as July last, the colony was visited by two blacks from the United States, Messrs Simpson and Moore, who had been sent out by a large class of their brethren to inspect the place, with a view to emigration. These men have reported most favourably—

"As a body," they say, "the people of Liberia have risen in their style of living, and their happiness, as a community, far above those of their coloured brethren even the most prosperous of them, that we have seen in the United States. They truly sit under their own vine and fig-tree, having none to molest and make them afraid. We noticed very particularly the moral state of things and, during our visit, saw but one man who appeared to be intemperate, and but two who used any profane language. The Sabbath is very strictly observed, and there is a great attention to religion. We attended church several times, and one of us being a minister of the gospel of the Methodist church, preached three times, to large and attentive congregations. There must have been from three to four hundred at each religious service; all well dressed, and apparently respectable persons. We found only two persons in the colony who expressed any dissatisfaction, and we had much reason to doubt whether they had any good cause for it. The soil at Caldwell and Millsburg is as fertile as we ever saw, and much like the lands on the Mississippi. We saw growing upon it pepper corn, rice, sugar cane, cassada, plantains, cotton, oranges, limes, coffee, peas, beans, sweet potatoes, water melons, cucumbers, sousop, bananas, and many other fruits and vegetables. We saw cattle, sheep, and goats, also swine and poultry in great abundance. Wherever we went, the people appeared to enjoy good health, and a more healthy looking people, particularly the children, we have not seen in the United States."

The slave trade has now entirely ceased along the line of coast occupied by the Liberians, whence formerly ten thousand unhappy creatures were borne annually into bondage. In fact, the colony has done ten times more good, by an expenditure of £27,000 (which is all the cost hitherto), than the British establishments on the same coast have done in twenty years, at an expense of more than as many millions. Nor is this the whole good. The Liberians, in a little while, if increased in number from America, where the free blacks are a very respectable set of men, must penetrate the very centre of Africa, and diffuse over that vast and hitherto hopeless continent the blessings of commerce and instruction. The secret has been at last discovered, and it will not be permitted to fall to the ground.

The American society has sent over to Britain, as its agent, a gentleman of the name of Cresson, who has been making known their views by means of public meetings in various towns of Britain. A meeting was held in Edinburgh, on the 8th of January, where Lord Moncreiff presided, and various other individuals of the highest character in Scottish society expressed a warm interest in the colony. Another meeting, attended by 2500 persons, was held afterwards at Leith. It is Mr Cresson's object, while giving his own services gratuitously, to aid the funds of the society by contributions from Britain.

SLAVERY AT HOME.

UPWARDS of a twelvemonth ago, Mr Sadler, M. P., brought under the notice of Parliament a system of cruelly severe labour, which, he had grounds for believing, prevailed to an immense extent throughout our larger manufactories. We are all accustomed to reflect with pride upon the great system of manufacture which has placed this country at the head of all others in the world, and enabled her to meet expenditures far more than sufficient to break down every other state. But while we used to rejoice in the general results of this industry, we little knew that a great part of it was based upon the miseries of thousands of our fellow-creatures, whose position in the world rendered them slaves in every respect but the name. Evidence has recently been taken on the subject by Parliament, and the result is just given to the world in what is called a Parliamentary paper. Hence it appears that, in many of both the English and Scottish manufactories, large bands of children, from six years of age upwards, are kept at work from thirteen to seventeen hours every lawful day, to the utter exclusion of every thing that comes under the denomination of the enjoyment of life, and, what is still more serious, to the exclusion of all that cultivation of the rational faculties which enables a human being either to act his part well in this life, or to prepare for that which is to come.

To establish the facts of this dreadful system, we shall quote some of the evidence.

Joseph Downe, a worker at Leeds, stated that, in the mill where he worked, the hours of labour were from half-past five to seven, that is, thirteen and a half hours; and if any of the children neglected their work at any period of this long space, they were severely beaten. "I have seen boys," said he, "actually knocked down with a strap; they have been called from their work, flogged, and been knocked down on the floor by the blow of the strap; and when they have been on the floor, they have been beaten till they had risen, and, when they have risen, they have been flogged to their work again, and they would escape as soon as possible from the beating of the overlooker, as they were flogged to their work."

This witness stated, that, when any strangers were to be admitted to the mills, the machinery was made to go more slowly than usual, so as to make the labour of the children appear less severe; the children were also dressed for the exhibition, and the whole place made to have a better appearance. Mr William Osburn, an overseer of the poor in Leeds, stated that no individuals would be allowed any relief in times of distress, by the Leeds Workhouse Board, if they refused to let their children submit to this system of domestic slavery.

As an exemplification of the system in Scotland, we shall quote a considerable part of the evidence of Alexander Dean, an overlooker at Dundee, age going on to twenty-seven, who had been about fourteen years in the flax business. This individual stated, that, in the first mill in which he was employed, namely, that of Duntroon, four miles from Dundee, the children worked not less than seventeen hours a-day, exclusive of meals. Four or five orphans, all that were left alive of about sixteen, supplied by some poor institution in Edinburgh, were there employed.

"Usually for how long a time did they stop?—I could not say for how long a time; there were always some of them deserting and being brought back.

"Speaking of those long hours, how were the children kept in the establishment, they having to labour to such an extent as you have described?—They were kept in a constantly standing posture; no leave was allowed for sitting.

"Were they confined to that sort of work?—Yes; the doors were all locked, both with check and turnkey.

"They were locked up while at their labour?—Yes.

"Did they sleep upon the premises?—Yes; it was upon the very same premises that they slept; the houses were all connected.

"Were those who were immediately under the control of the manager guarded all night?—Yes; there were iron-stanch windows, and the master himself, or his son, attended to locking them up at night, whenever they got their suppers; so that they had no chance of escaping till the morning, when he released them for their next day's employment.

"How were they taken care of on the Sundays then?—It was always one of the sons that staid at home and guarded them on Sunday; he would not suffer them to go to church.

"Were the children and young persons kept down to that work by chastisement?—Yes.

"Were they severely chastised?—Frequently they were; for the least fault they were struck and abused.

"You were speaking about children being prevented from deserting by being locked up, was it often that children made an attempt to escape?—Yes, if they got the least opportunity.

"Where were the hands that did not sleep in the mill sent at night?—The houses which the hands slept in were about fifty yards from the mill.

"What were they called?—Bothies.

"In any of these bothies were the boys and girls mixed up indiscriminately at night?—Yes; I myself, with six boys, was in one apartment with oldish girls.

"What were the ages of those boys so locked up?—From 14 to 16.

"And what were the ages of the females?—From 12 to 14.

"And you state that they were turned indiscriminately into the same bothie?—Yes.

"And locked up there all night?—Yes."

He next got into employment at Birdevy Mill, about four miles from Dundee, where he was a card-winder, and where he was more humanely treated. The hours were about fourteen, excluding meals.

The next mill he went to was Trollick Mill, three miles from Dundee, where the hours of working were also fourteen, excluding meals; amounting altogether to about fifteen hours' confinement.

The next place was Maryfield Mill, about four miles and a half from Dundee, where he was a spinner. His treatment there was harsh—sometimes the hours were sixteen.

"What effect upon the children—the female children more especially—has this long standing to their labour?—It has a great effect. I have observed it at the mill; the feet of the girls have swelled so, that they have been ready to take off their shoes.

"Does it occasion positive deformity sometimes?—Yes, very often; the girls become knock-knee'd and bow-legg'd.

"Has it at all affected you?—Yes; I am very much knock-knee'd.

"Have you seen one of the witnesses in waiting of the name of Openshaw, a boy?—Yes.

"Is there any body that you have witnessed in your neighbourhood that is as strikingly deformed as he is?—A great deal more so: one man that is working now at a mill near Brechin, about 20 miles from Dundee, and who is about 30 years of age. This man does not stand, with his deformity, above four feet six inches high; and, had he grown to his proper height, I think he would have been about five feet eight or nine. He has been in mills since he was five years old, and he is reduced to that state, that he slides about on a stool to do his work; and though he is about 30 years of age, he can now do no more than a girl's work."

The next mill was Strathmartin, distant only half a mile from the former—fifteen hours, exclusive of meals, the time. But the overseers were jealous of their knowing the time.

"After the overlooker found I was possessed of a watch, I had lost the key, and he took the watch and broke it, and gave it me back, and said I had no use for a watch, and chastised me for letting the hands know the time of day."

Here the boys and girls all slept in one apartment, with a small division about four feet high between them.

After staying a year and a half there, he endeavoured to get some other employment, but was forced to return back to Duntroon Mill as overlooker. There the system, since he had been away from it, was worse.

"At what time of the morning did you have to attend your labour there?—I have been called up by the master, who stood at the door cursing and swearing, at three o'clock in the morning.

"How late in the night were you kept at that work?—We were never kept less than till ten and eleven o'clock at night.

"Were the hands principally young ones at that mill?—Yes; there was a great number of them below twelve.

"Were they very poor?—Yes, very poor; the poorest of the poor.

"Where did they come from?—Some from the poor-houses in Edinburgh.

"Were they sent young?—Yes; they came at six and seven years old.

"And they were sent for a stated length of time?—Yes.

"For a number of years?—Yes; I know some that were engaged for three and four years.

"Were those children worked as long as you have been stating?—Yes.

"No exceptions in favour of the younger children and the girls?—Not in the least.

"Was that excessive working accompanied by excessive beating?—Yes, very frequently they were beaten; children were not able to stand the work; and if they had made the least fault, they were beaten excessively.

"Did you ever hear of any one attempting to escape from that mill?—Yes; there were two girls that made their escape from the mill through the roof of the house, and left nearly all their clothes behind them."

No person will have any thing to do with any of the unfortunate wretches so reared, for they are quite helpless.

The flogging, or strapping, is continual, and when it happens to be extreme, the overseer is fined.

"Did you know any individuals brought to trial for inflicting the extreme punishment you have described?—I heard of one; he was an overlooker in Mr Edwards's mill, at West End, Dundee, who was brought before the justice for kicking a girl, who, on being examined before the justice, was fined, but the master returned the fine to the overlooker, and turned away the girl whom he had struck, and also her sister, and two other sisters who were connected with her. Mr Edwards was questioned about it in the Advertiser paper, and he refused an answer; the only reply he made was, that he could do any thing he liked with his own, though four or five suffered by that transaction of taking the overseer to justice for that bad usage."

Thus the overseer is encouraged to violence, and he is paid for making himself the scape-goat of the master, who cannot be touched.

The poor children are hardly able to stand from fatigue, and the overlookers keep continually strapping them, to prevent them from dropping down asleep.

There can be no doubt, we think, that the case thus made out forms a fair subject for legislative interference. "Children," says the Times, "of from six to twelve years of age, who are driven from their scarcely-warmed beds to the mills before day-break, and are wrought till they can no longer stand, or who can only be kept awake at their task by the application of blows and stripes—who have sometimes their bodies maimed, or their lives endangered, by a cruel task-master, when invincible fatigue overpowers the strength of their feeble nature—who struggle with scanty and insufficient food against the effects of an unwholesome atmosphere and a torturing position—who contract diseases, stunt their growth, and acquire deformities by an over-exertion of their frames—who are deprived of all the opportunities of healthy exercise, and all the means of moral instruction, so beneficial or necessary for their time of life—children in this situation, we say, though sold to the factory by the necessities of their own parents, as the African chiefs sold their subjects or captives, are no more free agents than a West Indian gang, and, therefore, for the same reason, ought to be placed under the special protection of the law." What form this protection should take, we need not stop to consider; but it is evident that some protection is necessary. There may perhaps be an opposition on the part of the masters; but if the regulation for restricting the hours of labour be equally enforced, it can do harm to none. There will only be a slight rise in the general prices of manufactured goods; and thus the public will bear the burden of relief. The grinding system is solely the result of undue competition; and once the manufacturers are protected from that, all parties will be advantaged.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

THE subject which lately claimed only the last place in our record, is now advanced by its increased importance to the first. The expected resistance on the part of the South Carolinians to the tariff acts imposed by general Congress, has taken place; and this great nation seems now on the point of a civil war.

The following lucid and temperate explanation of this question, from the Edinburgh Evening Courant, a paper distinguished for good information on subjects allied to political economy, will make it intelligible to the most ordinary understanding:—

"If we consider for a moment the nature of trade, we will at once see the folly and injustice, in any circumstances, of restraining the intercourse between the buyer and the seller. In every trading community an exchange of produce becomes necessary, in consequence of that division of labour which confines every man to his own particular line of industry. Thus the butcher, the baker, the weaver, &c., each following his own occupation, depend on a free exchange of produce for the supply of their wants, and the continuance of their trade; and by impeding that exchange, it is quite evident that we must injure all parties. In like manner, the foundation of trade between different countries is laid in that diversity of soil and climate which gives to each a surplus of its own peculiar productions, and renders a subsequent exchange necessary, that each may dispose of what is superfluous in exchange for what is scarce. Thus France and Portugal abound in wines and fruits, while Great Britain excels in skill and industry; the manufactures of the one are exchanged for the natural products of the other, and both parties benefit by this free exchange. But is it not evident, that, by hindering or interrupting this exchange, we injure all those who depend on it; the wine-growers of Portugal, as well as the manufacturers of Great Britain, by narrowing the market for their produce? Now, all cases of restriction, however involved in complicated detail, finally resolve into this simple principle, namely, that they impede the reciprocal exchange of surplus produce, which is the great stimulus to industry, and are thus detrimental to trade. All commercial restrictions are, therefore, in themselves evils; they are wrong in principle, and in their effects impolitic and unjust. In a country, however, such as Great Britain, where a vast trade has grown up under a system of restriction, where capital to a great extent has been invested, and extensive manufactures have arisen and flourished on the faith of Parliamentary enactments, we must always have respect to existing interests; and if we were suddenly to abolish all restrictions, and to admit a free competition, we would ruin many branches of trade, and the numerous artisans connected with them; and might occasion far greater immediate evils than ever we could hope to compensate by any subsequent improvement.

"But in the United States, restrictions on trade are now introduced for the first time. The American legislators have adopted from choice what we merely tolerate from necessity. In a modern and an enlightened age, they have taken up the obsolete and cast-off errors of former times, and have imposed heavy duties on the import of British goods, for the encouragement of the home manufacturer. The effect of these restrictions is to impose an oppressive duty on the whole community for the benefit of a few. British goods are raised enormously in price, in some cases 50 and even 100 per cent., in order to force the premature growth of manufactures in the United States. The Americans are compelled to buy the inferior workmanship of their own countrymen at a high price, in place of the superior manufactures of Britain at a lower price, and thus, in opposition to the great principles of the American government, to favour a few the many have been oppressed. In the southern states, which have expressed their resolution, and have actually begun to resist the decrees of Congress, the hardship of these restrictions, unjustly imposed on them by their northern countrymen, is exceedingly great. Their trade consists chiefly in the export of their agricultural produce, consisting of tobacco, cotton, grain, rice, lumber, &c.; and they receive in return British manufactures. Hence an import duty on these manufactures is in reality a tax on their own produce. They receive just so much less for the cotton, lumber, tobacco, &c., which they export. No wonder, therefore, that they remonstrate against a tax so grievously unjust and impolitic, which is imposed on them, not for any national advantage, but for the profit of a few. Throughout the extensive region which is watered by the Mississippi and its tributary streams, there are comparatively few manufactures. Agricultural produce is the great staple, which is exported in exchange for manufactures; and all those districts must, of course, be grievously oppressed by this impolitic tax—by the monopoly so imprudently given by the general government to the northern states against those in the south."

It only remains to be stated in explanation, that America has been induced to adopt this unfortunate policy, chiefly by a desire of being independent upon other countries for manufactures, in the event of entering into a war.

In its efforts to resist Congress, the State of South Carolina has very adroitly availed itself of the local legislature, with which, as well as all the other states, it is provided—namely, a kind of inferior parliament for managing matters connected with the state in which it works, and which, though not possessed of any power to resist a law of Congress, has, nevertheless, such minor powers as to give its proceedings in this case an appearance of legality, and also some still more important advantages. For instance, the local legislature can call out the militia of the state, by which it at once erects an armed force against the general government.

At the end of November, the legislature of South Carolina solemnly annulled, so far as that state was concerned, the acts for establishing the tariff; and on the 4th of December, an act was introduced, empowering the governor to declare their independence of, and separation from, the rest of the states, on the first appearance of any military measures for their coercion—also empowering him to raise an army for their protection. An act was at the same time in progress for imposing severe fines upon any custom-house officer or other person who might attempt to levy the obnoxious duties.

In a manifesto afterwards published, "the people of South Carolina, assembled in convention," avow their conviction that "the Federal Government has no shadow of right or authority to act against a sovereign state of the confederacy in any form, much less to coerce it by military force." They further state certain modifications of the obnoxious laws, which would satisfy them: "we will consent," they say, "that the same rate of duty be imposed upon the protected articles, that shall be imposed upon the unprotected, provided that no more revenue be raised than is necessary to meet the demands of the government for constitutional purposes, and provided also that a duty, substantially uniform, be imposed upon all foreign imports."

"If South Carolina," they add, "should be driven out of the union, all the other planting states, and some of the western states, would follow by an almost absolute necessity. Can it be believed that Georgia, Mississippi, Tennessee, and even Kentucky, would continue to pay a tribute of fifty per cent. upon their consumption, to the northern states, for the privilege of being united to them, when they could receive all their supplies through the ports of South Carolina, without paying one cent for tribute?"

After again alluding to their resolution of disavowing themselves from the union at the first appearance of military coercion, they conclude thus: "We have warned our brethren of the consequences of such an attempt. But if, notwithstanding, such a course of madness should be pursued, we here solemnly declare, that this system of oppression shall never prevail in South Carolina, until none but slaves are left to submit to it."

It happens that the annual message of the President of the United States to Congress was sent on the 4th of December, so that some allusion to the proceedings in South Carolina was quite unavoidable in that document. After alluding to many other matters of state—among which the most remarkable, perhaps, are an increase of 30,000 tons in the national shipping, and no less than 40,000,000 of dollars, or nearly £9,000,000 sterling, in the aggregate of exports and imports, during the preceding year—the President states that the discharge of the public debt, which is expected to take place this year, will probably enable Congress to reduce several of the national burdens, and particularly the taxes restrictive of foreign manufactures, which, he explicitly says, no one can wish to see continued further than they may foster a sufficient quantity of domestic manufacture to render the country independent on that score in time of war. While he affirms that the encouragement of domestic manufacture is good in the abstract, he allows that its advantages are perhaps counterbalanced by the spirit of discontent and jealousy which it tends to encourage in a portion of the nation. At the same time, as interests have already grown up under the protective system, it cannot be suddenly abandoned without injustice to many individuals. On this account, as well as for the sake of its abstract advantage, while recommending every modification that may be thought expedient, he declares firmly that the resistance threatened to the protective laws in South Carolina must be put down, either by entreaty, or, if that should fail, by force, such other measures as Congress may deem necessary for the public safety, which is the supreme law, demanding that the interests of the few should in this case be sacrificed.

On the 10th of December, the President addressed to the people of South Carolina a long proclamation, in which he endeavours to argue them out of their position, that one state has a right to resist any act of the general Congress on the plea of its being unconstitutional, and threatens, in the event of their non-submission, to visit them with the vengeance due to their turbulence and rebellion. This result, however, he deprecates in the most ardent terms. The enemies, he says, of the republican government of America, "have beheld our prosperity with vexation they could not conceal; it was a standing refutation of their slavish doctrines, and they will point to our discord with the triumph of malignant joy."

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

Our last paper announced the surrender of the citadel of Antwerp on the 23d December, after a siege of about twenty-one days, the garrison, about 4000 in number, with the commander Baron Chassé, being taken prisoners of war.

The description given of this famous fortress, after having endured the French batteries for three weeks, is very striking. The whole place was a waste of ruins, in so much as hardly to afford any place of shelter for the garrison or its commander. Not a building remains entire, not a beam unscathed by the flames. Churches, barracks, magazines, storehouses, stables, in fact every erection, however magnificent, is perforated by shot, rent asunder by the explosion of shells, or reduced to a smoking and blackened chaos of rubbish, by fire. The casemates are in many places shattered to their very foundation; the blinds and splinter proofs knocked to pieces; and, independent of the breach, the parapets are so defaced as to afford no shelter to the men behind. Notwithstanding this, the fire from the ramparts was maintained with the utmost animation up to the last instant; and though few guns remained serviceable, or at least few could be brought to bear on the breaching and counter batteries, the last twenty-four hours were amongst the most destructive to the besiegers of any of the siege, and the last gun fired carried off the arm of a captain of French artillery.

The Baron Chassé, though conscious of having done his duty, appeared exceedingly anxious to impress, both upon his own nation and government, and upon the English who happened to be at Antwerp, that his resources were in reality exhausted before he surrendered. In particular, he expressed to some of the latter nation a strong hope that his conduct would meet with the approbation of the Duke of Wellington, under whom he had served at Waterloo. On the 24th December, he addressed a statement of the very cogent reasons which had induced him to enter into the capitulation, to the Dutch minister of war. It concludes with the words—"This is the unhappiest day of my life: I could have wished to end it by a glorious death, but I was not permitted."

So far as the testimony of an enemy can go in his favour, Chassé has it. Marshal Gerard, and the Dukes of Orleans and Nemours, paid him a visit on the 24th, and "it is impossible," says an eye-witness, "to give an idea of the ruins through which they were obliged to effect their passage to the casemate in which the General had his quarters. It was an affecting sight to behold the brave veteran in the midst of surrounding ruins, his sole fear that of not having made a sufficiently honourable defence. The Marshal did all in his power to soothe him in his present situation; and on taking leave, he said in a very moving manner, in the presence of a number of Dutch officers, that the fine defence which they had made would always entitle them to the esteem of the French, and that there was not an officer in his army who would not be proud to have them as brothers in arms. 'I honour courage above all things,' added the Marshal; 'and, gentlemen, these ruins are the best proof of that which you have displayed.' The Marshal afterwards went round the citadel, and at the scarp of the Toledo bastion, the half of which had fallen into the ditch, 'It was time,' said he; 'General Chassé has behaved as a brave soldier; he could not have held out another day.'"

For some time after the surrender, an impression prevailed that the King of Holland was highly dissatisfied with the conduct of Chassé. The reverse, however, appears to have been the case. By an order, dated the 25th December, only the second day after the capitulation, his Majesty conferred on the brave General the insignia of Knight Grand Cross of a particular order, which we have not seen specified. The King, however, rejected the capitulation, which, it will be recollected, proposed to liberate the garrison, on condition of the surrender of Lillo and Liefkenshoek, the two remaining forts by which the Dutch monarch continues to command the entrance of the Scheldt. Chassé, therefore, with his men, was dispatched into France, receiving every where on the way those marks of attention which historical notoriety will command for any individual, even where there is small approval of the principles under which he acted.

As the forts Lillo and Liefkenshoek are surrounded for several miles by water, so as to put a land investiture out of the question, the French government immediately resolved to withdraw their army from Belgium, leaving the remainder of the dispute to be settled by diplomacy. On the last day of the year, the citadel of Antwerp was delivered into the hands of the Belgians, and, in three days more, there was hardly a remnant of the army or its materials within the country. In this manner, the French government endeavoured to prove their disinterestedness respecting the Belgian question, against the surmises which had been thrown out as to a design on their part of permanently occupying Belgium for their own advantage.

In pursuance of the views now adopted, a convention was entered into, December 31, by Lord Palmerston, the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and Prince Talleyrand, the French Ambassador, proposing the following nine articles to the Dutch King, as the basis of a final agreement:—

- "1. The forts of Lillo and Liefkenshoek to be surrendered to the Belgian troops within ten days after ratification.
- "2. The navigation of the Meuse to be subjected to the same regulations as those recently established for the Rhine.
- "3. The navigation of the Scheldt to be entirely free till the conclusion of a final treaty between Belgium and Holland.
- "4. The transit of Belgian merchandise to Germany to be free, with the exception of moderate tolls for support of roads, &c.
- "5. Impunity for all political offences in Venloo and Luxemburg.
- "6. Evacuation of Venloo and the Dutch portion of Luxemburg by the Belgian troops.
- "7. Reduction of Dutch army to peace establishment.
- "8. Reduction of Belgian army to peace establishment.
- "9. Restitution to legal owners of Dutch property confiscated by English and French governments."

The King of Holland has not seen fit to accede to all these propositions, but he has, in turn, held out the following terms as those upon which he is willing to close the question:—

- "1. The free navigation of the Scheldt, with a moderate duty.
- "2. The free passage of the Rhine and Meuse, according to the tariff of Mentz.
- "3. The payment of 8,400,000 florins by Belgium, its share of the interest of the debt, with further provisions for its final settlement.
- "4. The reduction of the Belgian army to a peace establishment, with a promise that satisfactory arrangements will be made for the reduction of his own.
- "5. The evacuation of the forts in the Scheldt in three weeks after the ratification of the treaty, and a reference of the question of Luxemburg to the Five Powers and the Confederation."

FRANCE.

EARLY in the month, the question as to the future treatment of the Duchess de Berri was set at rest in the Chamber of Deputies. This unfortunate victim of a state necessity will probably spend the remainder of her life in prison, never again to behold her friends, or the son for whose sake she has done and suffered so much. It seems that the law which expelled the Bourbons from France provided no penalty for their return, but, by making them public enemies of the state, rendered them only liable to be treated as prisoners of war. The Duchess is to be treated in this manner, and, accordingly, will not be brought to trial. Joseph Bonaparte the elder, and eldest brother of Napoleon, has begun to make claims upon the French crown, as the heir of that individual. He will only make himself ridiculous by so doing.

A change has been made in the internal arrangements of the French Ministry, which will probably be attended with advantage to liberal interests. Count D'Argout has become Minister of the Interior, and M. Thiers steps into his place of Minister of Commerce and Public Works. It is in this latter department that it may be hoped, from late indications, that France is about to set an example of liberality to rope, if we may judge from the commercial propositions already laid before the Chamber. The French Ministry were defeated on the 14th, by a majority of 168 against 164, on a question as to some regulations in the election law. In general, however, they command a great majority. A bill passed in the Chamber of Deputies, for abolishing the observance of the 21st of January as a day of national mourning, on account of the execution of Louis the Sixteenth, has not been accepted in the Chamber of Peers.

SPAIN.

will be kept in mind that the King of this country is now putting himself at the head of the liberal element among his subjects, for the purpose of securing his daughter's succession to the crown. On the 1st of January, the Madrid Gazette contained a formal decree by his Majesty, revoking one which was forced on him by the opposite interest during his illness, depriving his daughter of the succession. Ferdinand said to have almost completely recovered his health, and consequently, as might be supposed, the liberal element is waxing stronger. This is testified very significantly by an insurrection of the Carlists, or partisans of his brother. In Toledo, upwards of 1500 these insurgents appeared; but in Madrid, although many persons of distinction have been arrested, the air does not appear to have been formidable. The oppression of this attempt must tend further to increase the strength of the present government, by pressing the Apostolicals who support the views of Don Carlos.

The Queen of Spain has sent £20 to the fund for erecting a monument in Edinburgh to the memory of Walter Scott.

PORTUGAL.

AFTER long conducting his operations by deputy, Don Miguel arrived at Oporto on the 16th December, in order to put himself at the head of his army. Two days after, a party of Don Pedro's troops, consisting of about 800 men, crossed the river, attacked and plundered one of the Oporto Wine Company's stores, and killed one of Miguel's batteries. The royalists made no resistance till the constitutionalists arrived at the top of a hill. They then showed themselves in great force, and drove the party of Don Pedro back with great slaughter. While firing at them in their retrograde passage over the Douro, the batteries did me injury to the British shipping.

The batteries of Don Miguel have latterly been increasing in effect. On the 29th December, the custom-house of Oporto was destroyed by a shell, and many persons continue to be killed and wounded in the streets. The Miguelites suffered some loss on the 8th January, in an ineffectual assault upon the castle of St Foz. The cause of Pedro evidently sinks. He has had to appoint a new commander, General Dignac. His troops seem to be greatly discontented, and to be with difficulty kept in subjection; circumstances which rarely characterise a promising or prosperous cause. The fleet is in no better case. About the beginning of the past month, the second command, Captain Bingham, with 250 sailors, deserted the service. Miguel, however, seems unable to prevent supplies from reaching Don Pedro.

The only hope of the friends of the constitutional cause in Portugal seems to be the recent arrival of Lord Hervey from Madrid, at Lisbon, upon some business of such importance as to induce the Ministry to send for Don Miguel. Some compromise is expected; but we cannot see any reason Don Miguel may have at the present moment for entering into any negotiation favourable to the cause of his niece.

GREECE.

SOME very singular accusations have been brought against the Russian Admiral Ricord, who is commanding in the Mediterranean. It is alleged that he has been intriguing with certain members of the Greek Senate; that they have been induced by his persuasions to secede from the common cause of their country, and ten of these Senators are said to have boasted the standard of insurrection, and to have proposed to appoint the Admiral President of Greece. These proceedings have, however, it is said, been disavowed by the Emperor of Russia, who has expressed the strongest disapprobation of the conduct of the Admiral. Yet it is scarcely credible that this officer could have meddled in such delicate matters without some indirect authority, as, in this case, his imprudence must have insured his immediate disgrace. Otto of Bavaria, the juvenile king appointed to rule over Greece, is represented, by the latest accounts, as on the point of sailing from Brindisi, with his regency, for Napoli di Romania, which, we suppose, is to be the seat of his government. The Greeks, in general, are said to be inspired by the best feelings towards their future sovereign.

TURKEY.

THE great army assembled by the Sultan as the last resource of his tottering empire, and of which the numbers and discipline were so much vaunted, has been encountered by Ibrahim in the defiles of Mount Taurus, and been totally defeated and dispersed; the Grand Vizier has been made prisoner; and a large portion of the vanquished army has consented to serve under Ibrahim. The last effort of the Turkish empire to repel the invader has thus signally failed; and, according to the latest accounts, Ibrahim was in full march with his victorious army on Constantinople. We know no particulars of the battle, nor of the place where it was fought; but we were previously informed that Ibrahim had concentrated his force in the defiles of Taurus, where he had no doubt chosen the ground on which Turkey was to fight the last battle for her independence; and it was not to be imagined that this new and hasty levy of Turkish militia would be a match for the veteran troops of Ibrahim, trained originally in the Arabian, and afterwards in the sanguinary service of the Grecian war, and where Ibrahim himself displayed all the talents of a consummate general. From the time of his capturing Acre, his progress has been rapid and brilliant; he has advanced, in one continued course of conquest, more than 1000 miles, as far as Konieh; he has overrun Syria, and part of Asia Minor; has discomfited armies and taken towns; and has now cleared his way to the ancient capital of the Cæsars, whose tottering empire was assailed exactly from the same quarter as is now the modern empire of Turkey. It is evident that the Sultan has made his last effort, and that no force now opposes the advance of Ibrahim to Constantinople. It is stated that in his extremity he has accepted the offer of Russian aid; that a fleet of thirty-six vessels, under the command of Admiral Greig, has been equipped for the purpose of transporting 12,000 troops to Constantinople; and that Russian armies are in motion with the same view of protecting the capital. The object of Pozzo di Borgo, at his late visit to London, is also said to have been, to make some arrangement respecting the future destinies of Turkey, for it is certain that Russia would not be permitted by the other European powers to take possession of that country; nor will Ibrahim be allowed to extend his conquests as far as Constantinople. But the new arrangements that must be made will form an important subject of deliberation among the powers of Europe, as it is not easy to see on what principle they will proceed in the re-casting of the Turkish empire, and in making a new distribution of power in the East.—Edinburgh Courant.

ENGLAND.

TOTAL ABOLITION OF THE NEWSPAPER TAX.

THE Town, a respectable London Sunday newspaper, communicates the important intelligence (obtained through Mr Bulwer, M. P.) that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has resolved to take off the whole of the newspaper stamp-duty, charging only a small sum—a penny, it is expected—for conveying papers by post. The advertisement duty to continue as heretofore. For this measure, which is to be carried into effect soon after the meeting of Parliament, the public are in a great measure indebted to Mr Bulwer. On the present occasion, it may be proper to make extensively known the charges made by the American government for conveying newspapers. They are as follow:—For each newspaper, not carried out of the state in which it is published, or if carried out of the state, but not carried above 100 miles, 1 cent, that is, a halfpenny. Over 100 miles, and out of the state in which it is published, 1½ cent, that is, three farthings. It may further be mentioned that America possesses a system of carriage for other periodicals highly deserving to be copied in this country. Magazines, and pamphlets published periodically, are carried within 100 miles at 1½ cent per sheet—over 100 miles, 2½ cents per sheet; and pamphlets, not periodical, are carried relatively at 4 and 6 cents per sheet. The Town informs us, however, that the Chancellor has no intention of adopting this latter regulation.

REVELATIONS OF MINISTERIAL OPINION.

WE recorded last month the determination of Lord Althorp, so far as he was concerned, to render the reform bill a final measure, and the strong antipathy by Mr Stanley to the mode of voting by ballot. These declarations having excited a pretty general expression of displeasure throughout the country, it has apparently been found necessary by the Ministry to throw out some opinions on the other side. Besides several attempts in the Globe (the organ of the government) to explain away the obnoxious expressions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Powlett Thomson, at a dinner given to him and his colleague at Manchester, Thursday, December 27, took occasion to say that he did not know what was meant by final measures—he knew of no bound to the march of human improvement. He professed himself a friend to the ballot, and further avowed himself to be of opinion that the East India Company's monopoly ought to be revised, so as to open the market of China for our general commerce—and also that some alteration should take place in the present corn law. Upon the last topic there must, however, be some division of opinion in the administration, as Sir James Graham, in addressing his Cumberland constituents, thus expressed himself:—"All other trades are protected in one way or other, and I do not think that agriculture should go unprotected. (Cheers and disapprobation.) I must frankly say, I am not inclined to alter the present law. I am sure you are too intelligent a body of men to refuse to listen to reason; and if you will but have patience for a moment, I will state to you shortly my reasons for holding this opinion. (Uproar.) There is one advantage in the law as it now stands, which could be derived from no other system, and that is, that as the price in the home market increases, the duty on the foreign corn decreases, which strongly tends to keep prices equal on the average of years. (Hisses.) Now, a fixed duty would either never be imposed, when the price rose to a great amount, or it would be for ever bringing the government in collision with the consumer. I pronounce only my own individual opinion, when I say, that the present system is the best that could be devised."

THE JEWS.

WE understand that one of the earliest motions of importance in the new Parliament will be for a removal of the civil disabilities of the Jews, and that very little doubt is entertained of its success.—Sun.

We are acquainted with a circumstance somewhat corroborative of this statement—namely, that, on the question being put to him by a gentleman of the Hebrew nation in this city, the Lord Advocate promised to support such a bill, if brought into Parliament.

[If there be any thing alarming to British pride or to British interests in the great wealth of the Jews, to give them all the privileges of citizens is the true and only way to diminish the evil. The real cause of the pecuniary supremacy of this extraordinary people is the exclusive direction of all their energies, all their genius, all their enthusiasm, upon that point alone, while the energies, genius, and enthusiasm of other men, are squandered, through the channels of learned professions, and of state employment, upon objects more worthy, perhaps, but which do not in general tell so well for themselves. Open the same channels to the Jews, and from that time forth, wealth will be only one of the objects of their ambition, and they will be assimilated, in a great degree, to the rest of the community.]

Their Majesties remain at Brighton, visiting, dining, and driving. The guests at the Pavilion are decidedly more Ministerial and less conservative than has lately been the case.

The King and his Children.—The King has given to Lord Munster, since his accession to the throne, an excellent house, furniture, &c., and sums of money little, if any, short of £30,000. To the King's other sons his Majesty has been, if not equally munificent, as generous as the circumstances would permit. Lord Frederick Fitzclarence receives an allowance of £800 or £1,000 a-year, besides a gift of an excellent house. Lord Adolphus has the same allowance, and has had many thousand pounds given him at various periods as presents. And Lord Augustus has a similar allowance. Besides which, all have been placed in or advanced to distinguished rank in their several professions, through the influence and the unremitting exertions on their behalf of their royal parent. Nor have the King's daughters any reason to complain of his Majesty's conduct towards them. They have all a handsome annual allowance; in addition to which Lady Sidney has received the most generous assistance in the repair of the magnificent seat of the Sidneys at Penshurst. Lady Mary Fox has been presented with an excellent house in the vicinity of London. Lady Errol, whose lord is Master of the Horse to the Queen, has apartments in St James's, and a beautiful house in Richmond Park. Lady Augusta Erskine has, in addition to a settlement, we know not exactly of what kind, received assistance (we believe) in the purchase of a beautiful villa. And Lady Falkland, in addition to the same allowance as all her sisters, had, we hear, £10,000 settled on her at her marriage.

The London Gazette of the 22d ultimo contained the appointment of the Earl of Munster to be governor and captain, and also constable of Windsor Castle, both vacant by the death of the Marquis of Conyngham; and Lord Frederick Fitzclarence to be lieutenant of the Tower of London, in the room of his brother, the Earl of Munster. Some remark has been excited respecting these appointments, on account of their being merely nominal offices, with salaries attached, and, therefore, considered improper to be kept up.

The House of Commons.—In the English counties, out of 102 seats, 45 are new members, or persons unknown to the last Parliament. In the English boroughs, 144 new members are introduced, the whole number being 327. In the Welsh counties, there are 6 changes out of the 15 members, and the 14 borough seats of the principality have new occupants. In Scotland, 30 county members give 13 changes, and there are 15 new members out of the 23 representatives for Scottish boroughs. In the counties of Ireland, out of 64 members, 38 maintain their places, and only 12 borough members keep their seats out of 41, which is the whole number. If, therefore, the new Parliament be not improved, it cannot be for lack of change in the persons who compose it. With regard to the comparative strength of parties, it is impossible to give any thing like an accurate estimate. The Ministerial members in Ireland are 42, but they differ from the Ministry on many points: on the education and tithe questions at home, on further extension of the franchise in England, and on several matters of colonial and foreign policy. The pledged Repealers are only 38, as far as we can discover; but a large portion of the Ministerial majority have promised to support a Repeal of the Union, if the Reform Parliament shall refuse or neglect to do justice to Ireland. The Conservatives amount in all to 149; and they have lost the acumen of Sugden, and the humour of Wetherell—the manly candour of Sir George Murray, and the spirit of Sir George Clerk, as well as many other partisans whose loss will be felt by the Opposition.—Atlas.

The following is the Ministerial circular addressed to the members of the House of Commons, on the opening of the session:—

“Sir—Parliament will meet on the 29th inst., and immediately proceed to the election of the Speaker. The other business of the session will not, however, commence till the beginning of the following week. I have taken the liberty to give you this information, and, at the same time, beg leave to request your early attendance, as matters of importance must be brought under the consideration of the house at the commencement of the session.—I have, &c. (Signed) ALTHORP.”

As far as present appearances and reports go, there are likely to be fewer petitions against returns to the next Parliament than have ever been known.

The O'Connells.—In the new Parliament there are seven members of the O'Connell family:—1st, There is the head of the house himself, the Great Agitator, member for the city of Dublin; 2d, There is Maurice O'Connell, eldest son of the aforesaid, member for Tralee; 3d, Comes his second son, Morgan O'Connell, member for the county of Meath; 4th, Is John O'Connell, third son of the said Daniel, member for Young-hall; 5th, Christopher Fitzsimon, son-in-law of Daniel, member for the county of Dublin; 6th, W. F. Finn, brother-in-law of Daniel, member for the county of Kilkeny; 7th, Morgan John O'Connell, nephew of Daniel, member for Kerry. In addition to these seven, there are three cousins returned upon the same interest, making in all ten members of the reformed Parliament returned by one man.

It has been rumoured that the draft of the bill for a reform in the church has been for some time past in possession of Ministers, and that its provisions have been made known to the heads of the establishment. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York, the Primate of Ireland, and the Bishop of London, are the only Prelates who are to have seats in the House of Lords, and this for the purpose alone of watching over the affairs of the church, and they are neither to speak nor to vote on lay matters. According to report, the Prelacy all approve of the bill. Another report states that the Ministerial scheme of church reform will equalize the Bishops, abolish translations, extinguish all pluralities except in very small livings, and set the tithe-question at rest on the principle of commutation, not composition.

On Monday the 21st, a large and respectable meeting of the constituency of London held a meeting, over which the Lord Mayor presided, and where three new reforms, shorter Parliaments, the ballot, and the repeal of the assessed taxes, were approved of.

The quarterly account of the state of the revenue, up to the 5th of January 1833, exhibits a decrease, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, of L.29,473. But the increase on the whole year amounts to L.546,169. The finances of the country, therefore, are on the whole in a prosperous condition. There is an actual surplus of income over expenditure, for the year ending 10th October 1832, of L.467,391, 9s. 7d.; and the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund have applied one-fourth of that sum, or L.116,847, 17s. 4d., to the reduction of the national debt.

The Earl of Denbigh, a reformer, has been appointed by the Queen as her Chamberlain, in place of Lord Howe.

The knighthood of Sir John Campbell, on his being appointed Solicitor-General, was not gazetted for a month after it took place, from his not paying the fees, amounting to L.108, which are exacted on such occasions for the benefit of the King's servants.

The London Gazette of January 15 announced the following peerage creations:—The Marquis of Stafford to be Duke of Sutherland; the Marquis of Cleveland to be Baron Raby and Duke of Cleveland; C. W. Western, Esq., to be Baron Western.

Mr Colburn, the bookseller, proprietor of the Court Journal, has been sentenced by the Court of King's Bench to pay a fine of L.100 to the King, for having published in that paper, some months ago, a paragraph, implying that the Duchess of Richmond had eloped with a captain in the army. The two proprietors of the John Bull were fined of the same sum for copying the paragraph in that paper.

January 11, Mr James Farquharson, who reported for the Times some proceedings which took place at a meeting of the Duke of York's creditors, was committed to the Fleet prison for contempt of court. Mr Farquharson refused to give up the name of the gentleman who had furnished him with the information, considering that it would be a dishonourable breach of private confidence to do so.

Eight thousand four hundred attorneys have taken out their annual certificates this year.

A violent shock of an earthquake was felt at Swansea on the morning of the 30th of December. On the same morning, shocks were felt at Neath, Llandovery, Carmarthen, and other places in Wales, and also in Ireland, at Castlebridge, in the county of Wexford.

The stock of the West India Dock Company has fallen 40 per cent. in one year—from 116 to 76. At a meeting of proprietors, January 11, the dividend was only 2 per cent., instead of 3, which was the dividend last year.

The trade of hackney coach driving has just been thrown open in London. No fewer than 500 new coaches have started during the first week thereafter.

The Old Bailey sessions, which commenced January 3, presented the smallest list of criminals known for many years past—only 180.

Apparatus has lately been constructed in Brompton church for the purpose of warming it with hot air; and in order to guard against accident by fire, a wall was built round the furnace. The man employed in the structure, which is formed of bricks and Roman cement, continued steadily at his work by the light of a candle until it was complete; and it was not until he had inserted the last brick, and was as perfectly “built in” as ever an unhappy martyr in the days of persecution, that he discovered his error, and remembered he was working within the circle instead of out. His first impulse was to pull out the last few bricks, and thus make himself a place of exit; but it was now too late; the cement had already hardened, and defied all his efforts to undo it. In this distressing dilemma he remained for a considerable time, calling in vain for help. His pitiable situation was at length discovered by one of the churchwardens and the sexton, who, after considerable difficulty, succeeded in extricating him from his imprisonment.

Seizures for Unstamped Newspapers.—In the course of the past month, the government has done two acts of justice to the proprietors of newspapers, which have been long and loudly called for. Mr Hetherington, the publisher of an unstamped newspaper called the Poor Man's Guardian, has been apprehended, and committed to Clerkenwell Jail, for L.40 of penalties awarded against him at the Bow Street Office, for infringing upon the law in this manner. In Glasgow, also, where a newspaper, called the Loyal Reformer's Gazette, has been published for many months without stamps, the printers, Robert Muir and Henry Gowans, and the editor, Mr Peter M'Kenzie, were apprehended, and lodged in jail, by virtue of a writ issued from the Scottish Exchequer for a debt due by them to the Crown of L.2100.

[There can be no doubt that the present newspaper stamp duty is one of the cruelest and most misplaced of all taxes; but yet, while the law so stands, it is clear that it ought to fall alike on all men in this branch of trade. The measures now taken by the government are to be approved of, not as in the least degree hostile to the diffusion of political information and discussion, but as a protection to the many respectable individuals who are compelled to pay the tax.]

Flaxseed.—The Lords of the Treasury have authorised the importation of flaxseed into this country from Holland, for home use, in neutral vessels.

The stuff trade of Halifax and Bradford is not so lively as it has been, but the general opinion is, that more business is doing than is usual at this time of the year.—Halifax Guardian.

The silk weaving of the different towns round Manchester was never known to be so brisk at Christmas before. Wages are very low; but there is an expectation of an advance in the spring.—Leeds Mercury.

We have much pleasure in being able to state, that a slight increase has taken place in the price of iron, which, although at present confined to particular works, augurs well for a general rise in the spring.—The Cambrian.

On the evening of Wednesday, 19th December, a young man, a sailor, named William Couch Danby, was murdered at Enfield Chase. The face of the deceased was found much slashed, and in the throat was a deep stab, as if given by a knife. He had been drinking on the previous evening with four low men, named Johnson, Fare, Cooper, and Wagstaff. The evidence of the third person, at the coroner's inquest, threw the guilt on the two first, who were, accordingly, tried at the Old Bailey, January 4, Johnson as principal, and Fare as accessory before the fact. It appeared in evidence, that the former committed the murder in the most deliberate manner. Being found guilty, he was executed on Monday, January 7. Fare was acquitted.

Three men, named Jerrard, Brooks, and Monckton, of Taunton, were committed to jail on Monday the 21st ult., on the charge of having murdered a drummer, named Patrick Chashey, twenty-four years ago. On the 17th instant, Jerrard, who is the landlord of the Black Boy public house in Taunton, said, in a fit of drunkenness, that he knew who had murdered the drummer, but that he was not the murderer himself. These words were carried to the authorities, who immediately took him into custody, together with Brooks a pauper, and Monckton a butcher. At the time of the murder, all these men, with another named Way, since dead, were suspected; but, after a slight investigation, were released. The man who was supposed to have been murdered was found in the river; but his body was so much decomposed and bruised, that the surgeon could not be positive that murder had been committed; and the coroner's jury who sat upon the body returned a verdict of “found drowned.” The three suspected men have been privately examined, but what was elicited is not known as yet.

On Monday night, the 14th January, there took place in Liverpool one of the most destructive fires that has happened for many years. It broke out in the New Quay, and, after rapidly destroying several shops, spread to a cotton warehouse belonging to Mr Harbord, and from thence to others, all of which were consumed in a very brief space of time. While the flames were devouring these highly combustible materials, the sky was illuminated almost as brightly as it is by day, while the nether air was filled with floating masses of ignited cotton, that threatened destruction to all within their reach. After raging almost uncontrolled for four hours, the flames were got under, but not till property worth about L.300,000, of which L.154,000 was insured, had been destroyed. Ten thousand bags of cotton, equal only, however, to the consumption of one week, with seven hundred hogsheads of sugar, and a large quantity of hides, tallow, rum, hemp, indigo, &c., were burnt. One man was killed, and seven wounded and hurt.—On Friday the 18th, another fire occurred at Liverpool, by which the premises of Mr Benjamin, dealer in marine stores, value L.400, were completely destroyed.

A gentleman named Linguard landed lately at Dover, and remained in a hotel eight days without taking any food, though he seemed in no want of money. He was afterwards induced to taste something, but, nevertheless, died on the 13th.

According to the Leipsic Gazette of the 10th instant, Charles the Tenth is suffering from severe attacks of the gout.

The King of Sardinia has granted an unconditional amnesty to all the Piedmontese compromised by the insurrection of 1821; but the insurgents cannot return till the expiration of three years.

The following information has been received relative to the number of vessels which have passed the Sound to and from the Baltic in the last and preceding year.

SHIPS OF ALL NATIONS WHICH PASSED THE SOUND TO AND FROM THE BALTIC, IN THE YEARS 1831 AND 1832.
Nations.	1831.	1832.

From this official statement it will be seen, that the general trade to and from the Baltic has much decreased within the last year, there not having passed through the Sound so many vessels by 736 as in the year 1831. Considerable increase in the Dutch, Norwegian, Danish and French vessels passing the Sound, occurred in the last year, and the principal decrease was in British, Swedish, and Hanoverian vessels.—Morning Herald.

The consort of the King of the Belgians is officially announced to be pregnant.

It is stated in Galigiani's Messenger, that the French government has it in contemplation to effect a reduction of 100,000 men in the infantry, and 26,000 in the cavalry.

IRELAND.

THE system of violence and agitation which generally prevades this unhappy country, has, during the last month experienced a great and alarming increase. In a large portion of the island, the bonds of social life may be said to have become completely dissolved. The population roam perpetually in large bands, for the purpose of committing violence upon all who are obnoxious to them, and especially the clergy, and others who are concerned in the levying of tithes. There is not only no protection for life or property from the midnight murderer, but the guilty persons, though well known to thousands, cannot be brought to justice. The witnesses and jury are awed by threats of death, which daily experience shows not to be vain threats, from condemning the criminals, or, though convinced of their guilt. Many of the jurors prefer paying the penalty to the risk of their perilous duty. Hence violence ranges uncontrolled over the land. No one dare pay tithes, nor take land under certain circumstances, and tithe-proctors and process-server and other obnoxious individuals, are daily murdered in bands of conspirators who defy the law. The seizure of arms is also carried to an extent unknown before. Not only are houses entered, and rifled of their arms, but more daring outrages are committed, in order to procure these necessary implements of ulterior mischief. In Calow County it is mentioned that 21 houses were entered in one night; and the terrified inmates were compelled to swear on their knees whether or not they had arms. In illustration of the disturbed state of the country, it is mentioned in the Dublin Evening Post, that “the can boat from Ballinasloe was stopped, the insurgents having previously ascertained that it contained 14 stand of arms belonging to the waterguards; a party well armed entered, smashed through the cabins, placed the command of the boat under arrest, with two bayonets at his bosom and possessed themselves of the arms. This occurrence we are assured, by a gentleman who was present, with a quarter of a mile of the police station.” The houses of the gentry are in general barricaded for defence against nocturnal attacks. The clergy are flying for refuge to Dublin or to Britain, glad to abandon both the spiritualties and the temporalities of their office, so that they may only save their lives. The burning of farm buildings, the houghing of cattle, and arbitrary demands of money, or other specified articles from individuals, under pain of death, which are generally complied with, complete this dreadful picture of internal misery.

In Dublin, on the other hand, Mr O'Connell has been employing the interval between the elections and the meeting of Parliament, in organizing a new society for the repeal of the Union, and in holding what he styles a National Council, composed of members of Parliament favourable to that political object. The society is styled the Irish Volunteers, after the militia body of that name who, in 1782, wrought so much upon the terrors of the British government, and achieved so much for the patriotic cause in Ireland. It is said that there is at present no law to put down this association. The National Council is also calculated to awaken associations of a patriotic kind, dazzling the mind with recollections of a patriot's Parliament, and suggesting the wish that that body were restored. In the midst of all his agitations, Mr O'Connell has addressed a letter to the people of Ireland, calling upon them, in the most earnest terms, to give up the system of violence which they have been practising, as it can only place a power in the hands of their enemies to keep them down, and to prevent all political improvement—especially to prevent, what he desires them now to consider as the grand object of their lives, the repeal of the Union.

[It is expected that some measures for the correction of this awful state of things in Ireland will be among the first things that the government will lay before the new Parliament. The suspension of the habeas corpus act is FEBRUARY, 1833.

ked of as preliminary to all other measures; and we not doubt, that, with the prospect of ultimate concessions to Ireland, the people of Great Britain would afford sufficient support to the Ministry to enable them to carry at strong measure into effect. It must be evident, however, to all who fully, and without party prejudice, consider the state of public feeling in both countries, that nothing but the actual abolition of those institutions and regulations which have exasperated the Irish, has even a chance of producing real quiet. An apparently well-informed person, writing from the south of Ireland to the Editor of the Globe newspaper, says—If government introduce the subject of abolition of tithes, vestry cesses, ministers' money, a change in the law and jury laws, and the election of magistrates by the taxpayers, I think that the agitation of the question of tithes would subside, the angry waters of political strife be quieted, and the swollen turbulence of political demagogues would soon meet its level." On this the Spectator remarks—"There can be no doubt that Ireland will be in a disturbed state until all these reforms are effected. Whether she will then be tranquil, is a matter of much greater uncertainty." No doubt, that continuity is uncertain: the removal of what has occasioned it does not necessarily make the pain cease. Here is at the great difficulty about Ireland: it is so far wrong, that it is almost hopeless to attempt any measure of reformation. It is so furious, that there is no hope of pacifying it. Whoever shall be the happy instruments of pacifying this country upon the same footing of content, industry, and prosperity, as Great Britain, must not act from a desire of seeing the results of their efforts. They must be content to hope that their services will be appreciated, and their monuments raised, after several generations have passed away.]

SCOTLAND.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY CHAIR.

THE appointment of a successor in this chair to the late Sir John Leslie has excited much interest in Scotland during the past month. The patrons are the Magistrates and Town Council of Edinburgh; the candidates were Sir David Brewster, Mr. Galloway of Andhurst College, and Mr. J. D. Forbes. Both on account of his great reputation as a man of science, and his connection with the Liberal interest, Sir David Brewster enjoyed the cordial suffrages of the citizens at large; the patrons, however, or a majority of them, preferred Mr. Forbes. Their reasons for so were, that Sir David was 57, and Mr. Forbes only 23; and that Sir David, while his reputation as a man of science was of the highest order, did not possess the qualifications most immediately necessary in a public lecturer and teacher—which qualifications, they felt convinced, belonged to Mr. Forbes. The non-admirers of the Council insinuated that Mr. Forbes's connection with a Tory family (being younger brother of the present Sir J. S. Forbes, banker), formed another reason for giving him their support; but this is a point which every candid person must leave between themselves and their consciences. In order to prove his ability to teach a class, Sir David had proposed to deliver two lectures in the College; but when he understood that a majority were adverse to his pretensions, he withdrew his name as a candidate. The Merchant Company, the High Constables, and other popular bodies, including a portion of the students in the College, hereupon held meetings, at which they prepared petitions, praying the Council to delay in their choice. These petitions, however, were treated by the Council as impertinent, and it was resolved to proceed to the election on the day formerly appointed—namely, the 30th ult.

THE JEWS' HARP.

A MR EULENSTEIN has lately been astonishing the inhabitants of Edinburgh, by his varied and brilliant performances on this hitherto humble instrument. "The ingenuity of Mr. Eulenstein," says a newspaper critic, "is surprising, whether we look to the extraordinary skill displayed in the use of the instrument, the brilliant execution, or the perfection of the melody, and particularly of the softer tones, which are brought out with peculiar taste and sweetness, the notes dying away on the ear somewhat like the refined cadences of the Eolian harp." The same writer continues to say—"Besides its qualities as a musical instrument, the Jews' harp is curious, as illustrating some of the doctrines and laws of acoustics, and it has been the subject of several lectures and discussions at the Royal Institution of London. It partakes of the nature both of a wind and a stringed instrument, and hence the notes sometimes resemble those of a trumpet, and at others the finest tones of the violin and piano-forte. It is the same principle that has lately been applied in the beautiful instruments of the Euphonia and Eolina." The success of Mr. Eulenstein upon this instrument has led us into a train of reflection, that may be attended with very beneficial results to society. In the rise of the trump we see the fall of the cigar. Should the instrument become fashionable, as it deserves to be, the young men, we can foresee, will by and bye prefer it greatly, as an affectation, to rolled tobacco, and thereby, while regaling themselves, will give pleasure rather than pain to others. Each youth, instead of going puffing along with his cigar, to the annoyance of all around or behind him, will be twanging his Jews' harp, so that the whole street will be one universal orchestra from end to end. To save discord, the police might easily manage to enforce a few regulations as to the tunes. Boards might be carried on the tops of poles, intimating that "Katie Bearde" was to be played on this street from twelve to two; "Brose and Butter" to be predominant from two to four; and "Maggie Lauder" to reign supreme from four to six. Thus would be produced a perpetual concert, which, considering the improvement of the instrument, and, above all things, the relief from cigars, would certainly be in the highest degree delightful to the citizens, and even in some measure attractive to strangers.

SCOTTISH REPRESENTATIVE PEERS.

Viscount Strathallan	43
Lord Forbes	41
Lord Gray	53
Lord Saltoun	52
Lord Sinclair	42
Lord Elphinstone	47
Lord Colville	33

As all these noblemen except one (Lord Elphinstone) are anti-Ministerialists, the Scottish Peerage must be considered as having given a very decisive proof of their sentiments respecting the late measures. Two Ministerial candidates, the Marquis of Queensberry and Lord Napier, who were in last Parliament, received on this occasion only 36 votes each. Other two Ministerial Peers, Falkland and Belhaven, who represented the Peerage in last Parliament, did not come forward on the present occasion, in consequence of their having been created British Peers. The four new representatives elected on this occasion are Airly, Orkney, Sinclair, and Elphinstone.

GENERAL ELECTION.

THE list given in our last publication was only deficient in some of the Irish returns, and in that for Orkney and Shetland. We now complete the list.

ORKNEY AND SHETLAND.

THE election for this county has been attended with unusual circumstances. The candidates were Mr. Traill, a friend of the Ministry, and Mr. Samuel Laing, a reformer of a somewhat more ardent complexion, brother to the late Mr. Malcolm Laing, author of the History of Scotland during the seventeenth century. Mr. Traill had most influence in Shetland, and Mr. Laing in Orkney. On account of the great distance between the two groups of islands (110 miles), and the variable chances of navigation, a steam-boat was brought to Orkney for the purpose of carrying the poll-books with as much dispatch as possible from Shetland to Orkney, so as to allow the whole to be summed up, and the election to be declared within the time specified by the act. Unfortunately, however, the steam-boat proved useless; the poll-books were too late in arriving from Shetland; and Mr. Laing, finding himself in a majority of 31 votes in Orkney, demanded to be returned as duly elected. The sheriff-substitute, Mr. Charles Shirreff, refused to declare the election till the poll-books should arrive from Shetland, in which proceeding he had the support of an opinion from the Lord Advocate; and Mr. Laing protested, and had himself chaired by the people as their member. The poll-books, arriving on the 13th, three days beyond time, gave a majority for Mr. Traill, upon the whole, of eleven; and on the 15th, the sheriff-substitute proceeded to the hustings at Kirkwall, for the purpose of returning that gentleman. He was assailed, however, by a mob of nearly a thousand persons, armed with staves, who subjected him and his friends to a great deal of violence, and were only prevented by main force from taking his life. He succeeded, with great difficulty, in proclaiming the return of Mr. Traill, and immediately took refuge in his own house. The local authorities were not for some days possessed of sufficient force to take any of the rioters into custody. Mr. Laing has published a pamphlet, imputing every thing but malversation of office to the Lord Advocate, for his "unconstitutional interference" in this election.

Jan. 1. At Haddington, the New Year was signalled by a splendid act of charity. An excellent dinner, consisting of bread, beef, and broth, was served out to no fewer than nine hundred individuals, whose circumstances rendered them objects of charity. The money expended on the occasion was raised by a collection made at the door of the Town-house during the days of poll for the county. There were also upwards of a hundred tons of coals divided amongst needy families.

2. At a meeting of the Presbytery of Glasgow, Principal McFarlane, agreeably to an intimation at a previous meeting, proposed a petition to the House of Commons, highly approving of what had been done by the Sabbath Committee of the late House of Commons, and entreating the Parliament about to assemble to continue their attention to this subject; of which the Presbytery unanimously approved. The presentation of the petition was undertaken by Mr. Ewing, Lord Provost, M.P.—A committee was appointed by the Town Council of Edinburgh to aid the Lord Advocate in preparing his expected measure for the reform of the Scottish burghs.

3. An extensive upholstery establishment in Warwick Street, Glasgow, belonging to Mr. James Herbertson, was destroyed by fire; the property insured.—A dinner given at Dalkeith, by nearly 200 of the Mid-Lothian constituency, to Sir John Dalrymple, M.P. for the county; Sir Thomas Dick Lauder in the chair.

4. A dinner given at Musselburgh, by 150 of the constituency of that town and Portobello, to their representative Mr. J. A. Murray; Gabriel Wilson, Esq. in the chair. On the ensuing Monday and Tuesday, Mr. Murray gave an excellent dinner of soup, beef, and bread, to 1018 poor families in Leith and Newhaven.—An address was sent from Edinburgh, congratulating Mr. Cobett on his return for Oldham, and signed by between four and five hundred individuals.

11. A dinner given in the Assembly Rooms at Edinburgh, to Mr. Blair, the unsuccessful candidate for the representation of the city. Five hundred gentlemen attended. The chairman, Sir F. W. Drummond, Bart., used these remarkable expressions:—"We do not come here as professed opponents of his Majesty's government—quite the reverse. We come here to tender them our support in every measure which they can produce tending to the prosperity and welfare of the country. (Applause.) We look to measures, not to men. (Applause.) We will not follow the example of some others, who opposed every measure, right or wrong." (Applause.)—At a meeting of the Board of Police, Glasgow, Capt. Denovan gave in his resignation as Superintendent, on the ground that the Commissioners had, in violation of the functions conferred upon the Superintendent, appointed three parties to act as Lieutenants of Police, who were utterly incapable of exercising certain important duties which it is proposed that those officers shall perform; while at the same time, the Superintendent was held responsible for the efficiency of their conduct.—Mr. J. Watson, junr., has since been elected to succeed Mr. Denovan.

13. Dr. A. Carruthers was consecrated in the Catholic Chapel, Edinburgh, as Bishop of that part of the communion of which our city is the centre. The ceremony was conducted in a very solemn and very magnificent manner—the officiating Bishops being Dr. Penswick of Liverpool, Dr. Scott of Glasgow, and Dr. Kyle of the Northern District of Scotland.

14. The students at the University of Glasgow held a meeting, where they proposed petitions to Parliament against the continuance of negro slavery.

15. The Associate Burgher Presbytery of Edinburgh unanimously agreed to petition Parliament to take such measures as they may see cause, for the better observance of the Sabbath throughout the country at large, more especially in the metropolises.

19. An Essay on the Philosophy of the Stoics, written by Mr. Laurence M. Macara, and which gained a prize of forty guineas, subscribed by the students of the Edinburgh University, was read before the students and several of the professors. Mr. Macara's essay was a judicious and masterly exposition of the peculiar tenets of the Philosophers of the Porch; and the classical elegance with which many parts of it were written, argues well for the future eminence of its author in any pursuit in which his talents may lead him to engage. A meeting of the students was afterwards held, for the purpose of adopting measures for the continuance of their plan of giving public prizes, and donations and subscriptions to a considerable amount were received.

21. A branch of the Dalkeith railway, connecting it with Leith, was commenced.

25. A dinner was given in the Waterloo Rooms, Edinburgh, to James Aytoun, Esq., by his supporters at the late election. Upwards of 150 gentlemen sat down to dinner, R. W. Jameson, Esq., in the chair, supported on his right by Mr. Aytoun, on his left by Mr. Moffat of Dalkeith; Messrs. Prentice and Macfarlane officiated as croupiers. The principal speakers were the Chairman, Mr. Aytoun, Mr. Black, Mr. M'Leod (from Middlesex), Mr. Peddie, Mr. Prentice, and Mr. Dun. The following is a passage from the leading speech of Mr. Jameson, which, barring every consideration of its political sentiment, was an eloquent harangue—"Be seeing, as is now but too apparent, that the Whigs intend to delay the full completion of reform, long almost as their worst enemies could desire—(cheers)—and still more, that they intend to convert this vast constituency into a mere Ministerial machine, he boldly, it may be rashly, at least disinterestedly, threw himself in their way, and through many a weary month has he battled it stoutly against their nominees, men supported not only by the full force of the government, and of the triumphant Whig party, but also, I will admit, by their own lofty talents, their own personal worth, and the high historical merits, attaching, for services long ago performed, to both their illustrious names; and what is much more, not only supported by all these accessories of success, not only thereby commanding the suffrages of the heedless multitudes, who, obtaining the franchise without any exertion of their own, think they can bestow it without any responsibility, and therefore throw it away as a gift, or as a reward; but also, and I am ashamed to avow it, of many of those, who, alive to its real nature, would throw it away without a single security of its being well bestowed—who, professing the utmost concern for the granting of the people's demands—demands which have now been made, delayed, discussed, ascertained, and admitted to be just—would yet throw away the power of procuring them upon perhaps the only men in the world, who now profess ignorance of their nature, and doubts of their justice; or who, more meanly still, admitting the justice, and allowing the right, will do the right only when it is sanctioned by the seal of authority, and who put their consciences and their constituents at the disposal of those who sit in the high places of the land, and who have grasped the sceptre, and donned the habits of the Tories, whom the people enabled them to displace."

Aberdeen has been appointed a general warehousing port for East India and all other goods. This extended privilege is a boon of no small importance to the trade, and will add very considerably to the increasing prosperity of the place; for, while it cannot fail to be a stimulus to the enterprising merchant, it must prove to be of the greatest advantage to the community at large, by permitting the direct importation of East India and other goods, hitherto disallowed.

Sincerely believing that hardly any charitable institution in the country does so much real good in proportion to its means as the Destitute Sick Society of Edinburgh, we give the following abstract of its last report, in the hope of exciting the benevolence of individuals in favour of its funds:—"The object of this Society, as its name implies, is to relieve the sick; and certainly, when a labourer or mechanic, who depends on the work of his hands for support, is laid on a sick-bed, no situation can be more desolate, and none can more powerfully appeal to the sympathies of the benevolent. The funds of the Society are most faithfully administered; the greatest vigilance is employed against impositions; and every person relieved being visited by some of the Committee, there is no risk whatever of any misapplication of the funds. Since it was first instituted in 1793, it has expended L.33,616 in the relief of 63,284 families. During the last year, 3628 families have been relieved, and 11,162 individuals, most of them in very great distress. The expenditure for the last year has been L.1764, 2s. 8d.

The Scotsman of the 19th ult. having published a statement that at the dinner of the Highland Society, on the 15th, the King's health was given without the honours, while the Queen's was drunk with acclamations, the Depute-Secretary of the Society lost no time in contradicting the statement as inconsistent with truth. The Editor of the Scotsman then published a letter in another newspaper, stating that his informant had committed a mistake in naming the Highland Society: it was at the dinner of the Peers, after the election of their representatives, that the disrespect to Majesty took place. This explanation of the Scotsman was immediately followed by a letter from the Marquis of Tweeddale, chairman at the Peers' dinner, stating that the King's health was given in the manner always observed at those festivities, and that both their Majesties' healths were given alike.

The Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of Glasgow, have devolved upon the vacant congregation of the Tron Church, in that city, the privilege of choosing their own pastor.

PREFEMENTS.

The Earl of Aberdeen has presented the Rev. F. Knox, A. M. to the parish of Tarves.

On Thursday the 17th ult. the Second United Associate congregation, in Hawick, gave a most harmonious call to Mr Adam Thomson, preacher, to be colleague and successor to their present pastor, the Rev. James Henderson.

On Thursday, 17th current, the United Associate congregation of Chalmers Street, Dunfermline, gave a most harmonious call to Mr William France to be their minister.

The Hon. Mrs Mary MacKenzie of Cromartie has presented the Rev. Mr Noble, rector of the academy, Tain, to the church and parish of Foddie, vacant by the death of the Rev. Charles Bayne.

The Rev. George Smith, minister of the second charge of the Low Church, parish of Kilmarnock, has accepted a presentation to the church and parish of Penpont.

CRIMES.

Saturday, December 29, at the Circuit Court of Glasgow, Henry Burnett was found guilty of assaulting and robbing Mr R. B. Handyside, in Wellington Street, on the 5th October last, and was condemned to be executed on the 18th January. This sentence has since been commuted to transportation.

Robert Ward was on the same day sentenced to be executed on the 18th January, for the robbery of Mr Dennistoun; but the execution was afterwards postponed for a fortnight.

Wednesday, January 11, amongst numerous other cases tried before the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, was that of Duncan McMillan, who, being found guilty of an assault upon Jean MacLachlan, with intent to ravish, committed at Fort William on the 11th of May last, was sentenced to transportation for life.

On the 19th, Michael McCabe, printer, was tried before the above Court, and, being found guilty, was condemned to be executed on the 11th February, for robbing Alexander Bain, fish-curer in Burtisland, of a silver watch and other articles, in Blair Street, Edinburgh, on the 4th of December last.

On the same day, Donald McDonald and John Richardson were tried for assaulting Mr R. Brown, farmer, Brunstain, at a bonfire on Dalkeith street, on the 26th of November last. Being both found guilty, McDonald was sentenced to hard labour in Bridewell for two years, and Richardson to the same punishment for eighteen months.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

THE BRITISH LIBRARY.—A monthly series of volumes has been commenced under this title, with the design of republishing, neatly and cheaply, the whole range of the good writers of the last century. The first volume, which appeared a few days ago, is the excellent book, White's Natural History of Selborne with notes by Capt. Brown, an ingenious and most industrious naturalist residing in Edinburgh. The volume is solid and handsome beyond all ever before seen at its price (3s.); the notes are half a volume themselves; the illustrative cuts are in the first style and, altogether, the work outcheaps and outshines all that have ever gone before it. The wonder is, the Athenæum justly remarks, "how can so much elegant typography be sold at the money?"

DUBLIN UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE.—A magazine under this title has been commenced in Dublin; capital where, we are happy to learn, a native literature is gradually arising, notwithstanding all the political agitations of the country. The present work is conservative in principles, and will therefore appeal only to one class of the Irish population. Its literary strength, however, which seems very great, promises with other favourable circumstances, to render it successful periodical. Among the articles of the first number, there is one capital Irish characteristic sketch called Barney O'Reidre, the Navigator, by Mr Samuel Lover, the clever author of the "Legends of Ireland," lately published.

THE CHAMELEON.—An annual of elegant appearance, but without engravings, published at Glasgow and wholly, we understand, the composition of Mr Thomas Atkinson, bookseller. This young author receives so much unqualified praise from the papers which contain advertisements, that he may perhaps admit of a little in a qualified state from a journal which, having no advertisements, is enabled to speak the truth. He is clever—he is versatile—he is up to almost any thing; but all his writings look too much like hasty intellectual exercises, and are only passable as such, instead of possessing independent merit. He will come to no good, unless he concentrates those wayward powers of mind which he possesses upon some particular branch of letters, and takes time to write a little less than he now does. Let him cease to be jack-of-all-trades, and try to become master of one.

LIFE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.—The first number of a work under this title, to be comprised in twelve numbers, has appeared. It contains a lively, minute, and apparently most faithful picture of the early years of the deceased poet and novelist.

The Mails.—It is reported that the transmission of the mails to all parts of the kingdom is speedily to be placed under a new and economical arrangement, by which a saving in the expense of nearly one-third will accrue. Mail-coaches of a very light construction, drawn by two horses only, are to be used, but these will travel at a much more rapid rate than formerly.

Postscript.

After all, there is reason to expect that no civil war or dismemberment of the Union will take place. New York papers to the 26th December bring information that the government is inclined to take conciliatory measures with the South Carolinians. A resolution has been passed in Congress, that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed, with as little delay as possible, to furnish the Senate with a project of a bill for reducing the obnoxious duties.

Exclusive of all consideration as to the abstract propriety of conciliatory measures, the Americans will certainly be wise to retrace in time the first few steps they have taken in a course of policy, from which, in its more mature stages, they may see other countries now experiencing so much embarrassment.

Lord Palmerston has, up to the present time, withheld from the Belgian Minister the contents of the last despatches from Holland. It is, of course, inferred that they are not satisfactory to the Belgians. We understand from a respectable source, that Lord Palmerston and Prince Talleyrand differ in opinion as to some of the proposals of the King of Holland; Lord Palmerston is for accepting them, Talleyrand says they cannot be accepted by the French cabinet.

We have again this month the pleasing duty of announcing that the Funds are steadily rising. At the end of December the price of Consols was 85½ and 86; at the end of January the price was 87½. This demonstrates the great confidence in the stability of government and the preservation of peace.

IRELAND.

"It is the nature of all severe policy, even if justified by necessity, to provoke new resistance, where it does not extinguish the spirit of disaffection. Rigour often revives rebellion, and rebellion calls out for redoubled rigour. There are critical moments in the story of most countries, when a government appears to be, as were, doomed to move in this unhappy circle; which often enables the righteous punishment of bad rulers, but sometimes is a severe trial of those who desire to do well."—SIR JAMES ACKINTOSH.

THE first session of the Reformed House of Commons is already been distinguished by a very prompt introduction of remedial measures by the Ministry, and a promiscuous rush of private members to make motions on various grievances more particularly the subject of their own attention, and in some of which they must doubtless jostle against the plans of the government. The chief object of the new measures, is Ireland. Bills have been almost simultaneously proposed by Ministers in the two Houses for effecting large reductions in the church establishment of that country, and arming the executive with new powers for the repression of those disturbances which have so long rendered it a blot on the fair face of this powerful empire.

It is thus at once confessed by the Ministry, that the church in Ireland is a grievance which ought, at least, partially to be redressed, and that yet the people who have been malcontent under that grievance, are to be punished for the natural consequences of their dissatisfaction, by losing the benefits of British liberty. "We acknowledge," say the Ministers, "that the church was not quite a right thing; but you have no right to think as we do, and, therefore, for doing so, you must be subjected to military law. We take away as much of the grievance as suits our convenience; but if you say a word about the least beyond that, we must punish you as rebels."

It may well be conceived, that, in taking this view of the subject, in a paper designed for all parties in the state, we are not without some anxiety respecting the interpretation of our meaning. We know very well that the general sentiment of the English and Scottish nations is favourable to the proposed restriction of liberty in Ireland, which they think imperatively and immediately called for, by the system of outrage which there prevails. It is also a very general sentiment, that the Irish are naturally a barbarous and unruly people, and that Mr O'Connell is at the bottom of almost all the mischief of which they have lately been guilty. With great deference, our own opinion is, that the cause of Irish turbulence lies in Irish institutions, and particularly in the church. To get away with the turbulence, the institutions must not be done away with: no partial excision of their alleged grievances will permanently pacify the people. We do not say that this may be even possible, far less that it would be unattended with injustice to the respectable minority of Protestant English who reside in the country. But if it cannot be done, neither can the pacification be effected: if we cannot make up our minds to the complete undoing of almost all that has ever been done in Ireland, we must just make them go to a continuance of the misery and agitation which now exist. This we consider as equally clear with any mathematical axiom, and greatly do we regret that any dilemma so cruel and so threatening should occupy the attention of the British legislature.

The country we live in forms a remarkable contrast to Ireland, in its character of an addition to the domains of England. Even when labouring under only the influence of the foreign institutions which at present cause discontent in Ireland—namely, the Episcopal church—the Scottish people were in a state of constant contentment and vexation; the commercial energies of the country were comparatively torpid; the very intellect of the nation seemed to have gone out. But when the Revolution of 1688 restored the religion of the Scottish populace, every thing began to prosper, and no more was heard of the rude and rebellious character of the Scotch, except when the general tranquillity was disturbed, in a small degree, by the partisans of the degraded church establishment. This is the grand negative cause of the peacefulness and prosperity of Scotland: its institutions have all been to its mind for four or five generations; its attention has never been in the least distracted, during all that time, from the means of bettering its moral and physical condition. In Ireland, however, there is not only a church, which, however excellent in itself—and, as a form of religion, it is excellent—is not generally popular, but there are other institutions, and modes of public and political procedure, apparently as opposite to the genius of the people as the Scottish institutions are all that they could wish. The natural inference is, that until all the institutions of the country have been made agreeable to the people, there can be no peace, no general improvement. Nor is it to be expected that the improvement will immediately take place even then. A long time would be required to calm down the angry passions of men, and, as in the case of Scotland, it might be nearly a century before a general move was observable.

It may here be asked, Would it be necessary, in order to complete the parallel between Ireland and Scotland, that the popular religion of the former country should be established, instead of the present Protestant church? Certainly not. The church established in Scotland at the Revolution could not be called a church in the Lutheran or Catholic sense of the word. It was rather a body of equal clergy, protected by law, than a church in that sense; just in so far as it was not so, it has been the less generally beloved and adhered to. If the same principle were followed out in this case, no church would be kept up as a state religion in Ireland; but all would be alike protected, while the funds of the Protestant church would be moderately applied where there were Protestant congregations, and the rest might be used, like the revenues of the Catholic church after the Reformation, in promoting public instruction.

Our views upon this subject are as yet entertained by so very few persons, that we cannot be suspected of throwing them out for any other reason than speculation. Perhaps, however, startling as they may be in general, some of the obstacles to their realization might be overcome. The fear, for instance, that the church in England would suffer by the disestablishment of that in Ireland, is certainly overstrained. The same fear was entertained respecting the Episcopal church in Scotland, and it was found groundless. Nay, the reason for establishing the Episcopal church in Scotland at the first, was a dread, that, if that country were seen to do without bishops, the people of England would wish to do without them likewise; and the first result of the attempt was, that the Scotch procured the downfall of both their own bishops, and, for a time, those of England too. Even allowing that the church might suffer, the religion certainly would not; for the genius of the English is as decidedly Lutheran, as that of the Scotch is Presbyterian, and of the Irish, Catholic; and this, it must be allowed, is, after all, the great concern. But we will not pursue any farther a subject beset with such difficulties, and in which it is so barely possible to speak in even the most abstract manner, without stirring up the bitterness of either the one party or the other. The result of the new coercive measures will speedily be seen, and greatly are we afraid that it will not be favourable.

PROCEEDINGS OF PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

As mentioned in the Postscript to our last, the first session of the Reformed Parliament commenced on Tuesday the 29th January. The Lords only met for the purpose of reading the royal commission, and directing the House of Commons to elect a Speaker; immediately after which, their Lordships adjourned to the following Thursday.—(See Commons of that day.)

Tuesday, February 5.

THE KING'S SPEECH.—The house to-day was crowded with upwards of 300 Peeresses and other ladies in full court dress. His Majesty arrived in state about two o'clock, and was loudly cheered by the populace, both on his going and returning. The Commons being summoned, a large number of members attended with the Speaker, when his Majesty read the following speech in a firm tone of voice, laying particular emphasis on those passages of it which related to Ireland:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The period having now arrived at which the business of the Parliament is usually resumed, I have called you together for the discharge of the important duties with which you are entrusted.

"Never, at any time, did subjects of greater interest and magnitude call for your attention.

"I have still to lament the continuance of the civil war in Portugal, which has for some months existed between the princes of the house of Braganza. From the commencement of this contest, I have abstained from all interference, except such as was required for the protection of British subjects resident in Portugal, but you may be assured that I shall not fail to avail myself of any opportunity that may be afforded me, to assist in restoring peace to a country with which the interests of my dominions are so intimately connected.

"I have also to regret that my anxious endeavours to effect a definitive arrangement between Holland and Belgium have hitherto been unsuccessful. I found myself at length compelled, in conjunction with the King of the French, to take measures for the execution of the treaty of the 15th of November 1831.

"The capture of the citadel of Antwerp has in part accomplished that object, but the Dutch government still refusing to evacuate the rest of the territories assigned to Belgium by that treaty, the embargo which I had directed to be imposed on the Dutch commerce has been continued. Negotiations are again commenced, and you may rely on their being conducted, on my part, as they have uniformly been, with the single view of insuring to Holland and Belgium a separate existence, on principles of mutual security and independence. The good faith and honour with which the French government has acted in these transactions, and the assurances which I continue to receive from the chief powers of Europe of their friendly dispositions, give me confidence in the success of my endeavours to preserve the general peace. I have given directions that the various papers which are necessary for your information on the affairs of Holland and Belgium should be laid before you.

"The approaching termination of the charters of the Bank of England and of the East India Company will require a revision of these establishments, and I rely on your wisdom for making such provisions for the important interests connected with them as may appear, from experience and full consideration, to be best calculated to insure public credit, to improve and extend our commerce, and to promote the general prosperity and power of the British empire.

"Your attention will also be directed to the state of the church, more particularly as regards its temporalities, and the maintenance of the clergy. The complaints which have arisen from the collection of tithes appear to require a change of system, which, without diminishing the means of maintaining the established clergy in respectability and usefulness, may prevent the collision of interests, and the consequent disagreements and dissatisfaction which have too frequently prevailed between the ministers of the church and their parishioners.

"It may also be necessary for you to consider what remedies may be applied for the correction of acknowledged abuses, and whether the revenues of the church may not admit of a more equitable and judicious distribution.

"In your deliberations on these important subjects, it cannot be necessary for me to impress upon you the duty of carefully attending to the security of the church established by law in these realms, and to the true interests of religion.

"In relation to Ireland, with a view of removing the causes of complaint which had been so generally felt, and which had been attended with such unfortunate consequences, an act was passed during the last session of Parliament for carrying into effect a general composition for tithes. To complete that salutary work, I recommend to you, in conjunction with such other amendments of the law as may be found applicable to that part of my dominions, the adoption of a measure by which, upon the principle of a just commutation, the possessors of land may be enabled to free themselves from the burthen of an annual payment.

"In the further reforms that may be necessary, you will probably find, that although the established church of Ireland is, by law, permanently united with that of England, the peculiarities of the respective circumstances will require a separate consideration. There are other subjects hardly less important to the general peace and welfare of Ireland, affecting the administration of justice, and the local taxation of that country, to which your attention will also be required.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I have directed the estimates for the service of the year to be laid before you. They will be framed with the most anxious attention to all useful economy. Notwithstanding the large reduction in the estimates of the last year, I am happy to inform you that all the extraordinary services which the exigencies of the times required have been amply provided for.

"The state of the revenue, as compared with the public expenditure, has hitherto fully realised the expectations that were formed at the close of the last session.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"In this part of the United Kingdom, with very few exceptions, the public peace has been preserved; and it will be your anxious but grateful duty to promote, by all practicable means, habits of industry and good order amongst the labouring classes of the community.

"On my part, I shall be ready to co-operate to the utmost of my power in obviating all just causes of complaint, and in promoting all well-considered measures of improvement.

"But it is my painful duty to observe, that the disturbances in Ireland, to which I adverted at the close of the last session, have greatly increased. A spirit of insubordination and violence has risen to the most fearful height, rendering life and property insecure, defying the authority of the law, and threatening the most fatal consequences, if not promptly and effectually repressed.

"I feel confident, that to your loyalty and patriotism I shall not resort in vain for assistance in these afflicting circumstances, and that you will be ready to adopt such measures of salutary precaution, and to entrust to me such additional powers, as may be found necessary for controlling and punishing the disturbers of the public peace, and for preserving and strengthening the legislative union between the two countries, which, with your support, and under the blessings of Divine Providence, I am determined to maintain, by all the means in my power, as indissolubly connected with the peace, security, and well-being of my people."

After the reading of the speech, his Majesty and the Commons immediately retired.

THE ADDRESS.—The Marquis of Conyngham then rose to move the address to his Majesty, which was, of course, merely an echo of the speech. It was seconded by Lord Kinnaird. The Earl of Aberdeen concurred in the clauses of the address bearing upon our domestic affairs, but condemned the foreign policy of Ministers in the strongest terms, especially the surreptitious assistance lent to Don Pedro, by the non-enforcement of the foreign enlistment act, and tacitly countenancing the recruiting in this country for his service. The war in Portugal was no civil war, but an invasion, the people being unanimous in favour of Miguel; and he entreated Earl Grey, for the sake of the best interests of the country, to rise above the prejudice which now misled him.—Earl Grey defended the foreign policy of his administration, imputing the necessity for interfering between Holland and Belgium to the measures of his predecessors, and the hopes they still secretly held out to the Dutch king; and alleged that the language now held by the Earl of Aberdeen was meant solely to embarrass Ministers. Miguel, he said, was a usurper whom he never would recognise.—The Duke of Wellington denied his having been the adviser of the King of Holland. If he had, he would have recommended him to have made reprisals on our shipping in the Thames, which was perfectly unprotected, in retaliation for the capturing of his vessels. He repudiated the charge so constantly made by Earl Grey of the measures of his (the Duke of Wellington's) government rendering it imperative on his successors to adopt an armed interference in the Netherlands. The English government was bound to recognise Miguel as sovereign of Portugal. He objected to the mode of church reform proposed in the speech—namely, legislating separately for the churches of England and Ireland, which were indissolubly united. It would give a handle to the Repealers for infringing the act of Union.—After a few words from Earl Roden, the address was agreed to.—The following protest, however, was afterwards entered by the Earl of Aberdeen on the Journals of the House:—

"Dissentient,

"Because, in humbly thanking his Majesty for the papers on the affairs of Holland and Belgium, which he has given directions should be laid before this house, we feel it to be our duty, at the same time, to express our regret that his Majesty should have found himself compelled, in conjunction with the King of the French, to adopt measures which have led to the attack and destruction of the citadel of Antwerp, and to the capture of the Dutch garrison as prisoners of war.

"We are not informed that any insult has been offered by the government of the Netherlands to the crown and dignity of his Majesty—that any treaty or engagement has been violated—or that any of his Majesty's subjects have been injured or oppressed. We cannot, therefore, but deeply lament that his Majesty should have been advised to co-operate in the execution of measures directed, as we think, against the honour and independence of a faithful and unoffending ally, which are compatible only with a state of actual hostility, and which, as it seems to us, are at variance with the principles of justice, and of all public law.

"GORDON (Aberdeen.)"

The following signatures were added on Thursday to the protest:—

Ernest (Cumberland), Wm. Frederick (Glocester), Penrhurst, Kenyon, Rolle, Verulam, Bathurst, Churchill, Wynford, Rosslyn, Beresford, Stuart de Rothsay, Selkirk, Limerick.

February 6.

Their Lordships met this day merely for the purpose of carrying up the address to the King, and adjourned to next day.

February 7.

CHURCH REFORM.—Lord King moved for certain papers concerning the revenues of the church, and made some statements relative to particular livings in several counties, which, however, were contradicted by the Bishop of London.—Early Grey deeply deprecated Lord King's premature interference with this subject, which, he said, could only serve unhappily to inflame popular feeling against the church. The heads of the church were most anxious to correct, not the abuses (for that was not the proper term), but the deficiencies in the establishment.—Lord King finally withdrew his motion.

February 8.

LUNACY BILL.—In answer to some queries of Lord Wynford, the Lord Chancellor stated, that the lunacy bill about to be introduced was of the same character as that of last session.—Adjourned to Monday.

February 11.

Lord Teynham, after presenting a petition for the abolition of tithes, from the parish of Gullen, in the county of Mayo, arraigned the conduct of the Marquis of Sligo, Lord-Lieutenant of that county, for getting the said parish unjustly put under proclamation as in a state of disturbance; alleging that this was done solely for the purpose of influencing an impending election, and moved for a copy of the proclamation.—The Marquis of Sligo repelled the charge, and read from the local newspapers accounts of the disturbed state of the parish previous to the proclamation.—The motion was agreed to.

February 12.

LUNACY BILL.—This bill was read a second time. Lord Wynford strongly objected to it on the score of expense.

February 13 and 14.

No public business was discussed on either of these days. On the latter, Earl Grey laid on the table several documents relating to the question between Holland and Belgium.

February 15.

DISTURBANCES IN IRELAND.—Earl Grey moved for leave to bring in a bill for the more effectual suppression of local disturbances and dangerous associations in Ireland. He stated that Ministers had deviated from the usual course of requiring a committee of inquiry, because the disturbed state of Ireland was a matter of notoriety. He then proceeded to describe the outrages prevailing in Ireland, rendering life and property insecure, and frustrating the ends of justice by intimidation. He lamented the disappointment of his hopes of good from the Catholic relief bill, which it was said would satisfy Ireland. It would be found that, from the time that measure passed, Ireland became every day worse than it had been previously, in point of violence and outrage. Since that period, various beneficial measures had been passed, and others were in progress, but nothing except coercive measures would restore tranquillity in that country. A volunteer association had been so framed, by one skilled in the law, as just to keep within the law, while ready for the most desperate purposes. This was a power which could not be suffered to exist. He described Munster, Cork, and Tipperary, as in the worst state of disturbance, and recited various outrages there and elsewhere. The state of Ireland was an unparalleled demoralization. He was, therefore, now under the necessity of applying to the legislature to strengthen the hands of government. The provisions proposed in the present measure were taken from various laws of the Irish and English Parliaments. His Lordship then proceeded to detail the objects of the bill, of the more important of which the following is a summary:—

Sec. 1 enacts, that the Lord-Lieutenant may suppress, by order, the meeting of any assembly deemed by him to be dangerous to the public safety, or inconsistent with the due administration of the law; and may suppress any adjourned or continued meeting of the same.

Every meeting so prohibited shall be deemed an unlawful assembly, and any person present shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour.

Sec. 4 enacts, that the Lord-Lieutenant may issue his proclamation declaring any county, &c. to be disturbed, and to require the application of this law, and that such county shall be deemed a proclaimed district.

Sec. 9 enacts, that no meeting be allowed in a proclaimed district for petitioning Parliament, or for discussing any alleged grievance, or any matter in church or state, without a previous written notice of ten days, specifying the objects of the meeting, given to the Lord-Lieutenant, and his consent obtained, &c.; and all such meetings without such notice and consent, are declared to be illegal assemblies, and every person attending to be guilty of a misdemeanour.

Sec. 10 enacts, that the Lord-Lieutenant may appoint commissioned officers of the line for trial of offences within this act.

Sec. 11 enacts, that any number of persons so appointed, not more than nine nor less than five, shall be deemed a court-martial for the trial of offences within this act, and shall have the powers of any court-martial and also the powers of any court of oyer and terminer, jail delivery, or sessions of the peace, and may pass judgments in like manner as might be done by any court of oyer and terminer, &c.

Sec. 18 enacts, that any magistrate, peace-officer, or other person authorised by the Lord-Lieutenant, may commit to prison any one found out of his house, in the proclaimed district, from one hour after sunset to sunrise, who may be tried before any such court-martial and, if convicted, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour.

Sec. 19 enacts, that any justice, or any person with warrant of justice, accompanied by a commissioned officer or chief constable, may, from one hour after sunset to sunrise, demand admission into any house in a proclaimed district; and if entrance is refused, may enter by force any house from which he suspects the inhabitants are absent, and may search for them, or for arms, weapons, &c.; and all persons absent shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, unless they prove some lawful occasion of absence.

Sec. 21 enacts, that any person who disposes of a seditious paper in a proclaimed district shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and liable to imprisonment for not more than twelve months, unless he discover to whom he was so employed.

Sec. 23 enacts, that nothing done in pursuance of this act, in any proclaimed district, shall be questionable in any civil or criminal court; and that all officers and soldiers, acting in pursuance of such power or authority, shall be responsible only to courts-martial.

A limited suspension of the Habeas Corpus act to take place in the disturbed districts.

The Earl of Longford, the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Eldon, and Marquis of Lansdowne, supported the bill. The Lord Chancellor claimed his share of the responsibility of the measure, which he reckoned perfectly necessary for the security of life and property in Ireland. Lords Ellenborough, Cloncurry, and Wicklow, spoke against its adoption without previous trial of the efficacy of the new church reform. The bill was then read a first time; and ordered to be again read on Monday.

February 18.

The bill for the suppression of disturbances in Ireland was read a second time without opposition, and ordered to be committed.

February 19.

The house went into committee upon the disturbances' suppression bill. Various amendments, proposed by Lord Wynford and the Earl of Harrowby, were rejected. Three suggestions, by the Duke of Wellington—1st, That no person be tried by court-martial but by the directions of the Lord-Lieutenant; 2d, That no sentence be executed until confirmed to him; and, 3d, That a field-officer preside over each court-martial—were adopted. The bill, as amended and with the addition of a clause, limiting the duration of the act to 1st August 1834, was then agreed to, and the house adjourned to Thursday.

February 21.

The report of the disturbances' suppression bill was agreed to with some few amendments; one, to allow counsel for the accused to examine and cross-examine, as in ordinary criminal courts; another excludes whipping for offences under this act.

February 22.

The Irish disturbances' suppression bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, January 29.

The House of Commons presented an unusual business for the first day of a new Parliament, there being upwards of 300 members present. Considerable amusement was excited by Mr Cobbett, member for Oldham, taking his seat on the Ministerial bench, immediately behind Lord Althorp.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.—The business of the day was opened by Mr Hume proposing, after a lengthened

speech, Mr Littleton, one of the members for the county of Stafford, as Speaker, in the room of Mr Charles Manners Sutton; which motion was seconded by Mr O'Connell. Lord Morpeth proposed the re-election of Mr Sutton, and was seconded by Sir Francis Burdett. A long and animated discussion ensued, in which Mr O'Connell, Mr Cobbett, and one or two others, vehemently insisted on the incongruity of a Tory Speaker presiding over a Reformed Parliament; and were replied to by Lord Ebrington, Lord Althorp, and Mr Tennyson. The house then divided, when there appeared—

For Mr Hume's motion	-	-	31
Against it	-	-	241

Majority for Mr Manners Sutton 210

Considerable misunderstanding prevailed in the house as to whether or not Mr Sutton was entitled to draw the pension of L.4000, bestowed on him on his retirement at the end of last session, along with the salary of L.6000, to which he was once more entitled as Speaker. Mr Sutton disclaimed all thoughts of such an arrangement; and the act of 2d and 3d William IV., for regulating the Speaker's salary, was ultimately referred to, by which it is declared that the Speaker shall be held to continue in office, and receive his salary, until another Speaker be elected; consequently, Mr Sutton had never been in a situation to entitle him to the pension.—The house then adjourned to Thursday.

January 31.

CONFIRMATION OF SPEAKER.—The Speaker, attended by about 150 of the Commons, appeared at the bar of the House of Lords, when the usual ceremonial was gone through of hearing intimated his Majesty's satisfaction at the choice of Mr Sutton as Speaker of the House of Commons; after which, both houses proceeded to the swearing in of their respective members, which continued throughout Friday and Saturday, when simultaneous adjournments took place to the following Tuesday.

Tuesday, February 5.

Numerous notices of motions were given by Ministers, and various members of the house. Amongst other questions, Lord Althorp was asked if he intended to repeal the tax on newspapers; to which his Lordship replied, that it was uncertain whether the current year's revenue would permit of it. To a similar query touching the corn laws, the like qualified answer was returned.

THE ADDRESS.—His Majesty's speech having been read, Lord Ormelie rose to move the address in reply to it. After some gratulatory remarks on the Reform Act, his Lordship adverted to that clause of the speech which referred to the disturbed state of Ireland, and advocated the imperative necessity of empowering the crown to repress the acts of ferocity and outrage there daily occurring. Ministers had ever evinced a sympathy with the miseries of Ireland. (Cries of "No, no!" and "Blood, blood!" from Mr O'Connell.) These miseries he attributed to continued misgovernment and oppression—oppression by the fomentors of civil discord, the harpies that fed on the ills of their country. Matters had come to such a pitch, that measures of force and power must unfortunately be applied; but, with these, remedial measures for real grievances must also be adopted.—Mr John Marshall, member for Leeds, seconded the address.—Mr O'Connell denounced it as a "bloody and brutal" address; and, in allusion to Lord Ormelie's remarks respecting him, he advised his Lordship "not to vilify better men than himself." Nothing but a repeal of the Union would preserve Ireland to the King of England. The present government was a persecuting one. They had persecuted the press, the people, and the priests, and established a regular system of favouritism in the appointment of the magistracy. After a long description of the miseries of Ireland, the learned gentleman remarked, that the "bloody" speech of the King would show Ireland what the Whig government intended to do for her. (Here he was called to order by Lord John Russell for applying such terms to the words recently spoken by his Majesty. The Speaker being appealed to, remarked, that the speech must be considered merely that of his Majesty's Ministers; but that it would be impossible to preserve either order or decency if such language were persevered in.) After many remarks of the same import, Mr O'Connell moved, as an amendment, a committee of the whole house, to consider the address; which motion was seconded by Mr Cobbett.—Mr Richards, after complaining that no notice had been taken of the wretched state of the English labouring classes in the speech, recommended a system of poor laws for Ireland.—Mr Stanley replied at great length, and with much vehemence, to the speech of Mr O'Connell. He demanded of that gentleman why he continually refrained from bringing forward in Parliament the question of the repeal of the Union—which he systematically employed as the means of inflaming the passions of an ignorant and deluded rabble, describing it as the panacea for all the ills of Ireland—to issue in the British House of Parliament. His panacea was one which they (the government) "would resist to the death." It would be the death-blow of the empire, and they would be traitors to their country did they not resist it. The right hon. gentleman then proceeded to detail the frightful system of outrage and massacre that prevailed in Ireland, and which rendered extraordinary powers absolutely necessary to suppress it. In Kilkenny alone (said he), within the last twelve months, there have been 32 murders and attempts to murder; 34 burnings; 519 burglaries; 36 acts of houghing cattle; and the number of illegal notices and violent and serious assaults (by which I mean assaults attended with danger to life and limb) has been 170. In Queen's County, the number has been even more. There have been 60 murders or attempts to murder; burglaries, 626; malicious injuries to property, 115; and serious assaults upon individuals, 209. One hundred rewards, amounting to L.12,000, have been offered by the government; and of these only two have been claimed. So complete is the system of disorganization—so fearful is the discipline of these marauders—so extensive is the connection of these disturbers of the public peace, that the victims dare not complain; they are compelled to suffer in silence, and, knowing the individuals by whom they have been attacked, to submit implicitly, and without a murmur, to the commands of those whom they know to have the means of death in their hands, and whom I can qualify with no lighter term than that of insurgents. Government, he continued, were most unwilling to call for extraordinary powers; but was there not a necessity for it, when it was found almost impossible to procure a jury who dared convict an offender, well knowing that the destruction of their houses and properties, and the lives of themselves and families, would be the consequence? He then read a list of recent appointments, utterly disproving the charge, brought by Mr O'Connell, of favouritism in the choice of public functionaries.

It is impossible for us, owing to the limited nature of our publication, to give even an outline of the subsequent part of this first debate in a Reformed Parliament, which lasted in all four days, and during which no less than sixty members delivered their sentiments—many of them at great length. On Wednesday (the 6th), Mr Stanley, in reply to some observations in the speech of Mr Lytton Bulwer on the same subject, said that it was perfectly erroneous to impute to him the idea that the Reform Act was "the be-all and end-all of reform in this country;" and stated, that "he regarded it only as the completion of that machinery by which other improvements were to be wrought." On Thursday, Sir Robert Peel, after a long and powerful speech, stated his determination to support Ministers—not from any increased confidence he felt in them, but because he thought it his duty, under existing circumstances, to throw what little weight he possessed into the scale of the crown. "There was a party in that house who seemed to assume that every thing which had been done was wrong, and that nothing was right which had not been touched by the magic wand of reform. Between himself and office," he said, "there opened as wide a gulf as there did between office and any in that house;" and added, that, "in the present state of public feeling, he should consider his return to power a most unfortunate event for the country." The right hon. Baronet was frequently interrupted throughout his speech by loud and general cheering, and sat down amid the most enthusiastic plaudits from all parts of the house. At two o'clock on the morning of Saturday the 9th, the house divided, when there appeared—

The house afterwards divided upon an amendment moved by Mr Tennyson, to the effect, that if the House of Commons should be induced to entrust his Majesty with additional powers, such acquiescence should be accompanied by a close investigation into the causes of discontent in Ireland, with the view of applying prompt and effectual remedies, &c. Upon the division there appeared—

For Mr Tennyson's amendment	-	-	60

The leading supporters of Ministers throughout this long debate were—Lord Ormelie (the mover), Mr Macaulay, Lord Ebrington, Sir Robert Peel, Mr D. Browne, Mr Clay, Dr Lushington, and Mr Shaw.

MR O'CONNELL'S MINORITY.—Of the forty who supported Mr O'Connell, thirty-two were Irish members, six English, and two Scotch; and both because of this being the first division in the Reformed Parliament, and as exhibiting the character of the party who have thus early arrayed themselves against government, we think a list of the names of the minority may prove an interesting record to our readers:—

Irish Members.—Baldwin, Cork city—Barron, Waterford city—Colonel Butler, Kilkenny county—Chapman, Westmeath—Sir R. Keane, Waterford county—Walker, Wexford town—Morgan O'Connell, Meath county—Maurice O'Connell, Tralee—Finn, Kilkenny county—Fitzsimon, Dublin county—Fitzsimon, King's County—Roe, Cashel—W. Roche, Limerick city—D. Roche, ditto—Wallace, Carlow county—O'Connor, Cork county—O'Dwyer, Drogheda—Lalor, Queen's County—Sheil, Tipperary—Rathven, Kildare county—Fitzgerald, Louth—Nagle, Westmeath—Talbot, New Ross—Vigors, Carlow town—Rorke, Longford—H. Grattan, Meath county—Lynch, Galway—M'Loughlin, Galway—O'Brien, Clare—John O'Connell, Youghall—Sullivan, Kilkenny—H'Hee, Longford.

English Members.—Cobbett, Oldham—T. Attwood, Birmingham—Hume, Middlesex—Faithful, Brighton—John Feilden, Oldham—Kennedy, Tiverton.

Scotch Members.—Kinloch, Dundee—Wallace, Greenock.

Amongst the speeches of those who voted with Mr Tennyson, that of Mr Roebuck, member for Bath, was the most conspicuous, being almost exclusively a severe stricture on the general policy of the Ministry, especially as regarded the contemplated measures towards Ireland.

Seldom, if ever, has any debate in the British Parliament been conducted throughout with so much heat, invective, and apparently personal animosity, as was evinced generally by the speakers in the minorities, towards the Ministry, more particularly by the O'Connell party. The right honourable Secretary for Ireland was the target against which all their shafts were directed; and it almost seemed as if they had come down to the house in a body, unanimously determined and prepared to overwhelm him with the combined force of their philippics. If such was really their intention, even their friends must own that they signally failed, not only as regards the result of the division, but the effect of their consecutive attacks on the Minister himself, who displayed a self-possession, a cogency of reasoning, a readiness of reply, and a severity of retort, which surpassed all his former appearances in the house. Mr Stanley, it is well known, is by no means a general favourite even amongst his political supporters; his alleged haughty and aristocratic bearing being assigned as the cause of the dislike towards him. We suspect, however, there was much truth in the remark made by Sir Robert Peel during his speech on the above occasion, "that less would be heard of these qualities on the part of the right hon. gentleman, were he not so powerful a debater." Of all the speeches that were delivered during the above discussion, if we may judge by the public journals, that of Sir Robert Peel himself seems to have given the most universal satisfaction throughout the country.—On the conclusion of the debate, the house adjourned to Monday the 11th.

NEGRO SLAVERY.—On Wednesday, previous to the resumption of the adjourned debate on the address, Lord Althorp, in answer to a query from Mr Buxton, said that government was maturing a plan for slave emancipation, which he confidently hoped would be reckoned safe and satisfactory by all parties.

POLITICAL UNIONS.—On Thursday, Lord Althorp stated that no bill was in contemplation for the suppression of political unions.

QUAKERS' OATHS.—On Friday, previous to the adjourned debate, Mr Pease, the Quaker, was introduced, as member for South Durham, but refused to take the usual Parliamentary oaths. The case being altogether novel, a select committee was appointed to inspect the Journals for any precedents authorising Quakers to take their seats in Parliament upon their affirmation. (On the following Friday, Mr Pease was admitted to take his seat upon his simple affirmation, which he did amidst general cheering.)

February 11.

REPORT OF THE ADDRESS.—On the bringing up of the report, another lengthened discussion ensued, in consequence of Mr O'Connell again repeating his charges of "brutality," "atrocious," &c. against the clause for repressing outrage and disturbance in Ireland. If the terms of that clause were carried into effect, he (O'Connell) would rather live in France under Robespierre. He then read a long figurative statement, to show that Ireland had declined in prosperity every year since her union with England.—Mr Spring Rice, in reply to the last assertion, referred to various official documents, showing the large sums of English money applied to the improvement of Ireland, the taxes from which she was exempted, &c., and proving the great advantages which that country had derived from the Union.—Mr Cobbett, in a long speech, denounced the conduct of the Whig government, and defended that of Mr O'Connell; he then proposed an entirely new address of his own preparing, which was rejected by a majority of 300; only 23 supporting it.—Mr T. Attwood also moved an amendment, which was negatived without a division.—The address was then agreed to.

February 12.

REFORM IN THE IRISH CHURCH.—After the Speaker had reported his Majesty's answer to the address, Lord Althorp moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter the laws relative to the established church in Ireland. His Lordship entered at great length on the subject, and detailed the several reductions and alterations proposed to be effected. The taxes, he said, that pressed on Ireland, were but few in number, and but small in amount; one of the greatest was the duty on soap, and, as regarded that, he would bring in a bill during the present session to alter it. The revenues of the Irish church had been very greatly exaggerated. The net amount of the incomes of the Irish bishops was only L.130,000. A large tract of land belonged to the bishops, but they had no beneficial interest in it, their tenants and lessees having full five-sixths of the value of it. The value of that land was L.600,000, but the bishops got no more than L.100,000 from it. That accounted for the exaggerated rumours of the amount of the bishops' revenues. The whole amount of revenue belonging to the deans and chapters was L.23,600; but the necessary expenditure to which this sum was applied was £21,400, so that the surplus of £2200 was all that was left for the deans and chapters. The number of benefices in Ireland was 1401; of this number, 1149 had sent in returns, from which it appeared that their value was £478,000. The other 252 had not sent in returns, but, taking the same average value for them as for the other benefices, £580,000 would be the whole revenue derived from the benefices of Ireland. The statement which he made, then, was briefly this—

Amount of the revenue of bishops' sees	£130,000
Revenue of deans and chapters, exclusive of the livings held by them as prebends	2,200
Revenue of the other benefices of Ireland	600,000

Total revenues of the Irish church £732,000

There were 200 livings of less than £100 a-year value, and it had been customary to increase that allowance by grants from the first fruits. But owing to the defects in the first fruits system, it was proposed to abolish it altogether, and to impose a tax on all benefices in lieu of it. His Lordship then explained very fully the principles of the proposed bill, of the leading points of which the following is a summary:—

1. The taxation of Catholic inhabitants for Protestant purposes, under the title of vestry cess, to be abolished. This is a direct pecuniary relief to the amount of £80,000 per annum.

2. A reduction of the number of archbishops and bishops prospectively, from four archbishops and eighteen bishops, to two archbishops and ten bishops, and the appropriation of the revenues of the suppressed sees to the general church fund.

Archbishops to be reduced to bishoprics:—Cashel and Tuam.

Bishoprics (10) to be abolished, and the duties to be transferred to other sees:—Dromore to Down; Raphoe to Derry; Clogher to Armagh; Elphin to Kilmore; Killala to Tuam; Clonfert to Killaloe; Cork to Cloyne; Waterford to Cashel; Ossory to Ferns; Kildare to Dublin.

3. A general tax on all bishoprics, from 5 to 15 per cent., to be imposed immediately.

4. An immediate reduction from the bishopric of Derry, and a prospective reduction from the primacy, in addition to the tax; the amount to be paid to the general church fund.

N.B.—The net incomes of all the archbishops and bishops of Ireland amount to £130,000. The plan will effect a reduction of about £60,000.

5. An immediate tax on all benefices, from 5 to 15 per cent., in lieu of first fruits, which are hereafter to cease.

Benefices under £200 to be exempt, and the tax to be graduated according to the value. Total income of parochial clergy, under £600,000.

6. An abolition of all sinecure dignities, and appropriation of their revenues to the general fund.

7. Commissioners to be appointed to administer the fund, and apply it—1st, to ordinary church cess; surplus to augmentation of poor livings, assistance in building glebe houses, churches, dividing unions, &c.

8. Commissioners to have the power, with consent of Privy Council, of dividing and altering limits of parishes.

9. Also, where no duty has been performed, nor minister resident for three years before the passing of the act, commissioners to have power to suspend appointment (if in the gift of crown or church, and apply proceeds to the general fund.

10. Tenants of bishops' leases to be empowered to purchase the perpetuity of their leases at a fixed and moderate amount, subject to a corn rent, equal to the amount now annually paid in shape of rent and fine.

N.B.—This is the application of the bishops' leases to the principle of the composition act, so far as it precludes the possibility of future increase.

14. The proceeds of these leases to be paid to the state, and applicable to any purpose not connected with the church. The amount, if all purchased at a low rate, will be from £2,500,000 to £3,300,000 sterling.

The commutation of tithes for land, and the laws of enforcing residence, and prohibiting pluralities, to be the subject of other bills.

Mr O'Connell expressed his great satisfaction at the proposed measure, although it certainly did not go so far as he could have wished.—Sir Robert Inglis, Mr Goulburn, and Mr Shaw (Dublin University) warmly opposed the measure.—Sir Robert Peel approved of many parts of the bill, especially the abolition of vestry cess, and enforcing the residence of a minister in every parish where there was a Protestant congregation; but he deprecated the reduction of the number of bishops, and the application of any portion of the church revenues to state purposes.—After two or three other members had spoken in support of the measure, leave was given to bring in the bill.

February 13.

IRISH CHURCH REFORM, &c.—Lord Stormont inquired to what purposes the surplus of the revenues of the church of Ireland was intended to be devoted.—Lord Althorp replied, that he considered them applicable to the purposes of the state.—To an inquiry, as to whether it was intended to reduce the number of Irish bishops in the House of Lords, Lord Althorp replied in the negative.—The Solicitor-General announced an intended alteration in the law for preventing bribery at elections.—Mr Grant, in answer to an inquiry from Mr Baring, stated that the question of the renewal of the East India Company's charter was under the most anxious consideration of government, and that it would likely be brought forward before Easter.

February 14.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.—Lord Althorp moved for a committee to inquire into the state of the corporations in England, Wales, and Ireland, to report what abuses existed, and propose proper measures for their correction. He stated that Scotland had not been included, because the Lord Advocate had a bill in preparation for that part of the kingdom.—Mr Oswald moved that Scotland be included in the inquiry.—Mr Hume seconded the amendment.—The Lord Advocate said it was unnecessary to include Scotland in the inquiry, as the monstrous character of the Scotch burghs had been long since fully exposed. In the year 1469, the whole of the liberties of the burghesses of Scotland were struck to the ground. By the arbitrary statute of that year, the corporations of Scotland, which had before been liberal, were converted into rotten corporations; the nomination of the magistrates and councils was declared at one sweep to be no longer fit to be entrusted to the burghesses, to "simple men," as they were termed (a laugh); and it was enacted, that in time to come the existing magistrates should nominate their successors. The course, therefore, with respect to Scotland, was plain and simple. All that it would be necessary to do was to repeal the statute to which he had alluded, and provide at once a popular constituency. His Lordship said he would bring forward his motion for the repeal of this statute on the 12th of March. After some further discussion, the committee moved for by Lord Althorp was appointed.

NAVAL AND MILITARY SINECURES.—Mr Hume brought forward his promised motion on this subject. He enumerated various instances in point: several individuals holding sinecure offices in our colonial establishments, who never had been out of Britain, and others holding offices at home, who discharged no duties for the emoluments. He quoted particularly the late appointments of Earl Munster as governor of Windsor Castle, and Lord F. Fitzgerald as governor of the Tower; and concluded with moving two resolutions—the first expressing the necessity of economy, the second declaratory of the inexpediency of naval and military sinecures as a means of rewarding public services.—Mr Robinson seconded the motion.—Lord Althorp opposed it. The offices objected to came annually under the revision of Parliament, and any abuse of them might be checked in voting the estimates. The system of appointing lieutenant-governors to each of the West India islands was to be changed in future. Henceforth there was to be only one governor for several islands, and he was, at the same time, to be an efficient officer; by which means £16,000 or £17,000 would be saved.—Mr O'Connell thought that the opposition of government to this motion was altogether incomprehensible.—Sir James Graham said he had reduced the expenses of the naval administration one million, and still greater savings would this year be effected. The offices alluded to could not be abolished without detriment to the service, and he was determined to support them. A stimulus was necessary to excite the energies both of naval and military officers.—After a very long discussion, the house divided—

Against it	232

Majority against the motion 94

Amongst the English members, the most strenuous opponents of Mr Hume's motion were Sir F. Burdett and Mr Macaulay. The inconsistency of these gentlemen in this respect, which was clearly exposed and brought home to them by other members, has excited a great sensation throughout the country.

Thirty-four Irish members voted for Mr Hume's motion, and eight Scotch. The names of the latter are—Lord Dalmeny, W. D. Gillon, Mr Oswald (Ayrshire), Mr Oswald (Glasgow), Mr Kinloch, Mr Wallace, Mr Pringle, and Captain Wemyss.

The house afterwards resolved itself into a committee of supply, and after voting several sums, adjourned.

February 15.

EMBARGO ON DUTCH SHIPPING.—A long discussion took place on this subject, introduced by Sir Robert Peel, who, without making any motion, or calling upon the house to express any opinion, condemned in strong language, as a disgraceful violation of international law, and an unjust aggression on the property of foreign merchants, the capturing and detention of Dutch vessels, before any declaration of war had been issued against Holland.—He was supported by Mr Baring, Mr Pollock, Sir Richard Vivyan, and Sir James Scarlett, the latter of whom declared, that the prerogative of the crown had been stretched beyond its proper limits in this instance. The house then resolved itself into a committee of supply, and afterwards adjourned to Monday (18th).

February 18.

Besides hearing read, and agreeing to the report of the committee of supply, the time of the house was entirely taken up this day with a motion of Mr Cobbett, for a repeal of certain taxes, which was ultimately withdrawn, and another long speech from Mr O'Connell, in reference to the sufferings of Ireland, and denouncing the measure of coercion brought forward in the upper house.

February 19.

IRISH GRAND JURIES.—Mr Stanley moved for leave to bring in his proposed bill for amending the grand jury system in Ireland. Those bodies were entrusted with the civil administration of counties, and with the building and repairing of bridges and other public works; they defrayed the expenses by levying taxes on the occupiers of the land, and their collectors had the power of distress. They possessed control over almost the whole internal local taxation of Ireland, amounting at the present moment to about £940,000. The chief grievance, however, was their power of making compulsory assessments for the purpose of local expenditure. The principal objections to grand juries in Ireland might be stated as follows: 1st, That they were not acquainted with the practical details of the works to be undertaken; 2d, That they were without responsibility, and uncontrolled by the check of public opinion in the discharge of their duties; and, lastly, That the system afforded opportunities for corrupt practices. It had been suggested that it was necessary to separate the civil from the criminal jurisdiction exercised by grand juries; but he was not prepared to deprive them of the whole control which they at present exercised in civil matters. The hon. gentleman then noticed several of the more important of the alterations he intended making, but which would be more fully explained upon the introduction of his bill, which he would refer to a select committee, where he would court the fullest discussion.—Mr O'Connell concurred in the provisions of the proposed bill, but thought other and more sweeping changes ought to be made. After some discussion, leave was given to bring in the bill.

February 20.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.—Various propositions made by Lord Althorp respecting the mode of transacting business in the house, were, after much discussion, adopted. The house is hereafter to sit from 12 o'clock noon till 3 p.m., for the purpose of hearing petitions; then to adjourn for two hours, and commence public business at 5.

February 21.

SCOTCH ENTAILS.—Mr Kennedy moved for a select committee to consider and report on the state of the law of entail in Scotland, when the following members were appointed:—Mr Kennedy, the Lord Advocate, Mr Abercromby, Mr Robert Grant, Mr Littleton, Lord Ormelie, Mr Hope Johnstone, Mr Loch, Sir Andrew Agnew, Mr Bannerman, Mr Oswald, Lord Dalmeny, Sir John Hay, Mr Murray, Mr Traill, Mr James Oswald, Mr Leith Hay, Captain Gordon, Mr Warburton, Mr Strickland, Mr Dunlop, Mr Tancred, Mr Warre.

LIGHTHOUSE DUTIES.—Upon the motion of Mr Hume, a return was ordered of the duties paid at each lighthouse in England, Scotland, and Ireland, from 1828 to the present time.

February 22.

IRISH DISTURBANCES' SUPPRESSION BILL.—This bill was received from the Lords, and ordered to be read a first time on Wednesday; no discussion took place, except a few animadversions by Mr O'Connell.

OFFICIAL MEMBERS.—Mr Hume moved for a select committee to inquire into the number of members holding offices under the crown. He did not think that persons holding offices at pleasure should sit and vote in that house. He included officers in the army and navy.—Mr Roebuck thought the electors the best judges of the trustworthiness of the candidate.—Lord J. Russell concurred.—Mr Hume said that he could not rely on the votes of officers.—This remark called forth some spirited observation from Captain Berkeley, which Mr Hume, in reply, said he treated with contempt.—Lord Althorp called the attention of the house to this language.—The Speaker thought it was very indecorous, but that it was employed in retort.—Motion agreed to.

Foreign News.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

IN our last, we gave a full detail of the causes of dispute between the American government and the southern states, bringing the accounts of their mutual proceedings down to the 10th December, at which time President Jackson had addressed a long proclamation to the inhabitants of South Carolina, asserting the supremacy of the Federative Legislature over all the states of the Union, and threatening them with all the penalties of rebellion, in case of their refusing implicit obedience to its authority. It was thought proper, however, to accompany these threats of coercion with symptoms of a disposition to conciliate the insurgent state, and the proclamation was accordingly followed up by an announcement, in the House of Representatives at Washington, of intended important modifications of the obnoxious tariff—the ostensible cause of all the differences. But this latter declaration seems to have had little effect in mollifying the angry spirit it was intended to appease, and which, it would now appear, is fed by other and more dangerous fuel than disagreements as to mere commercial regulations. In fact, it seems impossible to put any other construction on the conduct of the Carolinians, than a long though silently cherished wish to separate themselves from the Federative Union, and establish their independence. Upon the receipt of the above proclamation, a public meeting of the State-Rights party, or "Nullifiers," was held, at which resolutions were passed for the immediate raising of volunteers throughout the state.

In the Lower House of the Local Legislature, at the same time, separate bills were introduced, read, passed, and sent to the Senate for its sanction, for raising supplies, by extraordinary taxes, to provide arms, ammunition, &c.; and decreeing that every inhabitant found in arms in opposition to the ordinances of nullification should suffer death, without benefit of clergy. In consequence of these decided measures, Governor Hayne issued a proclamation, in reply to that of President Jackson, addressed to the citizens of Carolina. In this document, the threats of the President are treated with contempt; the "entire sovereignty" of each separate state, and its independence of all laws not made by itself, are asserted; the existence of a "national government" denied; and the doctrine that the members of Congress are the representatives merely of the particular states which send them, and not of the whole United States, is maintained. After contesting the arguments of President Jackson, the proclamation announces, in the most emphatic terms, that force will be repelled by force, and concludes with exhorting the citizens of Carolina to disregard those "vain menaces of military force," and calling upon them "to sustain the dignity, and protect the liberties of the state, if need be, with your lives and fortunes."

In the meantime, whilst these warlike demonstrations were going on at Charleston, the announced bill, modifying the provisions of the objectionable tariff, was promulgated at Washington. The alterations to be made are extensive and important, and evidently framed with a view to the interests of the southern states. The restrictive duties on cottons, woollens, iron, hemp, silks, sugars, olives, &c., are reduced very considerably, and, in some instances, so low as five per cent. ad valorem.

It would appear that whilst the intelligence of this conciliatory measure was on its way to Charleston, the proclamation of Governor Hayne reached Washington. The bold and truculent terms in which this document was couched, immediately called forth another long and important message to Congress from President Jackson, the main purport of which was to indicate the supreme authority of the Federative government over every part of the Union; declaring that no single state had a right capriciously to withdraw itself from the common confederacy, and that, as a last resource, the naval and military forces of the United States would be employed to put down the rebellion in Carolina. The customhouses at Charleston were, at the same time, ordered by the President to be removed to the neighbouring fortress, and it was even reported that instructions had been given for the arrest of Governor Hayne for high treason, but the latter statement would appear to be incorrect.

Subsequent accounts, up to the 1st ult., have been received, by which it would appear that the conjoined measures of concession and coercion adopted by President Jackson, have had considerable effect in moderating the tone of the "Nullifiers." The local Senate of Carolina had reported most favourably of the beneficial results likely to ensue from the intended modifications of the tariff; and the popular House of Assembly have agreed to postpone the execution of the nullifying ordinance (which had previously been fixed for the 1st of February) to the 3d of March, in order that the fate of the altered measure in its way through Congress may be seen. What that may be, is quite uncertain; but whatever decision may be come to—whether the original or the modified tariff be adopted—the embarrassing dilemma in which the President is now placed will be rendered still more perplexing and perilous; and the hazardous question as to the sovereign powers of the Congress, it seems impossible either way to shirk. In the former event, the Carolinians will of course reassume their posture of defiance, and put their pretensions to independence to the arbitrement of the sword; whilst a compliance with their wishes will to an almost equal certainty rouse the indignation of the northern states, who view the partial measures intended for the benefit of their southern fellow-citizens with well-grounded alarm, as likely to prove utterly destructive of their own commerce and manufactures; and assuredly, if adopted, it will be impossible for them to compete with our British manufacturers in the favoured ports. Massachusetts has already petitioned against the modified tariff, and a strong party in Congress evince a disposition to carry the original measure into effect at all hazards. The great problem of the stability and permanence of the American republic may perhaps be solved ere our next publication.

TURKEY.

THE aspect of affairs in the east has altered materially since the date of the accounts given in our last. At that time, Ibrahim Pacha had advanced as far as Konieh, on his way to Constantinople, after having routed and dispersed, beyond all possibility of again making head against him, the immense army of the Sultan, which had been assembled to oppose his progress in the defiles of Mount Taurus, and make a last struggle for the preservation of the Ottoman empire. The intelligence of this event is said to have so completely paralyzed the Turkish government, that scarcely an effort was made to retrieve their disasters, or even to make preparations for the defence of Constantinople. It would appear, indeed, that the capture of the Grand Vizier in the above action had deprived the Sublime Porte of the only man capable of stimulating or putting to use the relaxed and scattered energies of the Turkish soldiery, and it is more than probable that the capital would have fallen without striking a blow. Accounts, however, have since arrived of an armistice being concluded between the Sultan and his formidable vassal, upon the intervention of the Russian and English governments. The preservation of the Turkish empire, we believe, is viewed by the great powers of Europe as an indispensable arrangement for preserving the proper balance of influence and power between them, and the Egyptian Viceroy knows well the utter futility of endeavouring to nullify this arrangement. On the other hand, it is stated that the Porte is perfectly willing to cede Syria to the successful Viceroy, and to recognise him as the independent sovereign of Egypt—a concession which, there is little doubt, will be at once sanctioned by the European powers; and we have thus the prospect of witnessing, at no distant date, the re-establishment of a dynasty, whose previous existence, with all the wondrous circumstances and associations therewith connected, is, from the lapse of ages, invested with all the characteristic hues and interest of romance. If there be a man now living capable of regenerating the moral character of the Syrians, and rendering Egypt, as an independent empire, in some degree worthy of her ancient name and fame, it seems to be Mohammed Ali (Ibrahim's father), who, for corporeal and intellectual activity, decision of purpose, promptness of action, and liberal and enlightened views of government, bears no inconsiderable resemblance to Charlemagne himself.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

FRESH negotiations have commenced between the British, French, and Dutch governments, with a view to an amicable adjustment of the claims of the latter; hitherto, however, without any appearance of a successful result. On the contrary, the King of Holland has issued an order, imposing a tax on all foreign ships entering the Scheldt; and as the duty varies according to the value of the cargo, the order necessarily implies a right of search. Three offices have been established for collecting the duty; one at Flushing, another at Batz, and a third at Las de Gand. The tax or toll was to be levied on all vessels passing up the river subsequently to the 8th ult; and it is said that already two brigs, one a Swede, and the other an Austrian, have been subjected to the regulation of search, but subsequently released, the former on account of having entered the river on the 7th, and the latter upon the master's giving security to pay the duty which may be claimed by the Dutch government. This proceeding is certainly, to say the least of it, a bold one, and promises any thing but a speedy removal of the difficulties which have so long baffled the efforts of the mediatory powers to bring the disputes between Holland and Belgium to a peaceful termination. What renders this circumstance the more unaccountable, is the fact—if fact it be, which is stated as such in a demi-official London journal (the Globe)—that a recent application by the King of Holland to the Emperor Nicholas, for assistance in extricating him from the difficulties in which he is involved, met with a refusal, accompanied by a recommendation to settle his differences with France and England as speedily as possible.

PORTUGAL.

EVERY arrival from Portugal brings fresh accounts of the utter hopelessness of Pedro's attempt to dispossess Miguel of the throne of that kingdom, or even to excite the slightest display of popular feeling against the usurper. This latter fact may be viewed as perfectly decisive of the result of the contest between the two brothers (unless, indeed, in the event of foreign intervention, of which there appears little chance), and confirms the doubts, now begun to be pretty generally entertained, regarding the atrocious cruelties and wanton acts of oppression said to be daily perpetrated by Miguel on his countrymen. On the 24th of January, a sortie was made by Marshal Solignac against the troops of Don Miguel, who had commenced to retreat; but, in consequence of a signal being made by Don Pedro to one of the divisions to retire, great confusion took place, and the Marshal ordered the troops to fall back upon the city. The loss on the part of Don Pedro, according to official accounts, was 18 killed and 95 wounded, and on the part of the enemy it is stated at upwards of 600 killed and wounded. Since then, matters have become daily worse in Oporto; provisions can scarcely be procured; and, to add to the horrors of famine, it is reported that cholera has broken out in the city. Don Pedro is now said to place his whole reliance for success on the aid of France.

FRANCE.

THE bill of the French Ministry to suppress armed insurrection, and to punish the insurgents by military tribunals, partly transcribed from the law "on the state of siege," which was attempted to be enforced against the disturbers of June last, but which the Court of Cassation declared to be cancelled, is likely to be lost in the Chamber of Peers, or to be withdrawn by the government before it is brought to the test of a vote.

GREECE.

INTELLIGENCE has been received at Munich of the arrival of the King of Greece, with the Regency and the Bavarian troops, at Napoli di Romania, where they were received with great joy. The squadron was met by Greek vessels at the point of the Morea, and escorted by more than a thousand vessels and boats of every description to the place of disembarkation.

WEST INDIES.

By recent arrivals from Jamaica, we have an account of the dissolution of the House of Assembly by the Governor, with an intimation that he has no view of calling them together again, his intention being to summon a new Assembly, in the election of which the new constituency, namely, the coloured population, will have a vote. The immediate cause of the dissolution is a difference that has taken place between the two branches of the legislature, the Council having claimed a right to originate bills, the exercise of which has been discontinued for more than a century. This difference having put an end to the slender hopes that are entertained of transacting the public business satisfactorily, no alternative was left the Governor but to dissolve the Assembly. There are obviously, however, more serious causes of difference between the Governor and the Assembly, than between the two houses, and these must have led to the dissolution of that body, independent of any other cause. Respecting the condition of the slaves in the West Indies, and the measures necessary for ameliorating their condition, the views of the government at home, and the colonial legislature, are, we regret to state, diametrically opposite; nor does there appear to be the least prospect of any better agreement.

ENGLAND.

Jan. 28. The Reverend H. Champion De Crespigny, son of the late Sir W. De Crespigny, was sentenced, in the Insolvent Debtors' Court, to six months' imprisonment, as a punishment for his extravagance and unjustifiable conduct to his creditors. He will also be compelled to pay L. 30 into court previous to obtaining his discharge, for their benefit.

Feb. 1. As the second class train of carriages on the Liverpool railway was proceeding over Parr Moss, near the village of Newton, one of the tubes which passes longitudinally through the boiler burst. This occasioned a stoppage, but was not an accident of any moment. Several passengers got out of the carriages to see what was going on. In consequence of the accident, a large body of steam was generated, which enveloped them completely. Meanwhile, the train of waggons proceeding from Bolton to Liverpool came up. The persons who had alighted were not aware of its approach, and the engineers of the Bolton train did not stop their engines. The consequences were dreadful. Several persons were knocked down, and the wheels of the train passed over four of them. Three of the unfortunate party were killed on the spot, their bodies being dreadfully crushed; the fourth survived, and was taken forward to the infirmary.

2. Mr J. D. C. Lamont, second lieutenant of the Briton, was tried by a court-martial at Portsmouth, for using insulting language to the first lieutenant of that ship, Mr Patten, and subsequently sending him a challenge, and using threatening language towards him on the quarter-deck. The court found him guilty upon all the charges, and dismissed him from the service.

13. Mr Bingham, one of the confidential clerks of Messrs Bloxham and Company, bankers, of Dursley, was knocked down about five o'clock, and robbed of bank notes and gold to the amount of about L. 6000.

17. The expedition in search of Captain Ross sailed in the Hibernia, Captain Maxwell, for New York; Captain Back, commander.

18. About four o'clock, William Mellish, Esq. of York Place, the celebrated contractor, and formerly member for Middlesex, was passing through Spread Eagle Alley, between Finch Lane and Threadneedle Street, where he was accosted by Captain Folger, formerly in his employ, respecting some disputed account. High words ensued, when Captain Folger drew out a pistol and shot him. The ball took effect on the back of Mr Mellish's head. Captain Folger was instantly seized. Mr Mellish bled profusely, and it was believed he was mortally wounded. He was conveyed to the house of a medical gentleman in the neighbourhood, where, on examination, the injury was found to be only a flesh wound, and not of a dangerous character. It was immediately dressed, and when the last accounts left the city, Mr Mellish was doing well. Captain Folger was conveyed to the Compter. The unhappy man offered no resistance whatever, stating that Mr Mellish had been his ruin, and that he was determined to be revenged. The ball perforated the back of the neck, and was found in a tailor's shop, after having passed through one of the shutters.

19. The council of the Birmingham Political Union held a meeting. Mr G. F. Muntz, Mr B. Attwood, the Reverend T. Macdonnell, and others, addressed the meeting in speeches expressive of great disappointment at the conduct of the Ministry. They said that it was evident that no measures calculated to be of real service to the country were to be expected from them, unless they were compelled to bring them forward by the universal cry of the people from one end of the country to the other. The coercive measures towards Ireland were also strongly denounced. Mr Macdonnell said, that Lord Grey had contrived "to extract all the virus of former acts of coercion, and had concentrated them in one focus." It was determined to hold a public meeting of the inhabitants of Birmingham, at Beardsworth's Repository, on the succeeding Monday. The Northern Political Union, of which the headquarters are at Newcastle, and which can assemble seventy thousand persons, has also declared against the coercive measure for Ireland. A meeting on the subject was also to be held at Wolverhampton during the week of our publication.

Government have permitted a patent to be taken out for distilling spirits from mangel wurzel, which was powerfully resisted by corn growers and agriculturists.

The reports printed for the House of Commons during the last session will form forty volumes in folio.

His Majesty's Attorney-General has directed a nolle prosequi to be entered upon all the informations against the Bristol magistrates, so that no farther proceedings can be made therefrom.

The deaths of Earl Fitzwilliam and Alderman Waithman will cause two vacancies in the House of Commons. By the former, the accession of Lord Milton to the House of Lords makes an opening in the representation of the northern division of Northamptonshire; and, by the latter, a vacancy ensues in that of the city of London. Viscount Milton, eldest son of (the now) Earl Fitzwilliam, was twenty-one on the 18th of January, and, it is said, will make his political debut in the present Parliament as one of the members for the borough of "fortunate Malton," by the retirement of one of its present representatives. He is heir-apparent to one of the largest fortunes in the Peerage. The honourable C. Wentworth Fitzwilliam has been called upon to stand for the vacancy in the representation of Northamptonshire, by a requisition signed by 1185 of the electors. Several names are mentioned as candidates for the vacancy in the metropolis; amongst whom are Mr John Irving, of the house of Reid, Irving, and Co.; Mr Lloyd, jun. the banker; Mr Lyall, the late unsuccessful candidate; and Mr Alderman Venables.

Lord Brougham, it is said, has not allowed the name of a clergyman to be inserted in any commission of the peace since he has held the seals; and it is intended to omit them in all future renewals of commissions.

A petition from Liverpool, signed by 3010 persons, principally belonging to the middle classes, for the disfranchisement of the burgesses of that town, has been sent to Mr Bennett, the member for Wiltshire, for presentation to the House of Commons.

The Earl and Countess of Errol have been presented by the King with apartments in St James's Palace, which will save his Lordship the expense of a town residence.

The expenses of Mr Miles, the conservative candidate for East Somerset, will, it is rumoured, exceed £50,000.

The Bishop of Durham has dispensed in private charity, during the last year, upwards of nine thousand pounds.

We learn, from an authentic source, that it is not the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to propose any alteration in the newspaper stamp duties until April, when the state of the financial year shall have been declared. There is a surplus of £600,000 on the last year, but this will do little more than cover the deficiency previously occasioned by the reduction of taxes. As far as the state of the financial year, ending the 5th of April, can be judged of by the present appearance, there will be a surplus of rather more than half a million; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not, we believe, yet made up his mind as to whether he should apply the surplus to the diminution of the excise duties, the reduction of the assessed taxes, or of newspaper stamps.—Sun.

The income of the Wesleyan Missionary Society for 1832, is ascertained to exceed £47,500.

We take the following from the Journal du Commerce of Lyons, of the 27th ult.:—"Two days ago, a mercantile house was opening some bales of cotton, when, to the astonishment of those engaged in the operation, there was found in one of them the body of a negro, bent double, and carefully packed in the middle of it."—[This story is not incredible. Some years ago, Mr W. Gray, of Boston, at that time the largest ship-owner in the United States, and engaged extensively in the West India trade, found a young "nigger" snugly preserved in a hog'shead of rum. He ordered his cooper to head up the cask immediately, and not to mention what he had seen; adding this truly mercantile remark—"If I buy the devil, I'll try to sell him."]

Mr Goldsmid, a Jew, has recently been called to the English bar—the first instance.

The subscriptions to the Arctic Land Expedition in search of Captain Ross, amount to £5750, including £2000 given by government. This sum is considered sufficient for the purpose.

Sir J. F. Herschel, having terminated his series of calculations on the subject of the double stars, is on the point of embarking for the Cape of Good Hope, with the intention of continuing his observations on these stars.

JOHNSON THE MURDERER.—The extreme fear of death which agitated this poor wretch wrought a most surprising effect on the animal system. Just before execution, the beating of his pulse was almost imperceptible, and the surgeon of the prison was of opinion that he could not have existed twenty-four hours longer, with the prospect of his ignominious punishment in view.

STATISTICAL FACTS.

The total revenue of Van Dieman's Land, for the first quarter of 1832, was £18,844, 1s. 9^d. The expenses of the government were £24,553, 4s. 0^d.

The number of vessels composing the British navy amounts to 574, viz.—Fourteen carry 120 guns, five 110, three 108, twelve 84, ten 80, nine 78, six 76, sixty-two 74, seven 52, fifteen 50, sixty-two 46, and twenty 42. The remainder carry from 36 to 2 guns each. In this number are included twenty government steam-vessels. This immense fleet employs 20,000 sailors and 12,000 royal marines.

The length of the paved streets and roads in England and Wales is calculated at 20,000 miles; that of the roads which are not paved at about 100,000 miles. The extent of the turnpike roads, as appears by Parliamentary documents, in 1823, was 24,531 miles.

During the last year there were 209 fires in London, but only six of any magnitude. The number of fires has been gradually decreasing for the last three or four years.

From the trade between Great Britain and the West Indies, £30,000,000 a-year are realised; while it gives employment to multitudes of artisans, and to 20,000 seamen.

A correspondent of the Times has sent to that journal a statement of the comparative decline of British and foreign shipping in the port of London, by which it appears that British shipping has declined about 19 per cent. whilst the decrease in foreign tonnage is no less than 43 per cent. It would certainly seem, therefore, that if the shipping trade of London is on the decline, it has not been taken out of our hands by foreigners.

The customs duties received at the port of Liverpool during the last year amounted to nearly four millions sterling, giving an excess of £325,000 over those of the preceding year. As the total increase in the kingdom was only £223,167, not only must the whole of that increase have taken place in this port, but the deficiencies of other places must have been compensated for by the improvement of the trade of Liverpool.

Pauperism in Paris.—From an official return of the state of the French metropolis for 1832, it appears that, of the whole population (770,286), 68,986 are maintained at the public expense.

SCOTLAND.

THE CHURCH OF EDINBURGH.

It was stated at a meeting of the Town Council of Edinburgh, on the 20th ult., that during the last year, the tax called annuity, which is designed for the support of the city clergy, instead of producing the £11,157 to which it was stented, and which it formerly produced, realized only £5699, being a defalcation of nearly one half. The stipends of the ministers had thus been reduced from between six and seven hundred a-year, to £346, and they had been obliged to raise £1500 from the banks, upon their personal security, in order to complete the sum necessary for their maintenance.

This is rather a curious circumstance in a public point of view, for it is exactly a miniature of the transactions at present going on in Ireland. There are thirteen parish churches in the Scottish capital, five of which have two ministers each: these eighteen clergymen are appointed by the Town Council. Four of the churches, and those supplied only by one clergyman each, are well frequented. The rest are at various degrees of thinness: some so low as not to draw above £30 for seat-rents; though, annually, about £1400 a-year is, or used to be, paid by tax for their support. The whole sum drawn for seat-rents is absorbed into the town's funds.

For some time past, a large proportion of the citizens of Edinburgh have been endeavouring, by a passive resistance to the payment of the tax, to bring on a revised arrangement as to the city clergy: and certainly, wherever the onus of the initiation of such a measure may lie, it is loudly called for. The most zealous friend of the establishment must allow, that the disproportion between the utility of the city clergy and their nominal incomes, is enormous. The most respectable men—men whose names are mentioned far and wide with respect—do not draw congregations equal to the humblest dissenting meeting-houses; and, in fact, to describe it in one word, the whole system approaches in character to the cathedral system of the Anglican church. It is vain to hope for any redress from the local clergy, or the magistracy; for they seem bent upon increasing, rather than diminishing the evil. Inspired by an unaccountable prepossession for the old parochial divisions, and apparently satisfied that religious zeal is more perfectly shown by the mere building of churches, they are urging the erection of two new places of worship in the inaccessible and deserted Old Town, where it is confessed by the Lord Provost himself, that the nine churches which existed two years ago produced only £2000 in seat-rents; there being a sitting in that haunt of misery and vice for every 2³/₄ souls, while in the New Town, where alone does there exist a population fit to pay seat-rents upon the city scale, or which seems to have a disposition to go to the established churches, there are only sittings for one in every five individuals.

The present is clearly not the time to persist in any system which time has thrown so much into error as this. The enemies of church establishments are by no means enemies to be despised; and where could they find a battering-ram to urge with such effect against the walls of the church, as the state of what may be too emphatically called the church of Edinburgh? It is clearly the interest of the country clergy, and of the friends of establishments in general, to endeavour to procure some alteration in the system we have been describing. The collegiate charges, which chiefly exist in the Old Town, where there are the smallest congregations, should be reduced to single ones, by permitting the incumbents to die out. Even the number of parishes in that quarter of the city might be judiciously abridged. The nomination of the clergy men should be given up to the sitters. The seat-rents should go to the payment of the ministers, and the remainder be allocated upon the proprietors of houses, each parish paying what was deficient within itself. By these and such reforms, the city clergy would have a fair chance in competition with the dissenters whose chapels are now filled with the multitudes who behold the established clergy with indignation and contempt. Nothing else, we are persuaded, can postpone the annihilation of the church of Edinburgh, nor the serious injury of the church of Scotland; for it may be fairly calculated, that, if the hatred of the people towards it be at all measured by the extent of resistance to the annuity tax, it is far beyond all means of redemption except a thorough reform.

CHURCH PATRONAGE.

On Wednesday, 20th February, a meeting of between forty and fifty Scotch members (being the whole of the town) took place in the library of the House of Commons, on the subject of church patronage in Scotland.—Mr Sinclair, member for Caithness, in the chair. Mr Sinclair, after addressing the meeting at some length, proposed the appointment of a select committee, which was seconded by Mr Horatio Ross. The Lord Advocate objected to the appointment of the committee on various grounds. Government, he said, were well aware of the evils complained of, and had measure in contemplation, but perhaps not legislative, in reference to their own patronages, which might set a good example to others, and which would likely be promulgated in a few weeks. He thought that the appointment of a committee would appear ungracious towards the crown, and would involve questions regarding recent appointments, which might place the new incumbents in an invidious position. Mr A. Johnstone expressed great disappointment on the part of himself and many friends at the statement of the Lord Advocate. He was himself prepared to bring in a bill on the subject, but from his Lordship's statement being so favourably received by the meeting, he would make no motion at that time, and would wait until the proposition of Ministers was declared. He added, that a memorial had been presented on the subject to Lord Melbourne by 300 or 400 Scotch gentlemen, to which no answer had been returned; but that he would receive the Lord Advocate's declaration as an answer. The presentations since Ministers had come into office, he said, had been in several instances most unsatisfactory; and as to the call, he expected nothing at the hands of the General Assembly, considering their division of 120 to 80 of that question last year; and even supposing that the Assembly did do something regarding the call, they ought never to satisfy the country so long as the right of patronage were suffered to exist. After some farther conversation, the meeting broke up; and the subject will come before Parliament again, when the different anti-patronage petitions are presented.

COLONIAL SLAVERY.

On Tuesday the 26th ultimo, a Mr Borthwick delivered the last of a series of addresses, or lectures, in the Assembly Rooms, George Street, in this city, on the subject of the comparative merits of gradual and immediate emancipation. His audiences have throughout been most numerous and respectable, and have listened to his statements with the greatest interest and attention. His chief objects in these addresses have been to demonstrate, 1st, The perilous and destructive consequences that would ensue, not more to Great Britain and the slave proprietors, than to the slaves themselves, by being emancipated instantly, without any previous preparation or training; 2d, To rebut and expose the calumnious statements regarding the physical treatment of slaves in the colonies, and the obstacles said to be thrown in the way of their moral enlightenment and ultimate emancipation by their owners. Mr Borthwick utterly disclaims being a friend to slavery, or to its continuance on any longer than is consistent with the public safety or the interest of the slaves themselves. By reference to Parliamentary and other documents, Mr Borthwick proved that the planters had been the first to petition and did so repeatedly, for the abolition of the traffic in slaves, which petitions were as often rejected by the British legislature. This was previous to the great measure of abolition which came into effect in 1807. Scarcely a year, he said, had passed over since that time, without some measure being carried for ameliorating the condition of the slaves. There was no such thing now as irresponsible power—the same law that protects the master's property protects also that of the slave—the same law that protects the master's person protects the slave's—the same law that protects the master's wife and children protects the wife and children of the slave. It was much more easy now for a slave to obtain redress against a planter, than for a planter to obtain redress against a slave. The inveterate attention to caste has been almost entirely done away. The slave may now become free, and, having become free, he may sit in the House.

MARCH, 1833.

Assembly in Jamaica. There were now, he said, two men of colour members of that body, and in the Council of Demerara there was one man, Hopkinson, a member, who was born in the condition of a slave. In fact, he said, there is now only one evil of the system remaining, namely, that man is yet the possession of his fellow-man; beyond that, every point of slavery had been abolished by the planter in his own Assembly. He also read a document, showing that upwards of 16,000 slaves had been emancipated within the last ten years, two-thirds of whom had been freed gratuitously by their masters. Emancipation, he said, to be safe or beneficial, must come from the planters themselves, whose undoubted interest, as well as inclination it was, to get it adopted as speedily as possible. Whatever may be thought of Mr Borthwick's views, he is certainly a powerful orator, both as to command of language and imitation of address, and possesses a fine full-toned voice. During his address, he continually resorted to Parliamentary papers and other documents, to substantiate his statements, asserting, that the greater part of the effusions of the members of the Anti-Slavery Association consisted of mere random affirmations, without any proof. He dwelt particularly on the remarkable discrepancies between the evidence of Mr Knibb, as given before the House of Lords, and his harangues to the public.—In the Glasgow papers, we find accounts of a public disputation, held in that city, between Mr Borthwick and Mr Thomson, agent for the Anti-Slavery Society, and, of course, the advocate of immediate emancipation. The discussion lasted three days, amid great tumult and uproar, the audiences being appointed the arbitrators; but finally terminated, on Thursday the 21st ult., in favour of Mr Thomson, by a great majority.

BANK HOLIDAYS.

ALTHOUGH bankers are in no respect privileged above ordinary traders, they assume a ridiculous superiority over their commercial brethren, in as far as, on certain days of the year, they shut up their shops, to their own advantage and pleasure, and the grievous loss and inconvenience of all other men. There are eight out of the 313 lawful days on which these tradesmen affect religious scruples about doing business, and, of these, three are the anniversaries of historical events in which no mortal man has been in the least degree interested for several ages. On a recent occasion, the publishers of this paper were subjected to a troublesome pecuniary inconvenience, because on that day one hundred and eighty-four years, a puritanical militia cut off the head of their sovereign. On next 29th of May, they may, perhaps, be subjected to a greater inconvenience, because on that day a hundred and seventy-three years, the son of the said sovereign was restored to a throne, which, according to the sense of all men since his time, he abused. Again, on the next 5th of November, worse evils still may befall, because on that day two hundred and twenty-eight years, a few men, driven to religious desperation, conspired to blow up the king and his senators with gunpowder. The holidays, altogether, bating those which are really holidays, form one of the most troublesome, and, at the same time, contemptible grievances that afflict our country.

Jan. 31. This day a dinner was given to Sir George Clerk at Dalkeith, by his friends and supporters in that district of the county. At five o'clock, about three hundred gentlemen sat down to an excellent dinner in the White Hart Inn, Robert Dundas, Esq. of Arntoun, in the chair, supported on his right by Sir George Clerk, on his left by Lord John Scott. Mr Burn Callander, of Prestonhall, and Mr Fraser, of Ford, officiated as croupiers. Among the principal speakers, besides the Chairman and Sir George Clerk, were Lord John Scott, Mr P. Robertson, and Mr C. Neaves, advocates, Sir F. W. Drummond, Sir John Hope, &c. The company separated about half-past ten o'clock, after an evening spent in the most convivial and happy manner.—A large and respectable meeting of friends of the church establishment of Scotland took place in Glasgow, for the purpose of forming a lay association for the abolition of patronage, and the defence of the promotion of the general interests of the church.

Feb. 2. A serious fire took place at Letham, near Mid-Caldar, by which a byre, containing twenty milk cows, was destroyed. The whole cows, except one, were suffocated. The accident arose from a candle falling among the straw in the byre.

11. A splendid dinner was this day given in Glasgow to Mr Forbes, of Callander, the unsuccessful Tory candidate for Stirlingshire. Henry Monteith, Esq. of Carstairs, in the chair. William Smith, Esq. of Jordanhill, croupier. Upwards of 300 gentlemen of the first rank in the west of Scotland were present.—At the quarterly meeting of the incorporations of Mary's Chapel, Edinburgh, held this day, it was unanimously resolved to petition both Houses of Parliament in favour of burgh reform, and appointed a committee to co-operate with other public bodies for this purpose. Deacon Mackintosh afterwards moved, that from and after Whit-sunday next, no prosecution be commenced against any unfree men for an encroachment on the privileges of the incorporations. The motion was seconded by Mr A. Dodds, slater, and ordered to be taken into consideration at next quarterly meeting. The Lord Provost was elected an honorary member of the incorporations, as a testimony of the high sense which they entertain of the manner in which he has filled the civic chair. The same honour was conferred on the Hon. James Abercromby, M.P. for the city, for his past services in the cause of reform.

19. The ship Thomas, Captain Edward Henley, sailed from Leith Roads with a valuable cargo of goods, and 167 settlers, for Van Dieman's Land and New South Wales.

21. The counting-house of Messrs Gall and Yellowlees, coach-makers, Leith Walk, was broken into this morning, but, after forcing open and searching the desks, only three shillings and two pence were found, and carried off. A drawer in one of the desks, containing L.50 in bank notes, luckily escaped the notice of the thieves. A phosphorus box and several matches were found in one of the desks, and in another a bundle of accounts was found partially consumed, being, no doubt, set fire to by the miscreants in revenge for their disappointment.

The medical examinations in the University of Edinburgh are ordered to be conducted henceforth in the English instead of the Latin language.

The subscription towards erecting a monument to the memory of Sir Walter Scott amounts to upwards of L.5000.

Military in Scotland and Ireland.—It would appear, from a table in the United Service Gazette, showing the present stations of the British army, that the number of regiments at present in Ireland is 26, and of reserve corps 20; while in Scotland there is only one regiment and one battalion (lying in Glasgow barracks), and six reserve corps.

The late Alexander Piteairn, Esq. of Pratis, has left L.1330 to be divided amongst the different charitable institutions of Dundee. Banff, Feb. 7.—We some time ago noticed the remarkable prevalence of scarlet fever in this town, and we are now sorry to add that its virulence has since greatly increased. At first it was confined principally to children, but grown-up persons now are not exempted from its ravages. So great has the mortality been of late, that the magistrates have deemed it advisable, as a precautionary measure, to cause the Academy to be closed for a fortnight. —Aberdeen Herald.

It is stated that the Rev. Dr Stirling, minister of Craigie, is to be proposed as Moderator of the next General Assembly.

The Kelso Mail notices that the Wandering Piper lately performed through the streets of Morpeth. We look upon this person, whoever he is, as an intolerable nuisance, and wonder that the newspapers are so eager on all occasions to favour his paltry desire of notoriety. The puppy should be tossed in a blanket.

From the tables just published by Oliver and Boyd, as an appendix to the Almanack, we find that the registered constituency of Scotland is as follows:—

Voters in the burghs	-	-	31,324
Ditto in the counties	-	-	33,222

Total - - - 64,546

Owing to various causes, however, many persons duly qualified did not register; and, perhaps, if the whole of these were included, the total number of electors in Scotland would not be less than 75,000. Under the old system, the burgh magistrates, with the freeholders, formed an aggregate constituency of about 4200; so that the reform bill has multiplied our electors fifteen fold.

Desecration of the Sabbath.—Numerous public meetings have been held in various parts of Scotland during the past month, at Greenock, Lanark, Dollar, Ayr, Dunfermline, Tweedsmuir, &c. &c.; from all of which places petitions have been sent up to Parliament, praying for the enactment of some measure to enforce a stricter attention to the duties of the Sabbath than is generally practised.

New Provincial Branch Banks.—The Commercial Bank has lately established agencies at Dunbar and Melrose. The National Bank has also opened branches at Kelso and Hawick. Respite.—Michael McCabe, printer, who, as stated in our last, was sentenced to death for robbing Alexander Bain, fish-curer, on 4th December last, has been respited during his Majesty's pleasure. Cochrane, the socius criminis of McCabe, has since been apprehended, and remitted to the Sheriff for trial.

Fisheries.—The salmon fishings north of Tweed opened on Friday, 1st February—those of the Tweed itself on the 16th.—The herring fishing in Lochfyne has been going on with great success; as a proof of which we may mention, that one day lately one boat caught the extraordinary number of fifty-five maeze. None of the boats had less than five maeze.

Ship Building.—At no period these many years back has the ship-building business on the banks of the Clyde been brisker than at present. There are about 20 vessels on the stocks at the slip-dock, Dumbarton, Port-Glasgow, and Greenock, among which are three or four steamers of immense size, destined to ply on English and Irish stations.—Glasgow Courier.

The editor and publishers of the Reformer's Gazette have been liberated from prison; two gentlemen having become security for the expenses of the prosecution against them.—Glasgow Chronicle.

DISASTERS AT SEA.

During the snowy weather about the 5th of January, the sloop Mary of Campbelltown, of about forty tons, Heyman master, voyage unknown, was cast ashore, and broken up near Sandwood Bay, six or seven miles west from Cape Wrath, and it is supposed that all hands have perished, as the boat was found at some distance in a broken up state.

On Sunday night, 3d ult., a large brig, name unknown, was dashed to pieces on Kerry-head, off the Shannon, when all on board perished. She was laden with salt.

The sloop, Packet of Ayr, left Dundalk on Saturday the 2d ult., in company with the Kirkcubright Castle, of Kirkcubright, both vessels laden with flour and seeds. The Packet struck on West Hoyle Bank, on Sunday morning, at half-past seven o'clock, and capsized; the corpse of the master, D. Moffat, was found lashed to the vessel, and J. Samson and A. M'Sporran, two of the crew, were washed overboard, and drowned; the mate, J. Gitting, was saved by the Point of Ayr life-boat, after being four hours on the wreck. Both the master and Samson, we are sorry to learn, have left wives and families to lament their loss. The anchors, cables, rigging, and some sails, are the only articles saved. The Kirkcubright Castle struck soon after the Packet, and also became a wreck. Of her crew, the master and one man only were saved.

On Friday, the 9th ult., the sloop, Margaret of Limekilns, laden with manure, from Leith to Dysart, sunk near Inchkeith, and the master, James Ronald, and his son, a young boy, were unfortunately drowned. Another man and boy, who were on deck, leaped into the boat, and were drifted on shore at Buckhaven.

Early on Wednesday morning, the 20th, three Newhaven pilots boarded a sloop belonging to Perth, supposed to be the William and Mary, laden with coals, about three miles north from Newhaven, which they found deserted by the crew. It is conjectured she had been run down during the night, and that the crew had escaped on board the other vessel. The pilots applied the pumps, but finding it impossible to keep her afloat, left her, when she almost immediately went down. No account has yet been received regarding the crew. It blew a heavy gale from the eastward all night, accompanied with sleet and rain.

Leith.—On Wednesday, the 20th, it blew one of the severest gales from the south-east that we have had this season. Several vessels were driven back to the roadstead, after having been beyond the mouth of the Firth. It has been ascertained that six fishing-boats belonging to the Firth were lost that day, with their whole crews, and several others are still missing. Numerous wives have been left widows, and in the small town of Crail thirty-two children have been rendered fatherless.

CRIMES.

High Court of Justiciary.—On Monday, January 28, Thomas Cochrane, a boy, charged with picking a lady's pocket of a pair of spectacles and a seal, in George Street, on the 24th December last, was sentenced to seven years' transportation.

John Wright, carter, and James Gowan, labourer, pleaded guilty of breaking into the slaughter-house of John Graham, fletcher, Gilmerton, through the roof, on the night of the 29th November, and stealing thereout the carcasses of eight sheep. Both prisoners were sentenced to seven years' transportation.

Monday, February 4, John Forsyth, a boy about fourteen years of age, was brought before the Court, charged with housebreaking and theft, aggravated by previous conviction for theft. He pleaded not guilty. Three previous convictions for theft were proved against him. The Jury found the prisoner guilty, and he was sentenced to fourteen years' transportation.

John Barclay, charged with the murder of Samuel Neilson, cattle-dealer, committed in the house of the deceased, in the village of Cambusnethan, by striking him with a hammer, or other lethal weapon, on the 10th October last, and with stealing from his pockets a silver watch, and three one pound notes, was next placed at the bar. The manner and appearance of this prisoner indicated such a defective state of intellect, that the Court deemed it improper that they should have the report of four physicians on the case. The physicians they appointed for this purpose were, Dr Nathan Spens, Dr Hunter, Dr Mackintosh, and Dr Alison, who should report on that day three weeks, to which time the diet against the prisoner was adjourned.

James Miller, hatter, Dalkeith, and John McDonald, baker, Dalkeith, charged on the statute 9 Geo. IV. cap. 69, with entering the plantations of the Marquis of Lothian, in the parish of Newbattle, for the purpose of destroying game or rabbits. Guilty.—They were sentenced to two months' imprisonment in Bridewell. Monday, 11th, James Watt, James Lumsden, and John Lowe, seamen, from Aberdeen, charged with robbery or theft, and with being habit and reputed thieves, and previously convicted of theft, were found guilty, and sentenced to transportation for life.

Monday, 18th, Nichol Shireff, a journeyman butcher, from Leith, charged with stealing L.140 in bank notes, entrusted to him on the 2d of January last, by George Hogg, another journeyman butcher, to convey to their master, Mr A. Cunningham, butcher in Leith, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to seven years' transportation.

William Morrison was outlawed for not appearing to answer to a charge of forgery.

Monday, 25th, John Barclay, charged with the murder of Samuel Neilson, cattle-dealer at Cambusnethan, was again placed at the bar, when the medical gentlemen appointed by a remit from the Court were severally examined as to the state of the prisoner's mind; but as they still appeared to entertain much uncertainty on the subject, the Court intimated their intention of taking some time to consider of their deliverance, and for that purpose continued the diet against the prisoner.

John Smith or Paterson, who had pleaded guilty to a charge of forgery at the Dumfries circuit, was next brought into Court, and counsel were heard as to whether his crime was one which necessarily inferred capital punishment. Their Lordships found that they had the power, without the restriction of the Prosecutor, to modify the punishment, and from the peculiar nature of the document, and the smallness of the amount of fraud contemplated—only twelve shillings—restricted the punishment to six months' further imprisonment in the jail of Dumfries.

STATE OF TRADE.

Export of Cotton Goods.—According to Burn's Commercial Glance for 1832, there has been a considerable increase in the export of cotton yarn during the last twelve months, as compared with the preceding year. To Germany alone, the increase amounts to near nine millions of pounds weight, and to Russia six millions. The export to India was considerably less than in 1831, and shipments of this article to the Mediterranean shew a considerable diminution in quantity. The exports of piece goods, however, appear to have been less extensive last year than in 1831. In plain and printed calicoes, the decrease, it appears, amounted to near fifty millions of yards. There seems, however, to have been a larger export of muslins, fustians, and some other articles of inferior importance.

Lancashire.—Throughout the past month, the calico and silk printing has been more brisk at Middleton than it has been for the last ten years. The silk weaving at Middleton, Fallowfield, and the neighbouring towns for several miles round Manchester, has been also very brisk. Cotton weavers are in much request, though the quantity of power-looms in Hyde, Duckinfield, Staley Bridge, and Ashton, amounts at present to at least 14,000, and preparations are making for 2000 more, which will be at work in a short time. The cotton factories at Rochdale, Heywood, Bury, and other places, are working full time, and preparations are making for the building new factories next spring. Woollen weaving at Rochdale has been brisk. Wages in all these branches continue low, but there is an expectation of some improvement.

W.S.
 2. At Exmouth, Lieutenant-General Boye, of the Bombay establishment.
 3. At Blair Street, Edinburgh, Flora Thomson, relict of Mr George Murry, tobaccoist.
 4. Death of Sir John Marjoribanks, Bart.—It is with the deepest regret that we are obliged to record the unexpected decease of Sir John Marjoribanks of Lees, Bart. Though labouring under the infirmities incident to advanced life, for some time past his health was not materially worse than usual, till within a few days back. Indeed his sufferings never became severe till yesterday morning, and he expired this day between three and four o'clock. His death has occasioned a blank in the sphere in which he moved, that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to supply. A most affectionate husband, and anxious father, the loss will, by his own family, be indeed severely felt. Sir John began life in the army, and served several years in the Guards. He also engaged in the Volunteer service, at the period when the country required the aid of her best friends. Distinguished above most men of his rank or his day, for his public spirit, the improvements which he promoted in Edinburgh (where, besides being at one time chief magistrate, he long held a prominent place in the Town Council) and in the county of Berwick, for which he was some time member, as well as in Northumberland and other places, will be lasting monuments of his fame. During his provostship of Edinburgh, two very important undertakings marked the energies of his mind; he laid the foundation for the present ample supply of water, and carried into execution the project of the splendid approach from the east by the Waterloo Bridge and Regent's Road, an undertaking which he was enabled to accomplish, within a period astonishingly short, at the risk of his private fortune. The honourable Baronet will be succeeded in his titles and estates by his eldest son, now Sir Edward Marjoribanks, Baronet, at present in India.—At her house, St Cuthbert's Glebe, Miss Duncan.—At Bedford Cottage, near Southampton, James O'Keefe, Esq., the dramatic author, in his 86th year.
 5. At Inverary, Lieutenant-Colonel Colin Campbell, C.B. late of the 34th and royal regiment.
 6. At London, Alderman Waltham, M.P.—At 28, Great King Street, Edinburgh, Mrs Barbara Cheslie, relict of William Forbes, Esq.; and, in the same afternoon, Miss Ann Cheslie; both daughters of the late Reverend John Cheslie, minister of Corstorphine.
 9. The Rev. David Williamson, parish clergyman of Newburgh.—At Brighton, the hon. Sir Charles Leslie, Bart. eldest son of the late Sir Lucas Pepys and Elizabeth Jane, Countess of Rothes.
 10. At 11, Howe Street, Edinburgh, John Thorburn, Esq. S.S.C.—At 10, George Street, Dr Alexander Torrance, surgeon.—At Edinburgh, Master William Thomson Honyman, of Mansfield, son of the late William Thomson Honyman, Esq. advocate.—At her house, 29, South Frederick Street, Miss M. Patton.
 11. At Lauriston, Marshall, the infant son of Mr Thomas Clapperton.—At Charlotte Street, Leith, aged twelve weeks, Jane, and, on the 12th, Elizabeth, twin-daughters of Thomas Jones, Esq. agent of the Bank of Scotland there.
 13. At Edinburgh, Thomas Learmonth, youngest son of the right hon. the Lord Provost.—At 1, Charlotte Square, John, infant son of Mr Watson.—At the manse of Longforgan, Cecilia Cornfute, wife of the Rev. R. S. Walker, minister of the parish of Longforgan.
 14. At Prince's Street, Miss Margaret Wilson, daughter of the late William Wilson of Howden, writer to the signet, in her 71st year.
 15. At his mother's house, 41, George Street, Mr James Chambers, bookseller, 48, Hanover Street, aged 25, much regretted by all who knew him. He was an amiable and promising young man, and had just entered upon a business in which his prospects were in the highest degree favourable.—At 30, St James's Square, Edinburgh, Mr John Aitken, late editor of Constable's Miscellany, &c. much regretted.—At 10, Hill Street, James, fourth son of the Rev. William Menzies, minister of Lanark.—At 3, Shrub Place, Leith Walk, James Dalziel, junior, statutory.
 17. At Edinburgh, the Reverend Alexander Lang, rector of the Circus Place School.
 18. At Leven, Mrs Elder, wife of Mr John Elder, bookseller.—At Edinburgh, Mr Alexander Ponton, late farmer at Ballgreen.

Very general disappointment—perhaps we should say indignation—appears to be felt at the paucity of the Scotch representatives who voted with Hume in support of his motion recommending retrenchment and economy, and for the abolition of naval and military sinecures. One burgh has already publicly testified its disapprobation of the conduct of its representative on the above motion, in a manner sufficiently unequivocal. The Kelso Mail (Feb. 25th) says—"A number of the constituents of Mr Stewart of Alderston (a vehement reformer) met at Jedburgh a few days ago, and entered into resolutions expressive of their detestation of the conduct of their representative, in having voted against Mr Hume's motion for the abolition of sinecures, &c., contrary to his duty and pledges, and calling upon him to resign his seat forthwith."

Throughout the past month, erysipelas—by no means a common disease in this quarter—has been very prevalent, and, at the same time, we regret to say, very fatal in Edinburgh; so much so, that a medical friend of ours, of extensive practice and experience, is strongly impressed with the idea that it is owing to some predisposing qualities in the atmosphere. It is worthy of notice, that almost all the patients have belonged to the middle classes of society. Amongst its victims were the Rev. Mr Limont, and John Aitken, Esq. formerly Editor of Constable's Miscellany, &c., individuals than whom few have been more generally esteemed, or whose loss will be more deeply regretted in their respective circles of friendship. We learn that scarlet fever has also been raging with great severity in various districts of Scotland.

Original Anecdote of Burns.—Burns, during his last illness, was visited by a religious acquaintance. The conversation took a religious turn, and Burns confessed having led an irreligious life, and felt pained at it, but said, "I dare not now offer to my Maker the dregs of my existence." The anecdote is said to rest upon good authority, and a clergyman of undoubted veracity and respectability repeated it the other Sabbath from the pulpit while addressing his congregation.—Fifeshire Journal.—[A new weekly newspaper published at Kirkaldy, which appears to be conducted with much judgment and ability.]

Hemlock, &c.—Professor Geiger, of Heidelberg, whilst recently engaged in making chemical experiments, succeeded in establishing some remarkable illustrations of the active principle of hemlock. Its base is an organic salt, which opens an entirely novel series of these highly interesting organic substances, for it is volatile, and similar to a volatile oil. The peculiar qualities of this substance, both intrinsically and when brought into combination with acids, its rapidly changeable character, and the brilliant play of colours which it exhibits whilst undergoing change, render it one of the most interesting productions in organic chemistry. Its poison is of the deadliest description. The smallest quantity applied inwardly produces paralysis, and one or two grains are sufficient to kill the largest animal. Another of Professor Geiger's late discoveries is the active principle of henbane (Atropin); its base is likewise an organic salt, but it is tenacious, admits of being reduced to a crystal, forms a crystalline salt, with acids, like hemlock, and has a disagreeable smell, though it is not volatile, unless it be subjected to decomposition. Its poison is quite as deadly as that of the former, but exhibits dissimilar appearances, and is not so rapid in its effects. Animals, where even a minute dose is administered, become languid, cannot stand upon their legs, are attacked by convulsions, and die within six hours. The effect of this poison in dilating the pupil of the eye is extremely remarkable. The minutest portion of it, when applied to the eye of a cat, produces a dilation of the pupil for the next four-and-twenty hours; and the hundredth part of a grain prolongs the appearance for the next seven or eight days, besides inducing other singular symptoms of poisoning.—Athenaeum.

A British officer, writing to a friend, thus speaks of the island of Ceylon:—"I am dying with impatience to return to the only country I am fully persuaded is worth living in. The heat of this climate is insufferable: it positively annihilates a man. It is true we have a magnificent country, richly wooded and watered, enamelled with a thousand flowers, abounding in all the necessities of life—a brilliant sun, a sweet moon (as a lady said to me the other night); but then we have elephants, tigers, serpents, scorpions, alligators, leeches, tarantulas; and the heat! my dear—nothing out of the infernal regions can equal it; and yet there are people here, and elsewhere, who talk in raptures of Ceylon, and who would not return to London on any account. The only wish I have here is to be iced, and to have every tooth in my head loosened by a saw-wester. Sometimes, by the bye, I have a longing for a mouthful of London fog, and to be up to my neck in the Thames. I would give sun, moon, the seven stars, and the southern crop to boot, for a beef steak and oyster sauce in — Place. After all, what the devil is there in a tropical climate so very attractive? Brilliant nights! I have not slept for hours together since I have been in Ceylon, from the heat and mosquitoes."—Sherborne Journal.

Dinner-giving People.—Now, the coterie to which the Martindales instinctively attached themselves, was of the genus called "dinner-giving people," a large, and (as the newspapers say), "influential" body (chiefly resident in the N.N.W. of London), who make it the business of their lives to assemble at their tables three or four times a month, sixteen well-dressed individuals, severally possessed of an amount of plate, linen, china, and domestics, equal to their own; and who, in reward for this mechanical act of hospitality, are entitled to dine on all the other days, in a company equally numerous, and on viands equally delicate. The ambition of displaying, at their own board, meat in due season, and fruit out of it—of obtaining Sir Thomas's opinion that their hock is superior to that of Sir Charles, and securing Lady Charlotte's verdict that their peaches are three weeks earlier than those of Sir Thomas—suffices for their happiness; and there is a steadiness of dull decorum about the tribe, an affectation of rationality and "charming people"—sort of excellence, essentially different from the sprightliness of ball-haunters, and the brilliancy of genuine fashionables. Fashionables and ball-haunters, of course, occasionally dine out; but they always remain distinct from the lumbering class of regular dinner-giving people.—Sketch-Book of Fashion.

Kirriemuir—An Ingenious Piece of Mechanism.—It is often the case that great genius and superior skill in the arts and sciences lie buried in obscurity in some remote district of the country, and are never heard of. Several instances have come to our knowledge, some of them belonging to this town. In particular, our notice has lately been directed to an ingenious piece of mechanism highly creditable to the artist who formed it. It is time-piece or clock, of a very curious construction, having four wheels in the train, and beating half-second.

It has four hands—the first of which, going round the dial in twenty-four hours, points out the hours and minutes. The second, going round in twenty-seven days seven hours, and forty-three minutes, indicates, with the greatest precision, the moon's place in her orbit, carrying a small painted ball at its point, one half black and the other yellow, gradually turning round by machinery from the centre, shewing the moon's phases. It may be remarked, that this hand projects from a small plate in the centre of the dial, on which are painted the days of the moon's age. The third hand goes round in one year shewing the sun's place in his orbit every day, indicating not only the revolution of the seasons, but the day of the month and the age of the moon. The fourth hand goes round in eighteen years two hundred and odd days. This hand stretches across the dial, on one end of which are painted the limits of solar eclipses, and on the other the limits of lunar eclipses. By this hand, together with the one that indicates the progress of the sun and the moon, are shewn the time of solar and lunar eclipses a mean time. The whole of this piece of ingenious mechanism was invented and calculated by James Thomson stocking weaver, and the work was partly executed by the late David Horn, a common blacksmith.

There is something remarkable in the number of deaths which have occurred during the past year amongst the higher classes, and amongst the eminent persons of Europe. In our own peerage, there have died—the Marquis of Conyngham, Lord Ribblesdale, Lord Berwick Lord and Lady Tenterden, Lord Donoughmore, Lord Cassilis, Lord Thanet, Lord Clinton, Lord Cadogan Lord Rendlesham, Lord Macdonald, Lord Amesbury Lord De Clifford, besides others whom we do not at the moment recollect, and several younger branches of noble families at early ages. Amongst those distinguished by talents, we have lost, Sir Walter Scott, Sir J. Mackintosh, Goethe, Crabbe, Cuvier, Casimir Perier, Charles Butler, Jeremy Bentham, Dr Bell, the founder of the system of education which has acquired his name, St. Everard Home, Sir Alured Clarke, Professor Leslie Colton, Anna Maria Porter, Sir Henry Blackwood, St. Albert Pell, Sir Richard Birnie, the Bishop of Hereford Clement the composer, and young Napoleon. We should not have referred to so serious a subject, but that it really appears to us, taking only a transient glance over the losses the country has sustained during the year, to be infinitely greater in proportion to the population than that of any other twelve months we have before reflected upon.—New Monthly Magazine.

LITERARY NOTICES.

BRITISH LIBRARY.—The second volume of this surpassingly cheap and elegant series commences the miscellaneous works of Goldsmith, which are to be completed in other three volumes. The appearance of the work is undiminished in beauty, and the volume is prefaced, in this instance, with a life of the author, which deserves to be noticed as one of the most delightful specimens of biographical composition, we do not hesitate to say, in the language.

CARDING AND SPINNING MASTER'S ASSISTANT.—This is a respectably-sized octavo volume, published by Mr Niven, jun. Glasgow, giving a complete history of the rise progress, and practical details of cotton-spinning in Great Britain; plans for cotton-mills; views of the internal structure of the machinery; rules for calculating the speed of the various wheels, cylinders, &c. It is at once a most interesting and valuable work.

A WORD UPON POPULATION.

HERE are two ways of viewing mankind—the one proceeding on too narrow an examination of what they have already been and appear to be in their present highly artificial and ill-assorted social condition, and the other proceeding on a wide and universal inquiry into their capabilities as rational beings, and their power of remedying, to a great extent, if allowed the free exercise of their ingenuity, nearly all the miseries to which they are subject through the influence of conventional arrangements. These very opposite views have been taken by men of education and ability, and have been maintained with equal pertinacity on both sides. Those who hold the first as more correct, have arrived at the conclusion, that the human race are doomed, through their improvidence, to increase to such an amount, that, in the end—however distant the day may be—a universal starvation and the most awful misery will take place; while those who are of an opposite opinion express it as their belief, that such a doctrine is repugnant not only to the wise provisions established by the laws of nature, but to common sense, and that, in reality, it is not proved by any obvious fact. Dr Thomas Chalmers, a Scottish clergyman and professor, is at present the great bulwark of the doctrine of ultimate and universal starvation. No one, as far as we are aware, has yet distinguished himself by being the defender of the opposite views; but the respectable part of the periodical press has, from time to time, protested against the extraordinary dogma, and endeavoured to explain, by liberal interpretation, the question in political economy which involves the production of man in connection with the quantity of food. Dr Chalmers has recently published a pamphlet, entitled, "The Supreme Importance of a Right Moral to a Right Economical State of the Country," &c. in which it appears that the reverend author has been somewhat nettled at the attacks of the Reviewers; and therefore again, with redoubled energy, advocates the principles to which he has attached himself, and, that we have long desired, has thus afforded an opportunity of examining with greater minuteness the slaty of his pretensions to sound philosophy. The position which the Doctor assumes is, "that the rate at which population would increase, if the adequate means of subsistence were at all times within reach, greatly exceeds the rate at which the means of subsistence can increase, with all the aids and practicable openings, which either the mechanical arts, or the sound and liberal policy of governments, could afford to human labour." Which position we deny; and our reasons for such a denial are simply, that no proper proof has ever been brought forward to substantiate the position, and that the excess of pauperism and population, reasoned from, is not the result of natural and permanently acting causes, but of mismanagement on the part of governments, or of the lack of education and general knowledge. It is our conscientious belief that the human race have never had anything like fair play; and we hold, that, if they were let alone, and suffered to pursue fair and licit means of gaining a subsistence, suggested by their own reasoning faculties or scientific inquiry, and permitted to follow out all rational means of cultivating their understandings, the increase of population would not be greater than the increase of food. The only mode of proving such a position is by pointing to the manner in which nations have originated and grown up—the unfortunate policy by which they have for thousands of years been maintained in a state of deadly enmity with each other, and of internal discord—as well as the deliberate plans pursued in order to keep the people in ignorance, both in respect of pure religion and morality, and of the elements of science and general knowledge. When we look abroad over the world, where do we find any nation advanced to a state of even comparative perfection? By far the greater number of countries are yet—that is, at the distance of six thousand years from the creation of the globe—inhabited by savages, men in a state of absolute nakedness, who live in huts or holes like the brutes which perish. Other countries are advanced a stage in mental and physical condition; others are still further advanced; and our own may be allowed to occupy the first rank in intelligence: yet, in this very country (except in a particular nook), there is no general system of education; and such is the state of things, that the most magnificent of all human inventions, the art of printing—an art calculated to supersede almost every other means of instruction—is not allowed to be exercised freely. On these deplorable facts we might rest our opposition to the wild and inconclusive theories of Dr Chalmers; but we have another species of proof to advance.

In the first place, it admits of demonstration that the people in this country, with all their misery, are on the whole much better fed, lodged, and clothed, than the people were five hundred years ago. Every chapter in our history describes a gradual improvement in the condition of the inhabitants. Such is the highly artificial state of society in the present day, that we find many persons exceedingly poor; but we have now no desolating famines, and few of those fatal epidemical diseases which used to follow in their train. Thus, it is so far certain that our country is in a much better condition than formerly; and this, at least, affords no proof of the approach of universal starvation. On the contrary, it is an evidence that we are in some measure approximating a state of greater excellence. Next, as to the plans which may be successfully pursued for bettering our general condition: In an early number of our Journal, we made our readers acquainted with the fact, that the pigeons of North America consumed more food in one day than would support the whole of the fifteen millions of human beings in Great Britain in a week. The question is, then, why the over-abundant population of this country have not long since proceeded across the Atlantic, to secure some of the meat of the pigeons, and so relieve, by a grand effort, the pressure of misery at home? It would be argued, however, by Dr Chalmers, that this extensive process of emigration, however useful in the meanwhile, would have no good effect ultimately; for were you to cover all the spare lands in the world with our pent-up population, still you will never relieve our race. Although we might enjoy ten thousand years of breathing time, at the ten thousandth and first year we would be in a similarly awkward predicament; and there's the rub. But all this is mere assertion, others will answer; how is it to be proved? Oh, that is quite a different affair. We suppose, because it is seen and felt that things are in a very bad condition with us; because the people increase, however poor they may be; because the Doctor has perceived that there are miserable purlieus in every large town, where the unhappy weeded-out peasantry of the country fester in indigence, frequently unheeded either by the clergy or the civil magistrate, and who, "for any thing he can tell," might, under more fortunate circumstances, have been creditable members of society—because, in a word, there is a great deal of imprudence and vice, matters must therefore terminate in the way mentioned. Now, we cordially allow that emigration would have ultimately no beneficial effect on the state of our population, provided the intellect of the human race were for ever to continue what it is. But it will not remain what it is, and, in its gradual improvement, will be found not only the check on over-population, but the cure after such has been accomplished.

Here, then, we are brought back to the true source of the evil under our notice. Society, as it is now seen to exist in this country, is not the result of natural causes, but is an extraordinary jumble of inconsistencies, produced in a way too well known to need any particular elucidation. We have had the most pernicious encouragement given to the growth of population by the demand for soldiers and sailors, to go out and fight the soldiers and sailors of other nations, all for no good whatever, but a great deal of evil. Then, there have been laws to prevent the operative classes from emigrating; laws to prevent the exportation of goods, and the importation of food; laws to prevent capitalists buying, and, therefore, improving lands; laws of every description and character to restrain the human being from making the most of his intellect and skill in honourable trade; all of which arrangements, and a thousand besides, originating in the barbarous usages of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, have brought our population to what it is—something which the Almighty never intended it to be, and which the laws of Nature cannot sustain. If we add to these causes the little pains taken to cultivate the understandings of the people, and make them more virtuous and provident, we at once see the reason for the poverty, misery, and vice, which afflict us. Hence the outcry of there being too many people in the world, and that the world will some day be in a state of general starvation, and that every thing will go to wreck and ruin; in short, that we may just go and hang ourselves, as fast as we can, to escape dying of hunger. Stuff! Had society not been at once, or by turns, pampered, tortured, and perplexed—had mankind not deliberately planned and accomplished their own miseries—had things been allowed to find their level, we should never have heard the smallest clamour about an over-abundant population.

It is our object in the present paper to put the people in good humour with the laws which govern the universe, and influence the affairs of mankind. We do not believe that the human race are naturally so bad as they are called, or are in such a hopeless case as some folk imagine. The few thousands of years they have sojourned on the surface of the earth are but as a day in comparison with the duration of Time. They have as yet gathered only a little experience. We consider them as only promising children in a young world. Only one or two nations amongst them are earnestly pursuing means of improvement, and the rest have yet to begin. If a far more enlarged process of education be all that is essentially requisite to stem the torrent of improvidence and vice, why need we despond of seeing accomplished—what Dr Chalmers deems necessary to check the evil he deplures—"a good and adequate educational system pervading the whole mass of the community, both with the culture of knowledge and the culture of principle." For our part, we really cannot discover any insurmountable difficulty in the way. The people of this country, under many disadvantages, have made wonderful advances in intelligence within the last twenty years; and it may be prognosticated, that, from the astonishing aptitude which now exists for the acquisition of knowledge, in whatever shape it is presented, that, in another half century, should no pernicious war intervene, the country will be under a far better and more wholesome system of management. Every succeeding year greater scope will be afforded for the exercise of the human intellect, and, by the operations of science, our island will be virtually doubled in extent. Proper systems of general instruction will be instituted. It is also within the bounds of possibility that every kind of injurious restraint on the art of printing will be relaxed and removed, and, with this engine of mental improvement alone, there is reason to expect that the great and ancient strongholds of ignorance and vice will very speedily be brought in triumph to the ground. We are not among those who believe that all this can only be a consequence of the dismemberment of society. All will come to pass in the simple ordinary course of events, without convulsion or disturbance of any kind. Enlightened men of all parties are busily conspiring in one great cause, the national welfare, in connection with domestic peace, and the permanent security of life, property, and opinion—the three undoubted essentials of happiness among an intelligent people.

PROCEEDINGS OF PARLIAMENT.

IN our last number we brought the reports of the Parliamentary business down to the 22d of February, inclusive, on which day both houses adjourned to the following Tuesday, February 26. Our readers will see that we have deviated somewhat from our former mode of reporting the proceedings, by classifying the subjects under separate heads, and stating consecutively whatever has been done in reference to these subjects during the month. In adopting this plan we may state, that we are following the example of the London Spectator, perhaps the most systematic newspaper now published.

1. IRISH DISTURBANCES BILL.—On Wednesday, February 27, Mr Roche, during the forenoon sitting of the house (from twelve to three), moved for additional information regarding the state of Ireland, previous to entertaining the bill for suppressing the disturbances in that country.—Mr T. Attwood, and other members, strenuously supported the motion; but it was ultimately withdrawn.—Lord Althorp, in moving the order of the day for the first reading of the bill, said, that he freely acknowledged its arbitrary and unconstitutional character, and that it was incumbent on Ministers to make out a case proving the absolute necessity for the additional executive powers demanded in it, and the total inefficiency of the existing laws for the purposes required. He then proceeded to detail, and to prove from authenticated documents, the frightful outrages daily occurring in various parts of Ireland. Crime was progressively on the increase, as would be seen by the following returns for the three last months of each of the last four years, viz.—

1 Murders	10	15	47	44
2 Robberies	69	154	152	173
3 Burglaries	39	94	251	532
4 Burnings	31	34	29	77
5 Houghing cattle	19	20	7	31
6 Serious injuries to person	45	54	89	285
7 Illegal notices	49	72	172	197
8 Injuries to property	44	29	77	134

That the existing laws were totally inefficient for the repression of these crimes, arose chiefly from the notorious fact, that neither jurors dared convict, nor witnesses give their testimony against, the criminals, who prosecuted their illegal and diabolical acts in the most open and public manner. Out of rewards offered for the discovery and identification of delinquents in 108 cases, only two were claimed. These facts of themselves justified the most invidious and objectionable clause of the bill, the suspending of trials by jury. His Lordship then proceeded to enumerate individually, and justify separately, by argument and statements of facts, the other arbitrary provisions of the bill. The only part of it which extended to the whole of Ireland was the renewal of the act for the prevention of illegal and intimidatory meetings. He solemnly denied the truth of the allegation that this bill was intended merely to force the collection of tithes. It was an act of necessity, open and undeniable; not of underhand motives, and far less of inclination.—Mr Tennyson did not think a case had been made out to justify the enactment of such a measure. He advised delay, until the effect of the remedial bill (of church reform) was seen; and moved, as an amendment, “that this bill be read this day fortnight.”—Mr E. L. Bulwer, Mr Grote, and Mr Fife, supported the amendment.—Sir John Byng, from intimate knowledge of and long residence in Ireland, felt solemnly convinced of the absolute necessity for the present strong measures.—Captain Berkeley followed on the same side.—Mr Stanley, in a long and powerful speech, demonstrated the unfortunate necessity under which Ministers lay for seeking additional powers to quell the disturbances in Ireland. He attributed those disturbances, in a great measure, to the efforts of political agitators, and exposed, in a happy strain of irony, Mr O'Connell's apparently pacificatory addresses to the Irish people, his advising them not to make a run upon the bank for gold, &c. He was convinced that these agitators had much higher aims than those which they pretended to seek, and that it was their design to bring equally the Crown and the legislature into contempt with the people. The honourable gentleman here alluded to a speech made by Mr O'Connell at a meeting of the labouring classes of London on the previous Saturday (February 23), in which he (Mr O'Connell) had designated the House of Commons as “six hundred scoundrels.”—(The mention of this circumstance excited a great sensation in the house.)—In concluding, Mr Stanley called upon the house, as they valued the name of true liberty, as they valued the exercise of constitutional rights and privileges, as they wished to see protection afforded to property and life itself, to sanction a temporary infringement of the constitution, rather than allow all law, all security of life and property, to be involved in one wide gulf of anarchy and ruin.—The honourable gentleman's speech produced a great effect in the house, and he sat down amidst loud and protracted cheering.—Mr O'Connell, after being vehemently and repeatedly called upon “to explain,” at last rose, and, in evident confusion, attempted to account for the language attributed to him at the above meeting, by alleging that the reporters had misunderstood him; but this explanation was received with groans and disapprobation; and upon his retiring at the adjournment of the debate, which immediately followed, he was saluted, as several reports concur in stating, with loud and general hooting and hissing—a mode of testifying their displeasure, which the members of the present, or any previous house, had never before adopted.—The debate was renewed on Thursday (Feb. 28) by Mr Shiel, who denounced the bill as exceeding, in atrocious severity, any measure which had ever been proposed by the Tories. It was, he said, only fit for the meridian of Barbary. He denied the statements of Lord Althorp and Mr Stanley, and contended that the present laws were perfectly sufficient to repress all the trivial disturbances in Ireland. The bill before the house was calculated to extinguish every vestige of liberty.—Mr Macaulay replied, in atrocious severity, that the idea of taking away liberty, where it did not exist, reminded him of the story of the American in England, who, hearing the liberty of the country eulogised, exclaimed, “pretty liberty! where a man cannot thrash his own nigger as he likes.” He admitted the unconstitutional nature of the bill, but the urgency of the case required it.—A Mr Fergus O'Connor expressed his indignation at the bill in a long speech, which was received with shouts of laughter from beginning to end, from the plenitude of Iricisms with which it was interspersed. He said, Mr Stanley was the most unpopular man in all Ireland, and the Marquis of Anlsea was also the most unpopular man in all Ireland—that is to say, they were each of them the most unpopular man. They, the Irish, would fight England foot to foot, and shoulder to shoulder.—Mr Clay, Mr Romilly, and Major Beauchamp, strongly objected to the bill, which was supported by Lord Mahon, Mr Carew, and Mr Lennard.—Lord Ebrington was thoroughly convinced of the necessity for this measure, but would recommend, in the committee, that the officers forming the courts-martial be of higher rank than the present bill obliged them to be, and of maturer age.—It will be seen that these suggestions of the noble Lord were subsequently adopted. The house adjourned at twelve o'clock.—On Friday, the principal speakers in opposition to the bill were, Mr H. Bulwer, Mr D. W. Harvey, Mr Grattan, and Mr Lloyd. In its favour, Sir George Grey, Lord John Russell, and Sir Robert Peel. As in the debate on the address, the speech of the latter right hon. Baronet, on this occasion, was distinguished by a fervour of eloquence, and a power of reasoning and illustration, such as has seldom been exhibited within the walls of Parliament, and we regret that our limits will not permit of our giving even an abridged outline of this splendid oration, which seems to have excited as general admiration throughout the country, as it was listened to with breathless and intense interest by the members of the house, which rang with cheers from every part for many minutes after he had concluded. He supported the Ministerial bill, he said, from no confidence or respect to Ministers themselves, whom he blamed for much of the evil that existed. But whatever might be the cause, the condition of Ireland was such as, in his opinion, to render some such strong measure as the present absolutely necessary. The remorseless atrocities, daily and nightly committed, were undeniable, and he introduced, by way of episode, an account of a barbarous murder committed near Kildare, in the county of Limerick, of a poor farmer and his wife, of the name of Dillon, the circumstances attending which, together with the solemn and almost whispering under-tone in which the narrative was told, is said to have produced a pause of breathless and shuddering horror in the house, altogether indescribable. The unfortunate man was dragged from his bed at midnight, and dispatched with pitchforks, before the eyes of his wife. The latter, whilst their bloody work was going on, took her little daughter (a child of nine years of age), and placed her in a hidden recess, telling her that she knew well her own (the mother's) death would follow next, but enjoined her to watch the countenances of the men by the light of a turf which she kindled, and placed on the hearth for that purpose, in order that she (the child) might be able to identify the murderers of her parents afterwards. The poor woman was then seized by the assassins, and, after a dreadful struggle, murdered before the eyes of her child. The latter, who had faithfully obeyed her mother's last injunctions, luckily escaped unhurt, and, within a month afterwards, six of the murderers were executed upon her testimony, combined with other evidence. The hon. Baronet concluded, calling upon the government, in justice to all the peaceful, loyal, and honest of the Irish people, to act with due energy in repressing a state of society, which there was no punishment except for the innocent, no security but for triumphant crime.—Monday (March 4), the debate was again resumed by Dr Baldwin, in a long speech condemnatory of the bill, and was followed on the same side by Mr B. von, Mr Chapman, Mr Fitzgerald, Mr Buckingham, Mr O'Dwyer, &c. The members who spoke on the other side were Lord Castlereagh, Sir R. Bateson, Lord Lambert, Mr Tennant, Lord Duncannon, and Lord Ward.—Lord Castlereagh said, it was with shame and sorrow he felt bound to support the bill, the necessity for which the Ministry themselves had occasioned. It was one of the results of the means then adopted for carrying the reform bill—that bill which was to produce peace, prosperity, and happiness throughout Ireland.—Mr Lefroy opened the adjourned debate on Tuesday (5th), and argued at great length for the passing of the bill.—Mr Russell declared his determined hostility to it, and was repeatedly called to order by the Speaker, and various members, for quoting irrelevant facts. Lord Althorp, he believed, meant well, but he had lately got into such company, that his good intentions were defeated.—After one or two other members had spoken, Mr O'Connell was loudly called on, and proceeded to address the house with much solemnity and deliberation. The constitution, he said, was at an end; there was no longer trial by jury. He then analysed separately, and at great length, the different clauses of the bill, and denied all the statements that had been made to prove their necessity—he denied that witnesses were intimidated—he denied that juries were injured—he denied that agitation had any thing to do with the disturbances; and yet this bill of pains and penalties was directed against him (O'Connell). Why did they not banish him for a year and a half? they could not govern Ireland otherwise than by such measures, they ought to abdicate. The Irish people expected from a Reformed Parliament—the genuine representatives of the people—a redress of grievances; but they had given them one for their perpetuation and increase.—The honourable gentleman sat down amid loud cheers.—Mr Cobbett then insisted on an adjournment, but was compelled to yield to the sense of the house, that the debate be now brought to a close; and Lord Althorp rose to reply to the opponent of the bill. The measure, he said, had been argued against as if its framers had intended it to be perpetual, and to prove a remedy for all the evils of Ireland. It was meant merely for a time, and to remove one evil—the insecurity of life and property. There was an absolute necessity for the present measure existing, he conceived had been fully made out; and he would, therefore, leave it, without further argument, in the hands of the house.—A division then took place, when there appeared, for the first reading of the bill, 48 against it, 89. Majority for the bill, 377.—It was ordered to be read a second time on the following Friday. Three members for Scotland voted in the above minority, viz. Mr Gillon, Mr Kinloch, and Mr Wallace.—Friday, March 8, on its being moved by Lord Althorp that the order of the day for the second reading of the bill be read, Mr Hume addressed the house at great length in opposition to the measure. He tributed the whole disturbances that prevailed in Ireland to the keeping up of the established church. What would Scotland have done had England persevered in attempting to force upon her the Episcopal establishment? When he looked for the evidence on which this measure rested, he found none. It ought to be called, “a bill to put down Daniel O'Connell and keep up the military and church establishments in Ireland.” He concluded by moving, “that, while the house deeply lamented the existence of disturbances in some districts of Ireland, they were of opinion that it had not been satisfactorily shown that the existing laws were insufficient for the purpose of putting an end to them, and that, therefore, the house could not consent to a bill which placed Ireland out of the power of the British constitution.”—A long and desultory discussion ensued, in which upwards of twenty members spoke for and against the bill, travelling over almost the very same ground as that of their predecessors.—The amendment was ultimately withdrawn pro tempore, and the debate adjourned to Monday (March 11).—On that day, Mr C. Buller re-moved the amendment proposed on Friday by Mr Hume, which was seconded by Mr Hawkins.—Lord Morpeth and Mr C. Grant both spoke in favour of the bill, resting entirely upon its indispensable necessity.—The opening speech of the evening in which there was any novelty was that of an Irish member, a Mr Blackenev, whose grammatical blunders and ludicrous figures of speech the house was kept in a roar. He said, “O bless him Heaven! there was no outrages to call for.” The Whitefeet who committed the outrages in Carlow did not belong to the county. There were five bridges over the river that bounded the county.

d that river carried the Whitefeet over the bridges (great laughter.) The only outrage he recollected of that of a woman, Ann Magee, who charged six respectable farmers with putting out the eyes of some mad horses" (roars of laughter.) He concluded by declaring, that "he could say no more, although he were to talk till to-morrow night;" and added, he felt "highly complimented by the attentive manner with which the house had listened to him."—The vote having divided, there appeared, for the second reading, 363; against it, 84. Majority for Ministers, 9.—The bill, after being read, was ordered to be committed on Wednesday. On the foregoing division four Scotch members voted in the minority, viz. Mr Gillon, Mr R. A. Oswald, Mr J. Oswald, and Mr R. Wallace. —On Wednesday (March 13), Lord Althorp, on moving that the house resolve itself into a committee on the bill, stated that Ministers had agreed to make no important alterations in it, viz. that no officer under the rank of captain should sit on a court-martial; that when the number of officers on a court-martial did not exceed five, the verdict must be unanimous; when the number should not exceed seven, at least five must concur in the decision; and where it exceeded seven, seven members must agree before punishment could be inflicted. The second alteration related to domiciliary visits, regarding which Ministers were ready to provide, that if, when the names of the residents were called over, they answered, and showed themselves, the visiting party should not have the power to enter the house.—Mr O'Connell then rose, and proposed an amendment, to the effect permitting the people to assemble to propose resolutions, petitions, &c. After a tedious and irregular discussion, the amendment was negatived by a large majority, as was also a subsequent one by the same individual, "That the Lord Lieutenant's order to prohibit or suppress any meeting, should also have the sanction of two or more judges of the Court of King's Bench in Ireland."—Mr Stanley afterwards proposed an amendment, which was adopted without debate, "To take out of the hands of the courts-martial a trial of all political offences;" in fact, to leave them to be disposed of by the ordinary tribunals.—The committee again sat on Friday (15th), when the three first clauses of the bill were agreed to, after the moving, discussing, and negativing of several amendments, proposed by Mr O'Connell, and other opponents of the bill.—On Monday (18th), other five clauses were agreed to without any important discussion, but after various amendments being proposed by the opponents of the bill, particularly in reference to the court-martial clause, one of these amendments, insisted on by Mr Lambert, viz. that it shall not be lawful for the Lord-Lieutenant, governor or governors, to apply the powers of this act to any county or district, merely because tithes are not paid in such county or district, was at last conceded by Ministers to save the time of the house.—Sir Robert Peel, the Solicitor-General, and others, said this amendment was an utter absurdity; and Mr O'Connell remarked (after having voted for it), that "it was as nonsensical as any he had ever supported." Various other amendments were negatived.—On Tuesday, on the ninth (the court-martial) clause being read, Mr Stanley recapitulated the alterations which Lord Althorp had formerly (on 13th) stated Ministers were prepared to make in it. He also stated, that the fifteenth clause, which empowers courts-martial to issue orders for the apprehension of offenders to be tried before them, should be so modified as to throw that duty upon the Lord-Lieutenant. With regard to the description of offences which were to come under the cognizance of the courts-martial, it was intended, by an amendment to the seventeenth clause, to exclude all those, even though of an insurrectionary character, which were not attended with actual violence. He would also exclude from the jurisdiction of courts-martial all offences of a libellous description, such as publishing, lawking, or selling seditious placards or pamphlets.—Mr Cullar Fergusson, in a long speech, opposed the clause altogether, as a most violent inroad on the constitution.—After many others had spoken for and against, Mr Abercromby, member for Edinburgh, said, that although he had hitherto given a reluctant consent to the bill, he would oppose this clause by all the means in his power, and stated his reasons for so doing in a speech of considerable length, which is said to have made a great impression on the house.—Upon a division, there appeared for the clause 270, against it 130; majority for Ministers 140.—It would be a mere waste of our space to follow all the different speakers on the other parts of the bill, the whole clauses of which (forty-one in number, with other three proposed by Mr Stanley and agreed to) were, after various alterations and amendments, got through on Friday (22d); the report was then ordered to be taken into consideration on Tuesday the 26th.

2. IRISH VENUE BILL.—Tuesday, February 26, on the motion of Earl Grey, this bill went through a pro forma submission to a committee, and was reported to be house, without any discussion or alteration. Next day the report was brought up, and on Thursday (27th), it was read a third time and passed.

3. ROAD ACTS.—Mr Portman obtained leave, on Tuesday, February 26, to bring in a bill for the consolidation of all the existing acts regarding highways.

4. POOR LAWS IN IRELAND.—On the same day, Mr Stanley, in answer to a query on this subject, stated that government had no intention at present of proposing any system of poor laws for Ireland.

5. SCOTCH BURGH REFORM.—On the same day, Mr J. A. Murray presented a petition from the merchants in Leith, praying for a thorough burgh reform throughout Scotland, and complaining of many local grievances, particularly their being obliged to contribute to the support of the clergy of Edinburgh.—Ordered to lie on the table.—Numerous other petitions have been presented from different places in Scotland on the same subject during the past month.—On Tuesday, March 12, the Lord Advocate submitted the following motion on the subject to the house:—He proposed that the bill he had prepared on the subject be read a first and second time, pro forma, and after the second reading he would move that it be referred to a select committee. He would propose that this committee should embrace all the members for the Scotch burghs, about twenty-three. By so doing, the house would not come to a discussion of the measure till it was well acquainted with it. He would now only move for leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the laws with respect to electing the magistrates and town councils of royal burghs in Scotland. His Lordship at the same time stated, that government had a measure in preparation regarding those burghs which were not royal burghs.—Leave being given, after some discussion, to bring in the proposed bill, it was introduced, and read a first time next day (Wednesday), and a second time on the succeeding Friday, when it was referred to the following select committee:—Right Hon. F. Jeffrey, A. Bannerman, J. N. Fazakerly, T. F. Kennedy, A. Johnstone, G. Kinloch, General Sharpe, Sir R. Heron, R. Fergusson, Right Hon. J. Abercromby, Sir F. Johnstone, Major L. Hay, J. Ewing, J. Oswald, J. Morrison, R. Wallace, R. Steuart, H. Ross, J. A. Warre, J. Baillie, J. Loch, J. A. Murray, W. D. Gillon, Sir J. Maxwell, L. Oliphant, J. Dunlop, Lord Dalmeny, E. Stewart, Sir R. H. Inglis, Sir R. Vyvyan, Lord G. Somerset, Lord Villiers, and Joseph Pease.—The proposed municipal bill has since been printed and published. The following are the principal heads of it:—The right of electing the town councils to be in the persons who are qualified to vote for members of Parliament under the reform bill, and in all the freemen of any trade, craft, or guildry within seven miles of the burgh, honorary freemen, and persons receiving parochial relief, excepted.—Persons qualified, but living beyond the limits of the burgh, to give in claims to the town clerk, and their names are to be affixed to the church doors and advertised.—The chief magistrate to decide on such claims, with the aid of an advocate or writer of three years, or a solicitor of inferior courts of five years, standing, as assessor.—A list or roll of electors to be kept by the town clerk.—A person dissatisfied with the chief magistrate's decision on his claim, may appeal to the sheriff.—The following burghs forming schedule A (the eight largest), Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dundee, Perth, Dunfermline, Dumfries, Arbroath, Inverness, to be divided into wards, under the direction of commissioners appointed by his Majesty. From the wording of the clause, it appears to be intended that each ward shall have nearly the same number of electors, and that the number of wards shall be arranged so that each may elect so many councillors (three perhaps) at first, and every subsequent year one. If Edinburgh, for instance, were divided into eleven civic wards, each might choose three councillors at first, and one annually afterwards, so that one-third of the council would be renewed every year.—The number of councillors in each burgh to be the same as by the existing set.—The elections to be by open poll, which is not to be continued more than two days.—In the smaller burghs, all the qualified electors are to meet in one place, and each is to give in a list of persons for councillors; and those who have the greatest number of votes are to be councillors.—One-third of the council to be renewed every year. The first third who go out of office in October 1834, to consist of those who had the smallest number of votes; the second third to be selected on the same principle, and go out in 1835; but any councillor going out may be immediately re-elected.—The councillors so elected are to assemble in the Town Hall, and choose from among themselves a provost, or chief magistrate, the number of bailies fixed by the set, a treasurer, dean of guild, and other office-bearers now existing; also managers of any charitable or public institution, to which the present council appoints; but the title and office of deacon, of convener, old provost, and old bailie, are to cease, and no distinction to be recognised between merchant and trades' councillors.—If any office-bearer other than the provost or treasurer is in the third of the council going out of office, his place is to be supplied by a new election, after the new third has entered the council; but the provost and treasurer shall always remain in office three years, and may be at all times re-elected.—Vacancies in the council and magistracy to be filled up ad interim by the council, but the person so chosen only holds his office till the annual day of election in October. In the burghs, divided into wards, the election of a councillor is to be made by the ward.—A small fee to be paid by electors in burghs at enrolment, to provide for the expense of books, lists, &c.—The persons presiding at ward elections, as the provost's substitutes, to be paid a sum not exceeding L. 3, 3s. per day, which sum is to be levied by an equal assessment on the councillors. The assessors who assist the provost in disposing of claims, to be paid a similar sum from the common good of the burgh.—The magistrates and council thus chosen to have all the powers and jurisdictions vested in those presently existing.—On Friday (22d), these two bills were read a second time without any discussion.

6. NEWSPAPER LIBELS.—On Wednesday, Feb. 27, Lord Teynham moved that the editor and printer of the Standard be summoned to the bar of the House of Lords, for calling himself, Lord King, and other noble lords, "scoundrels," and the "devil's advocates," (Great laughter.)—Lord Brougham said it would be absurd in the house to take notice of "such trumpety nonsense," and the motion was withdrawn.

7. DISABILITIES OF THE JEWS.—Upon the presentation of a petition on Friday, March 1, for the removal of the civil disabilities of the Jews, Mr Cobbett said, if such a petition was received, there would be an end altogether to Christianity. What would become of the Christian religion, if a blaspheming Jew, who annually crucified Christ, were to be elected, and sit as a judge in a case of blasphemy.—Mr Cobbett's present lively alarm for the interests of Christianity has since called forth some curious comments in the public journals, in allusion to his former veneration for the ashes of Tom Paine; and also a letter from the chief Rabbi of the Hebrew synagogue, denying the crucifixion of Christ at the annual feast of the Israelites.

8. THE POLES.—On the same day, upon a petition being presented from Hull, praying that representations be made by government to the continental powers in favour of the Poles, Mr Cullar Fergusson made a powerful appeal in favour of that unfortunate people. He stated that the Emperor of Russia had consigned 500,000 of them to transportation. Whole families were carried off silently, and without any warning or trial, into Siberia. If England had spoken, Poland would have been saved.—Mr Cobbett said the gentleman need not travel all the way to Tartary for precedents of expatriation, as the Countess of Sutherland, and several Irish noblemen and gentlemen, had tried the same experiment on a pretty large scale.—Mr M'Leod, member for the county of Sutherland, said there was never a more infamous calumny uttered than what had just fallen from Mr Cobbett regarding the Countess of Sutherland.

9. CHURCH PATRONAGE IN SCOTLAND.—On Monday, March 4, the Earl of Rosebery presented a petition from Urquhart, in the county of Ross, in Scotland, praying that the patronage of the churches in Scotland be transferred to the parishioners. The noble Earl recommended the petition to the serious notice of the house. The prayer of it was one which had a strong hold on the minds of the people of Scotland; although, for his own part, he had strong doubts of the benefits anticipated from the change.—A great number of petitions to the same effect from other places in Scotland have been presented during the past month.

10. ENGLISH CHURCH REFORM.—On the same day, Lord Althorp, in answer to a query from Mr Sandford, stated that the subject of an extensive reform in the church, including non-residence and pluralities, was under the consideration of government, and he hoped to be able to introduce the measure during the present session of Parliament.

11. BRIBERY AT LIVERPOOL.—On Wednesday (March 6), Mr Bennett brought forward a motion relative to the corruption of the freemen of Liverpool at the last election, and moved for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the charge; which was agreed to, Lord Althorp saying, he had no objection to extend the inquiry back to the three last elections.

12. SUGAR DUTIES.—On the same day, the house being resolved into a committee of supply, Lord Althorp moved the renewal of the sugar duties for another year. He said, the state of the revenue was such as would not permit a large reduction of these duties this year, and a trifling one would be of no benefit.—Mr Hume remonstrated against keeping up the duty on East India sugar ten per cent. more than that laid upon sugar from the West Indies, and proposed their equalization.—Mr Goulburn congratulated the country on the bright prospect held out to it by the first financial measure brought before it by Ministers. In the time of former Parliaments, it was usual for the objects to which the taxes were to be applied to be stated before the taxes were voted; but it was reserved for a Reformed Parliament to see the taxes voted first, and their objects—whether for the army, navy, or other service—left to be determined afterwards.—Several other members strongly opposed the motion; but it was ultimately carried, as well as several other financial resolutions.

13. NEW HOUSE OF COMMONS.—On Thursday (March 7), Mr Hume brought forward a motion relative to the erection of a new House of Commons, and went into lengthy details of the estimated cost. The present house was totally unfit for the accommodation of members in a full house, and was also badly aired, notwithstanding the endeavours of some of the ablest men in England to ventilate it.—(Laughter.)—The plan he hoped to see carried into effect was to build a new house between the present one and the river, and the old house might remain in its present state as a lobby for divisions. About L. 20,000 would effect this, which he considered a mere bagatelle.—(Hear, hear, hear.)—He was not quite prepared to move the House of Lords yet.—(Loud cries of, Hear, and laughter.)—He would conclude by moving, that the report of the select committee of the last session should be referred to a select committee.—Lord Althorp said, he had no objection to the appointment of the committee, but that he would not be easily convinced of the necessity for altering the situation of the house.

14. DISTRIBUTION OF THE FORCES.—On the same day, Mr Hume moved for returns of the distribution of the regular military force in 1833, in England, Scotland, Ireland, and the colonies, distinguishing the old from the new colonies. The estimates of the year, he said, were for 90,000 troops.—Lord Althorp said it would be extremely inconvenient if it were the habit and practice of the house to call for this information; for if that were the case, it might be very difficult for the government to resist giving it when it might be dangerous to do so. In addition to the objection of making it the permanent practice of the house, he stated, on his responsibility as a Minister, that there were circumstances which rendered it inconvenient to the public service to state the direct distribution of our force; and therefore he was bound to object to the motion of the hon. member.—Colonel Davies wished to know why the information could not be given.—Sir J. Hobhouse said, with colonies spread all over the globe, would it not be the grossest impudence to tell what number of regiments were placed in the different parts?—After considerable discussion, the motion was negatived by a large majority.

15. IRISH GRAND JURY BILL.—Upon the motion of Mr Stanley, on Friday (March 8), this bill was read a second time, and a committee was appointed to discuss it up stairs.

16. IRISH CHURCH REFORM BILL.—On Monday the 11th, Lord Althorp brought up his bill for amending the temporalities of Ireland; and it was read a first time. Upon his proposing that it be read a second time on the following Wednesday, a warm discussion took place, Sir R. Inglis, Sir Robert Peel, Mr A. Johnstone, and others, insisting on delay, as the bill was not yet printed.—Lord Althorp would not consent to its being postponed beyond Thursday; for which day, after a division, it was accordingly fixed.—On its being then (Thursday) moved for the second reading, Mr C. W. Wynn contended that the introduction of the measure was contrary to the standing orders of the house; and that, being a money bill, it ought to have originated in a committee, and been founded on resolutions. On this point reference was made to Hatsell's Precedents, which clearly pointed out the course specified by the learned gentleman.—Mr Stanley, Lord Althorp, Dr Lushington, and Lord John Russell, contended against the necessity for postponing the bill.—Mr O'Connell said, that, however much he might regret the delay, there was no doubt of the informality of the present proceeding.—The Speaker, being called on for his opinion, said, the question at issue was whether this bill imposed a new tax. If it did, then the introduction of it in the present mode was decidedly informal.—After a long and desultory discussion, a committee was at length appointed to consider and report before further procedure.—On Tuesday (19), the committee's report was brought up, stating that the bill was a tax bill, and ought to have been introduced in a committee of the whole house. The order of the day for the second reading was accordingly discharged; and Lord Althorp gave notice, that, on Monday next (25), he would move that the whole house resolve itself into a committee on the temporalities of the Irish church.

17. NATIONAL EDUCATION.—On Thursday (March 14), Lord Brougham moved for copies of certain returns furnished to the House of Commons, relative to the education of the people. From inquiries made, on his own responsibility, from the parochial clergy, to whom he had sent between five and six hundred circulars, he found that there were, in 1818, 1300 unendowed schools in 500 parishes, educating 59,000 children; that, in 1820, the number instructed was 105,000; in 1828, it had increased to 1,030,000, the number of schools being 32,000. There were, however, still 1500 parishes in England in which there were no schools. He believed it would appear from inquiry, that the people of large towns, in the north more especially, were lamentably ignorant. To this state of things a remedy should be applied as quickly as possible.—Lord Ellenborough said, he could not but feel surprised at the latter statement of the noble Lord, as it was only a few months ago since Ministers had made a serious and perilous change in the constitution, mainly on account of the boasted intelligence of these towns.—The motion was agreed to.

18. DRAMATIC AUTHORS AND PERFORMANCES.—On Tuesday (March 12), Mr E. L. Bulwer moved for leave to bring in a bill for the better protection of dramatic authors. At present, a dramatic author was the only person in the country who had no control over his own property; he might write a play, not wishing it to be acted—it might be dragged on the stage; he would incur the penalty of literary damnation if it failed, and no recompence if it succeeded. It might make the fortunes of a hundred managers, and not bring a farthing to himself. The bill would place the dramatic author on the same level with the writer of any other description; if his play were acted without his consent, he might apply to a court of law for liquidated damages—the maximum L.50, the minimum L.10 each night the play was performed, not exceeding L.50 altogether. The consequence of this would be, that managers would apply to an author, and he would obtain fair, and only a fair, remuneration for his labour. To the public the advantage would be twofold—first, that dramatic authors receiving the same protection as other writers, a higher degree of talent would be attracted to the stage; and secondly, as they would derive some emolument every time their plays were performed, there would be greater encouragement to produce standard dramas, than (as at present) evanescent translations.—Mr G. Lamb seconded the motion, which was agreed to.—Mr Bulwer afterwards obtained leave to bring in a second bill, for the better regulation of the laws operating on dramatic performances. Three objects were to be effected by the bill—first, to give the public the advantage of competition—secondly, to devise some reasonable safeguard against a theatrical speculator choosing an improper situation for the erection of a theatre—thirdly, to prevent all favouritism and caprice in the licensing authority.

19. ALTERATIONS IN SCOTCH COURTS.—On Friday (March 15), Mr Kennedy obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorise the Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury to make provision for the execution of the duties performed by the Barons of Exchequer in Scotland, in relation to the public revenue; and to place the management of assessed taxes and land tax in Scotland under the Commissioners for the Affairs of Taxes; also a bill to provide for the holding of Circuit Sheriff Courts in Scotland, for the trial of small debt causes.—Read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Friday next (the 22d).—The latter bill provides, that the sheriffs of all the counties in Scotland, except Dute, Clackmannan, Kinross, Orkney and Shetland, and Peebles, shall, three times in the year, hold circuit courts in different places of their counties, to be named in the act; and the sum which the sheriffs are empowered to hear causes for is increased to ten pounds. The sheriff-clerk is to appoint deputies at each of the places when courts are to be held, whose appointments, and the time of holding the courts, are to be intimated on the church doors for three weeks previous to the time fixed on. The sheriff-clerk is to lodge annually in Exchequer a sworn account of the fees derived from all the small debt courts, one-fourth of which he is annually to pay into the Exchequer; but he is to be allowed the actual outlay at the circuit courts for himself and his deputies, besides an allowance of three pounds for each of these courts. The Secretary of State is to have the power of increasing or diminishing the number of counties and places at which courts are to be held.

20. SIR JOHN SOANE'S MUSEUM.—On the same day, Mr Hume moved the second reading of the bill for settling Sir John Soane's library and collections in trustees, for the benefit of the public. They had been the labour of thirty years, collected at a great expense, and were arranged in the most complete order. He (Sir J.) wished trustees to be appointed in whom the property was to be invested; and, besides that, he had determined to invest the large sum of L.30,000 3 per cents, with an additional L.200 a-year, for the rent of a house to contain the collection. To show the exertions which that gentleman had made, he would mention one instance. He alone had prevented Belzoni's sarcophagus from leaving this country, when neither the government nor any individual was found to take it up, and had paid L.2000 to preserve it. (Hear, hear.) For one single manuscript he had given no less than L.500. In short, the list now making out would satisfy every hon. member that the gift would be of incalculable advantage to the public.—The bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed.

21. REVISING BARRISTERS' EXPENSES.—On the same day, a sum of L.30,500 was voted in a committee of supply, to pay the allowances and expenses to the revising barristers under the reform bill.

OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH.—An immense number of petitions have been presented to both houses during the past month, from all parts of England, Scotland, and Ireland, praying the enactment of measures to enforce a more strict observance of the Sabbath. These petitions all concur in stating, that of late years, and more particularly in the English towns, a disregard to the sanctity of the Sabbath has fearfully increased. It is attributed chiefly to the system of trading, cooking in bakers' shops, &c., permitted to be carried on.—The Lord Chancellor, on presenting twenty-four of these petitions, on Monday, March 11, said he denied that the Sunday was now worse kept than formerly; and that, on the contrary, the religious habits of the people were greatly improved. The subject was one upon which it was exceedingly difficult to legislate.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.—Petitions have continued to pour into the legislature, praying for the abolition of slavery.—On Monday (March 4), the Marquis of Chandos complained that the whole country, as well as the West India proprietors, were kept entirely in the dark on the subject, and demanded of Lord Althorp, what were the intention of Ministers regarding the emancipation of the slaves.—Lord Althorp replied, that government had measure under contemplation; but further than this he was not at liberty to explain.—On Tuesday (March 19), Mr Buxton having given notice of motion for this day relative to the same subject, Lord Althorp begged that the motion might be postponed until the government measure were divulged.—Mr Buxton said he would do so on two conditions: First, That the government measure would enforce the entire and immediate abolition of slavery; and, secondly, That the day be named on which it would be brought forward.—Lord Althorp replied, that with the first of these conditions it was impossible to comply; as the second, he had no objection to name the 23d of April.—With this Mr Buxton declared himself satisfied, and the motion was withdrawn.

IRISH EDUCATION.—On Tuesday (March 19), Earl Roden presented several petitions from Ireland against the new system of education lately introduced by Ministers there, the prayers of which he supported a great length. It seemed, he said, as if Ministers were labouring to propagate the Catholic religion by every means in their power. He knew of forty-nine schools to which Parliamentary grants had been made, in which there was not a single Protestant scholar. It was, besides, most extraordinary, that most of the teachers under the new system were receiving double and many of them triple, the salaries allowed to their former instructors. Of the twenty-two Prelates of the Irish church, seventeen had declared against the government plan; so had the Synod of Ulster; and in Scotland, public feeling had been highly excited against it.—The Archbishop of Dublin entered into a long defence of the government plan, and said a fair and honest trial of it was all that was asked. He would lay down his life, he said, for that most important object—the moral regeneration of Ireland.—After long speeches from the Bishops of Exeter and Bristol and the Earl of Wicklow, against the new system, and Lord Plunkett, and Marquis of Lansdowne, in its favour, the petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

ANNANDALE PEERAGE.—On Thursday (March 21), Lord Suffield presented a petition from Mr Hop Johnstone, M.P., praying their Lordships to fix a day early for the consideration of his claims to the Annandale Peerage.

EDINBURGH CATTLE-MARKET.—On Thursday (March 21), the Lord Advocate obtained leave to bring in a bill for establishing a new cattle-market in the vicinity of Edinburgh.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.—On the same day, Mr T. Attwood moved for the appointment of a "select committee to investigate into the causes of the present public distress, and to devise measures for its relief. Mr Attwood went at great length into the subject, and adduced proofs of the present privations of the labouring classes, which he attributed to the currency measures of 1819. He strongly blamed government for overlooking this point. They promised Ireland church reform, and the removal of church cess, but they would do nothing towards relieving her distresses. He recommended the cultivation of waste bogs on lands, and the introduction of poor laws.—Mr Gilon seconded the motion at considerable length, concluding by observing, that if the motion were rejected he would not answer for the safety of the state.—Lord Althorp opposed the motion, as unnecessary and vexatious, and likely to lead to no practical good end. He denied that the labouring classes were now worse off than heretofore.—A long and animated discussion took place, in which Mr Cobbett, Mr O'Connell, Mr Fielder, Mr M. Attwood, and others, supported the motion, and Mr Baring, Sir J. Wrottesley, Mr Clay, Mr W. Burton, and others, opposed it. Upon a division, then, appeared for the motion, 153; against it, 192; majority for Ministers, 39.—The result of the division was hailed by the most tremendous cheering, as being equivalent to a moral defeat, at least, of the Ministry. Judging from the results of former investigations into so boundless a topic, it is very doubtful if any beneficial end would have been attained by renewing them at the present time; but it would appear that the opposition of Ministers to a proposition so apparently reasonable, is generally viewed as manifesting a callous indifference, and want of sympathy with the great and urgent distresses of the people.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—On Friday (March 22), previous to the house going into committee on the Irish Disturbances Bill, Mr Cobbett gave notice that on the 28th April he should move a resolution for an address to his Majesty, praying his Majesty to remove Sir Robert Peel, Bart. from his Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, on account of that right hon. Baronet's proceedings with respect to the Currency Act in 1819 and 1826.—(This notice was received with shouts of laughter.)

PUNISHMENT OF DEATH.—Lord Suffield, on Monday (18), presented a petition from the bankers, merchants, shipowners, &c. of Liverpool, praying for the abolition of the punishment of death for crimes against property. The severity of the law, they maintained, created an insecurity to property, as great recompence was felt to prosecute capitally for offences of this nature, and consequently the offender very often escaped all punishment.

Foreign News.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

are yet unable to report any satisfactory termination to the misunderstandings between the Federal government and her Southern States, although irritation of both parties has in a great measure been allayed, probably from a sense of common danger in the event of a hostile rupture. We stated in our last, that the government had given notice of a modification of duties on imported articles, with the view of propitiating the insurgent Carolinians. This measure was introduced into Congress on February 1st, by Mr. Clay, and appears to have given general satisfaction to all but the nullifying members, who about their opposition to it in a fashion which has not been so effectually prevented its being carried into effect during the current session, viz. by fairly bringing it out. A Mr. Bibb had, accordingly, commenced operations by the delivery of a speech which occupied three days! Those of two speakers who followed on the same side lasted exactly a week; as none of the others seemed satisfied with less than a day, and the session was to rise on the 4th of March, it was reckoned next to an impossibility, at the date of the last dispatches, that the measure would get through. A coercion bill, for vesting the government with extraordinary powers for the more effectual suppression of the insurgents, had also been introduced, but this too, of course, was at a standstill. In the meantime, the malcontents in South Carolina show not the slightest disposition to come to compromise. It is said they have even rejected the offered mediation of Virginia, declaring that they get nothing from their friends but arms and men to oppose government in the event of hostile coercion. The Virginians have passed resolutions condemning the proclamation of General Jackson's proclamations. That the latter, however, enjoys the confidence and support of the states in general, is placed beyond doubt by the result of the election to the Presidency, which has been round at this momentous crisis of the republic, when he was again chosen by a large majority. The following was the result of the ballot as declared to at the joint meeting of the legislature, assembled for that purpose:—

Vote for President of the United States.
For Andrew Jackson of Tennessee, . . .	219
For Henry Clay of Kentucky, . . .	49
For John Floyd of Virginia, . . .	11
For William Wirt of Maryland, . . .	7
Vote for Vice-President of the United States.
For Martin Van Buren of New York, . . .	169
For John Sargeant of Pennsylvania, . . .	49
For William Wilkins of Pennsylvania, . . .	30
For Amos Ellmaker of Pennsylvania, . . .	7
For Henry Lee of Massachusetts, . . .	11

TURKEY.

We may believe the accounts lately brought from the East, we may now report the affairs in that quarter as being in some measure settled. A treaty is said to have been concluded between the Porte and the successful viceroy, by which the whole coast of Syria, from Tripoli to the borders of Egypt, including Jerusalem, is ceded to Ibrahim, who, on the other hand, is to be taken bound to restore Damascus, Aleppo, and other places, to his former superiors. These terms seem to have been literally dictated by the French Admiral, Roussin, who appears to have displayed a lively jealousy of all interference on the part of the Russians, and actually to have compelled the Sultan to decline the proffered assistance of that power in resisting the progress of the viceroy. A Russian fleet had come to anchor almost under the walls of Constantinople, at the express desire of the beleaguered Porte, and an army was ready to embark; but such was the effect of the mingled promises and threats of the French admiral (who is likewise ambassador), that the friendly aid of these northern allies was ultimately rejected, and an order transmitted to him to leave the Bosphorus. The Russian ambassador at Paris, Pozzo di Borgo, has remonstrated firmly with the French government upon this proceeding of their ambassador; and it is reported that Russia is likely to be recalled for his officious and meddling conduct. The treaty is not yet signed, and we reckon it very doubtful if Ibrahim will consent to surrender the fairest and wealthiest portion of his late conquests. It is not, indeed, for the interests either of the subjugated provinces, or foreign nations, that it should do so. Under his vigorous and enlightened sway, there would be a chance, if not an absolute certainty, equally of their moral, physical, and political improvement; whereas, the throwing of them again under the benumbing dominion of the slothful, barbarous, and degenerate Porte, would be equivalent to shutting against them the door to regeneration. Mohammed Ali is no doubt a despot, and evidently an ambitious one; but he seems thoroughly to understand the only sure foundation upon which a sovereign's power can be founded, and to consider the happiness and improvement of his subjects as identical with the glory of his reign.

FRANCE.

Since our last, a disclosure of an unexpected and very awkward nature has taken place, which is considered as having no small influence on the state of parties in France, and as being particularly favourable to the prospects of the existing dynasty. The Duchess de Berri is in a state of pregnancy! Rumours to that effect were for some time current, but generally disbelieved; but all doubt on the subject was removed by the following singular announcement by the Duchess herself to General Bugeaud, governor of the citadel of Blaye, where the Duchess has resided since her apprehension:—

"Pressed by my circumstances, and by the measures ordained by the government, although I had the gravest possible motives for keeping my marriage secret, I think I owe it to myself, as well as to my children, to declare, that I was secretly married during my sojourn in Italy.

(Signed)

"MARIE CAROLINE."

"From the Citadel of Blaye, this 22d February 1833."

All sorts of speculations are afloat as to who the husband, or alleged husband, is whom the Duchess has selected as the partner of her checkered fortunes—some asserting that it is Deutz, the individual who betrayed her; others, that it is Marshal Bourmont, or his brother. Some of the journals maintain that the letter is altogether a forgery, or has been wrung from the Duchess by the existing government, upon a secret pact for her liberation without being brought to trial for her treasonable practices. As yet, she still remains in durance. In the meantime, it is generally considered a death-blow to the Bourbon party, not only from the disreputability of the circumstance itself, but also as confirming the reports formerly circulated of the illegitimacy of the young Duke of Bourdeaux. It is admitted on all hands that the Duchess can no longer be acknowledged either in the quality of regent in the name of her son, or in that of her son's guardian during his minority. It is to the charge of the Duchess d'Angoulême that the care of the young aspirant to the throne of France is now to be consigned. The adherents of the old regime, however, have received some consolation for this "untoward event," by the acquittal of the venerable Chateaubriand, who was lately tried for high treason, for the publication of his famous pamphlet, wherein he plainly designated the young Duke as "Henry the Fifth, King of France." The speech of M. Berryer, counsel for the prisoner, is said to have been the finest display of oratory since the time of Mirabeau.

Benoist and Bergeron, the two individuals who were apprehended on suspicion of being concerned in the attempt, or alleged attempt, made some time ago on the life of Louis Philippe, by firing a pistol at him in the street, have likewise been tried and acquitted; as also the individuals who were landed from the Italian brig which brought the Duchess de Berri to France about a twelvemonth ago, and who have been in confinement ever since.

The Ministry of Marshal Soult appears to become every day more unpopular; and it is thought an entire change of government will speedily take place. General Sebastiani is looked upon as the probable successor of the present Minister. Prosecutions of the press are going on with unabated rigour.

PORTUGAL.

We are somewhat at a loss what to state regarding the fraternal contest going on in Portugal—or rather, at Oporto, for to that point alone are the operations of the combatants entirely confined—owing to the extremely contradictory accounts daily appearing in the hitherto supposed authoritative journals. It was lately positively asserted in the Times, that Don Pedro had thrown up his cause in despair, and set sail from Oporto; but later accounts represent matters in quite a different light. It appears certain that another engagement has taken place, the result of which is represented as favourable to the "constitutional cause." By some it is said that the conflict was brought on by a sortie of the besieged; by others, that Don Miguel had made another general attack on the town, in which he was repulsed with the loss of 600 men. The Scotch corps under Major Shaw, attached to Don Pedro, is reported to have suffered severely. We believe, however, that Pedro himself is now perfectly conscious of the utter hopelessness of his cause; and it is asserted, in the best informed French papers, that he has even made proposals to his brother, which were, of course, immediately rejected. The same authorities describe the Pedroites as in a state of the greatest wretchedness, being destitute alike of money, clothes, and provisions, and afflicted with the natural concomitant of such privations—disease.

SPAIN.

Spain presents, at this moment, the unwonted moral spectacle of a despotic court struggling against an aristocracy and a powerful church, to confer liberal institutions on a people who hardly display the slightest wish to embrace the rights and privileges thus strangely offered to them! The popular doctrine which obtains so generally at the present day, that political reforms can only originate with the many, is, in this instance at least, at fault. The queen, who heads the mouvement, has had a severe struggle with Don Carlos, the king's brother, who is backed by the apostolical, or church party; but it would appear that she has at last been triumphant. The latest French papers bring authentic accounts of the sailing of Don Carlos and his princess, the Princess Beira, his sister-in-law, and others of his adherents, for Portugal—for what purpose is not mentioned. The Cortes, it is said, are forthwith to be convoked by the spirited queen, who, in the name of her husband, who is represented as almost in a state of imbecility, has taken the reins of government entirely into her own hands.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

We stated in our last that three separate projects of treaty had been submitted by the French and English governments, conjointly, to the Dutch king, with the view to a final settlement of the claims of the latter. An answer, rejecting these overtures, has since been received by the hands of M. Dedel, who has been despatched to this country for the ostensible purpose of endeavouring to effect an amicable arrangement. From the known pacificatory disposition of the new diplomatist, hopes were at first entertained of a speedy settlement of the disputed points being effected; but it has since transpired that he is as yet entirely unauthorised by the Dutch government to enter into any engagements with the arbitrating powers. This tedious and tantalizing question, therefore, remains in statu quo, and seems likely to continue so.

WEST INDIES.

JAMAICA papers to the 4th of February have been received. The intelligence contained in them is of a very unpleasant nature. The measures of the governor, Earl Mulgrave, seem to be exciting a degree of exasperation in the minds of the colonists, amounting almost to open defiance and hostility. Since the late fearful insurrection, which was chiefly attributed to the indiscreet zeal of the sectarian missionaries, a great many of the colonists had formed themselves into societies, with the view of preventing any preachers but those sanctioned and deputed by the established church, from interfering with the spiritual instruction of the slaves. Against these societies, the governor had lately issued a proclamation, characterizing them as "seditious," and denouncing severe penalties against those who shall attempt to oppose the foresaid missionaries in the exercise of their vocation. So violent was the irritation of the inhabitants at this document, that the governor was openly abused and insulted in Spanish Town (St. Jago de la Vega, the capital of the island), and placards have been posted up, and handbills distributed, calling on the colonists to fight, if necessary, in defence of their rights and property. Great suspicion prevails amongst them that the coercive measures of the governor are privately sanctioned by the government at home, in order that, by stimulating the planters into open resistance, Ministers may appear the more justified in adopting some sweeping and extensive steps for the emancipation of the negroes, which is now so loudly called for by the British public. It seems to be expected by the West India interest, in London, that Earl Mulgrave will immediately be recalled, and his place supplied by General Sir John Keane, who was formerly deputy-governor after the Duke of Manchester, and previous to the appointment of Earl Belmore. Sir John is extremely popular amongst all classes, both white and black, in the island, and was the first who raised one of the brown population to the magistrate's bench.

The negroes are said to be every where quiet, but the spirits of the colonists every day sinking, on account of the progressive depreciation in the value of their produce, and, consequently, of property. As an instance of the latter, we find it is stated in a recent number of the Jamaica Courant, that at a late sale of an estate, valued a few years ago at £30,000, only £8000 was offered for it; a sum, it states, hardly sufficient to pay lawyers their bills of costs. Such is the result, adds the journal just named, "of the conduct so heartlessly pursued towards us by the Whigs of England."

GREECE.

The young king, Otho, whom we mentioned in our last as having arrived in his new dominions, has published a long address to the people, urging them to peace and unanimity, and calling upon them to co-operate with him in his endeavours to consolidate the empire. Colocotronis, who had previously refused submission to the provisional executive, has been induced to disband his followers, and to dispose of his stores of arms, ammunition, &c. to the new government.

NORWAY AND SWEDEN.

The Storting (or Diet) of the kingdom of Norway was opened at Christiansa on Feb. 13, by Collet Burdett, of the Norwegian government, who, in his address, gave a very favourable account of the state of the country. The speech declared, that if the system hitherto pursued is continued, and no war or other unforeseen disasters should occur, the entire redemption of the public debt may be expected.

The canal of Gotha, one of the greatest undertakings of Europe, has just been completed, after the labour of twenty years. It traverses Sweden in all its breadth, from Gottenburg on the Cattegat, to Soderkoping on the Baltic, and has been executed at an expense of 10,000,000 of rix-dollars. In joining the two seas, the canal of Gotha opens to trade a shorter and safer passage to the Baltic than that of the Sound, which obliges vessels to double the southern coast of Sweden. By the canal, on the other hand, the navigation is all inland, and, therefore, more commodious and secure.

British whaler. The Literary Gazette, in noticing the circumstance, says—"The log of the vessel is rather confused, but still there seems to be no doubt of the fact, that an immense tract of land has been found about the latitude of 67°, and in longitude lying nearly due south of the Cape of Good Hope. It has long been conjectured that the south, like the north pole, must have at least large islands much nearer than the adventures of any former voyagers had enabled them to ascertain. Cook was of this opinion, and more recently Weddell, who penetrated so far in this direction with his merchant bark. The problem is now solved; and we trust to have other particulars to detail, when the hope of profit leaves open the sources of intelligence."

IRELAND.

A most atrocious murder was perpetrated early last month, in the county of Ross, at noon-day, and on the public road, attended with circumstances of the most revolting and cold-blooded barbarity. A highly respectable gentleman and land proprietor, of the name of Leonard, being unable to obtain any rent from one of his tenants, who was due about L.150 (which the latter was perfectly able to pay), and after in vain offering to compromise the debt for L.33, at last threatened to distrain for the whole sum. For this offence he was set upon by three ruffians, on the borders of his own property; dragged from his gig; his head placed upon the top of a dyke, and beaten to pieces with stones. They then broke his right arm, cut off his left ear, and otherwise mutilated his person. After this they put the corpse into the gig along with the bloody stones and other instruments of destruction, turned the pony's head to the road, and put large stones before the wheels, so that the spectacle might be fully exhibited to the public view! The place of the murder is a populous valley; and the cool deliberation of the whole act fully demonstrates that the perpetrators were in no fear of evidence against them. Subsequent accounts have arrived of the apprehension of about forty of the peasantry, charged with this murder, on the confession of an accomplice. It is said, that, in order the better to prevent detection, the murders and other outrages committed in one place are performed by men, hired for the purpose, from other distant parts of the country.

The Assizes have been sitting, and the state of the country may be judged of from the fact, that, in King's County alone, there are one hundred and sixty-eight criminals for trial, and it is said that, but for the evidence of the police, there would scarcely be a single conviction. It appears, however, since the introduction of the ministerial bill, that at Kilkenny, where it was previously found almost impossible to get a juror to attend, they now exhibit the greatest willingness both to attend and convict; thus proving, we fear, more strongly, the understanding which subsists between the political leaders and the yeomanry of Ireland. The judge of Kilkenny stated, in his address to the grand jury, that, since the last assizes in the last half year, the number of offences proved to have been committed was 928, of which 920 were of an insurrectionary character, including 7 murders, 14 attempts at murder, 119 aggravated assaults, 20 robberies, 378 burglaries, 30 burnings, 181 illegal notices, 83 malicious injuries to property, 75 seizing of arms, and 60 administering of unlawful oaths; but that such was the difficulty of procuring evidence, or inducing parties to seek redress, that only 75 of the whole list were entered for prosecution! He also added, that no person now thought of endeavouring to recover debts by prosecution.

The agitators succeeded, in the early part of the month, in procuring a run upon the banks for gold at Cork, Kilkenny, Waterford, Carlow, Dublin, &c., but such was the state of preparation, that it occasioned the establishments no inconvenience, and the only effect has been a stagnation of trade and commerce, and, consequently, a lamentable aggravation of public distress.

It is a remarkable fact, that, notwithstanding all the agitation and interruptions to industry which prevail, the linen manufactures have been thriving rapidly of late, especially about Belfast.

Cholera still prevails in Ireland to a considerable extent. The weekly report of cases for the week ending on Tuesday the 19th ultimo, was—New cases, 758—deaths, 401—recoveries, 188.

ENGLAND.

Lord Durham has resigned his office of Lord Privy Seal, and his seat in the Cabinet. His friends say that his retirement is owing solely to personal indisposition and domestic losses; but it is, on the other hand, strongly rumoured that the refusal of his official colleagues to agree to his sweeping proposals of political and other reforms, is the chief, if not the sole cause of his retirement. His Lordship has been created an earl.

Earl Fitzwilliam, it is expected, will shortly be elevated to the dignity of Marquis of Rockingham, an honour which the present Ministers intended for his venerable father, had his health enabled him to take his seat in Parliament.

Sir Francis Burdett, it is now finally settled, will shortly be elevated to the Peerage.

It is not a little singular that two Tories have, within the last month, been returned to Parliament, by large majorities, for seats previously occupied by ultra-reformers—Mr Lyall for the city of London, in the room of Alderman Waithman, deceased, and Mr Halcombe for Dover, in the room of Mr Poulett Thomson, who has selected Manchester, for which place he was also returned at the last election. Both of these elections were hotly contested. At the Mary-le-bonne election also, on the 16th ultimo, in the room of Mr Portman, who has resigned from bad health, Mr Hope, the Conservative candidate (who stood for Manchester at the last election), was beaten by a very comparatively small majority, and only, it is said, by government latterly throwing all its influence into the scale of the Radical candidate, Sir S.

Whalley. The Ministerial candidate, Mr Murray, son of Lord Dunmore, was so completely distanced, that he resigned before the conclusion of the contest.

Circulars have been issued to the officers commanding the different corps of Yeomanry, requiring a return of their arms and ammunition, as well as their present state; also of the present depots of arms, specifying such of them as are in the possession of the men.

The Sun newspaper states, that the returns for the financial year, terminating on the 5th curt., are likely to prove very unsatisfactory, and that Lord Althorp has now no hope of being able to propose a reduction in any branch of taxation.

The day appointed for the general thanksgiving for the cessation of the cholera is altered from 12th May to Sunday the 14th April.

The Duke of Wellington, as constable of Dover Castle, received intelligence a few days back, that the situation of keeper or warden of the castle was vacant, upon which he wrote, or caused to be written, a letter to a serjeant who had served in the Peninsular campaigns, and offered the appointment to him.

Thomas Attwood, Esq. M.P. for Birmingham, was refused admission as a member of the Literary Union Club, in Waterloo Place, on the 6th ult., by a majority of eighty-seven black balls over forty-two white. Nine white balls must appear to one black on any successful ballot, so that this result marks in a peculiar manner the feelings entertained by the gentlemen of the Union. Nine other candidates who were balloted for at the same time, were admitted.

At a general meeting of the proprietors of the London University, on the 27th February, Mr Abercromby in the chair, it appeared, from a report of the committee on the finances of the establishment, that the original capital subscribed, L.158,882, had been expended, and a debt of L.2946 incurred. An addition of nearly L.1000 was anticipated within a few months; and an annual subscription of L.1000 a-year was earnestly recommended, in order to restore the University to independence, and a competent revenue.

MEMORABILIA.

The assessed taxes yielded, for the year ending January 1832, L.4,056,000; the principal items of which are, the house-tax, L.1,357,000; window-tax, L.1,178,000. The cost of collecting the assessed taxes is five per cent.

The following is Dr Rudge's statement of the present revenues of the church of England:—Aggregate revenues of bishops, England and Wales, L.163,000 per annum; aggregate revenues of deans and chapters, L.285,000; aggregate revenues of all beneficed clergy, L.1,694,000. Gross revenues of the church, including those of bishops, chapters, and beneficed clergy, L.2,142,000; livings under L.200 per annum, of which some are under L.12, and 1350 below L.70, 4401; livings under L.200 to L.300 per annum, 2142; livings from L.300 to L.500 per annum, 2180; livings above L.500 per annum, 1277, total, 10,000. Of the above livings, on which residence is impossible, there are 4809; of those on which there is no parsonage-house, 2626; others unfit for residence and let from L.2 to L.3 per annum, 2183; of livings in England and Wales, above L.4000 per annum, 4; of livings worth L.2000 per annum, 28; beneficed clergy resident on their livings, 3708; beneficed clergy non-resident, 6804.

It appears, from returns laid before Parliament, that during the year 1832, there have been committed to the various prisons in England and Wales, charged with criminal offences, 20,829 persons, of whom 17,486 were males, and 3343 females. Of that number, 1449 were sentenced to death (but only 54 of them executed); 546 transported for life; 1 for 28 years; 764 for 14 years; 1 for 10 years; and 2603 for 7 years; 3716 were acquitted; 2266 discharged without being prosecuted; and the remainder, viz. 9583, imprisoned for various periods.

It appears, by accounts recently published, that the total debts of the East India Company amount to L.30,774,092; of which L.22,913,990 is held by Europeans; and L.7,860,102 by natives.

Temperance Societies.—At a late general meeting of the friends and members of Temperance Societies, it was stated that there were 250 associations in England, comprehending 47,000 members; 380 in Scotland, 55,000 members; and 20,000 members in Ireland. The fifth annual report of the American Temperance Society has just reached this country, from which it appears, that, during the past year, 200,000 members had been added to their societies, and that the number of members now amounts to 500,000. It is stated that, from the success of these societies, in the state of New York, ninety-three distilleries had, in consequence, been discontinued, and a corresponding number of retailers of ardent spirits had given up that line of business.

The number of vessels lost through shipwreck, in the royal navy, since the 1st January 1816, to the latest period the same can be made out, is 52; 13 of which were never heard of, and the crews are supposed to have perished. The crews of 28 were entirely saved, and of the remaining 11, they were only partially saved.

The total expense of the New London Bridge was L.1,458,311, 8s. 11½d. The purchase of freeholds, leaseholds, &c., for the purposes of the act, amount to the sum of L.692,555, 16s. 6d. Messrs Jolliffe and Banks, the contractors, received L.425,081, 9s. 2d. The removal of the bodies from St Michael's, Crooked Lane, cost the sum of L.2703, 6s. 11d. The Parliamentary expenses were L.13,477, 15s. 10d.

In the year ending March 25, 1832, there was levied in England for poor rates the sum of L.8,255,315, 12s., out of which there was expended for the relief of the poor L.6,731,131, 10s. There was an increase of 3 per cent. on the average of England, compared with the rates of the preceding year. The number of select vestries engaged in these levies was 2234; the number of assistant overseers was 3134; employed in repair of roads, 51,705; paid from poor's rate for such labour, L.261,465, 8s.; employed in other parish work, L.17,390; paid for such work, L.88,257, 7s. In Wales, the total sum expended was L.367,604, 12s., and the increase per cent. is doubt that in England, being 6; employed on roads, 1131; paid for their labour, L.3354, 17s.

SCOTLAND.

SCOTTISH BURGH REFORM.

In another part of our paper will be found an abstract of the bill proposed by the Lord Advocate for the reform of the Scottish burghs. This bill, it seems, is only one of three which are projected for the benefit of the towns in Scotland. A second, to be brought forward, relates to towns not incorporated; and a third is intended to provide for the establishment of boards of police in the whole. Among rational and reflecting persons, unbiassed by party views, there can be but one opinion respecting the measures, so far as they have been promulgated—and that is, that they are by no means founded on the obvious principles of common sense, and appear little else than bills to perpetuate the misgovernment of the burghs. Hitherto, the towns of Scotland have been placed on a strange footing. Some have been governed by selected town councils and magistrates; others, by bail appointed by barons; and others have had no government at all. In all the large burgh towns, there has been a most pernicious conflict of jurisdictions. We shall take Edinburgh as an example. This city, in appearance, a large town, governed in a uniform manner from the centre to the outskirts. But, in reality, nothing can be farther from the truth. There is a town council and magistracy, who govern and manage one part of it; there is a Canongate magistracy, who take another part; a bail appointed by the Duke of Hamilton takes another; magistrates in Easter and Wester Portsburgh take another; a sheriff, or his substitute, take another; justices of peace also do something; while there is a board of police, who do something else; trustees of roads likewise claim a share of the management; and into all there are a variety of corporations, who exercise an authority over the members of certain professions. Now, all this is a mass of absurdity, not only exceedingly discreditable to the common sense of the age, but very troublesome to the people; who, though sure not to escape taxation at the instance of some half-dozen of the authorities, frequently do not know which to apply to in case of a grievance. If there be a rut in the street opposite your door, you may fight your way through three or four jurisdictions before you can fix the onus of remedying the evil on proper authority. It should be explained, that nobody is to blame for such a mixture of jurisdictions, for the originate in the circumstance, that Edinburgh, in the present day, is composed of five or six towns, grown together by means of the extension of streets; and all that can be said on the point is, that it is fully time the wheels of the existing petty jurisdictions were swept away, and one potential authority erected in their stead. A similar remark applies to many of the large towns, though may be acknowledged that none are so badly off as the metropolis. Few men could have had such excellent opportunities of knowing these complicated mischiefs as the Lord Advocate, and we cannot help expressing our surprise at the short-sighted inefficiency of his bill, which calculated to countenance and continue the vicious mixture of jurisdictions, and, in sum and substance, is simply an act to keep things as they are, only substituting popular for close election of the town councils. There is possibility that a measure of this nature may answer present purposes, but there is little likelihood of its pleasing the nation at large, and no chance whatever of its answering the end of good municipal government a few years hence. If a real reform be wanted in the burghs, a reform that will wear well, then there must, in the instance, be a total abrogation of all burghal privileges. There must henceforth be no invidious distinction between one town and another, or betwixt one part of town and another. In North America, we believe, town is just a town, and no more about it: it is free of the settlement of tradesmen or others from all parts of the world. The part at the centre has no pretensions to a dignity not enjoyed by the outskirts, and the people of one street are not more taxed than those in another.

To prepare the way, therefore, for measures of burgh reform applicable to the various towns, and modified according to circumstances, every thing like ancient and extended royalties, as they are called, ought to be abrogated, and the narrow privileges of the corporations dissolved. In short, every town in the kingdom should be reduced to the character of a collection of houses, and nothing more, the inhabitants of which, having one common interest, ought to have but one common privilege. This applies to royal burghs, burghs of regality, burghs of barony, and towns as yet unendowed with any such trumpety privilege. All towns, great or small, being thus reduced to a common level, the functions of their government might be constructed as follows—The householders (at a rent, in many cases, below 10 pounds) to elect commissioners of wards or otherwise, and these commissioners or councillors to have the power solely as respects watching, lighting, cleaning, and assessing; and it would be exceedingly advisable that they should have the unlimited power of ordering the repair of the streets in every quarter of the town. All petty criminal business ought to come under the jurisdiction of a paid magistrate, a person of legal education, who should hold a court weekly or daily, as the case might require. All petty civil causes should similarly be placed under a paid magistrate of competent knowledge, and in many instances one functionary might fill both the offices. It is at least a matter of great importance that ere should be no unpaid honorary magistrates, for they induce endless jobbing. Small fees on the cases brought to court would liquidate their salaries, or they might be paid out of the town funds, at a much lower expense than the amount of the present outlays on entertainments and frivolous jobs. All that relates to the funds and revenues of the towns ought next to be placed under the control of the commissioners; and when burghs are in a state of bankruptcy, as Edinburgh is at present, their affairs may, in the meanwhile, be put under trust. In the burghs the town councils have the patronage and insensibility of the churches; and in such cases every thing relative to the church should be given over to those who are really concerned in the matter—namely, the heads of families in the parishes. All that relates to the sale and holding of property should be placed under the control of the county functionaries already constituted; and this of itself is a species of reform much wanted. In conclusion, every town, without exception, ought to have a guildry, or body of artisans, for the inspection of tenements; but, of course, quite unconnected with the ordinary government of the towns. We would leave nothing to be done by a town council and magistracy, according to the present acceptance of these terms. It being impossible to see how the future good government of any town should be made to depend, then on the nature of its origin or the incidents connected with its history, we would produce a comparative uniformity and a simplicity of town government over the whole country, and leave no vestige whatever of a former ill-regulated state of things. For instance, Selkirk is an ancient royal burgh with a large town council; Dalkeith a burgh of barony, governed by a single individual appointed by the Duke of Buccleuch, while its streets are under the management of county gentlemen, over whom the inhabitants have no control; and Portobello a thriving town in the neighbourhood, with no form of government whatever. Each of these towns consists of rows of houses with people inhabiting them; in each, different classes of tradesmen pursue their professions; and in each, there are shops for the sale of goods. Now, it may be asked, in what respect ought these several towns to be governed differently? Is it reasonable that incidents connected with their history should continue to influence their mode of government in the nineteenth century? Is it the least consequence in the recovery of small debts, in the punishment of crimes, or in the cleaning of streets, that our forefathers fought at the battle of Flodden? If there be no consequence, then Selkirk can require no peculiarity of government, and its affairs should just be regulated in the same manner as those of Dalkeith and Portobello, both of which places, though of modern date, and having no connection with the battle of Flodden, are as good as Selkirk or any other burgh in the country, and are as well worthy of good government. Our readers will thus perceive that antiquated privileges cannot properly have any thing to do with the question of municipal government, more especially since the privileges of the old county freeholders have been found consistent with a beneficial process of appointing members to Parliament.

We have now presented a few broad views of the measure of burgh reform; and it becomes the duty of the people to say what they would wish, for on the expression of their sentiments will depend the passing of the bill in its present form. There can be no doubt that the degree of reform will frequently depend on the necessities of particular towns, and, therefore, one uniform bill for all the burghs may perhaps be found somewhat anomalous. But it behoves each burgh to settle on what it essentially requires. It is a matter of certainty that the bill will produce but a very miserable reform in Edinburgh, which, from the extraordinary complexity of its jurisdictions, and its general affairs, would require a separate and peculiar bill for itself.

NEW CHURCHES IN EDINBURGH.

A VERY unfortunate question is at present at issue between the City and Presbytery of Edinburgh. Some years ago, when it was resolved to improve St Giles's Church, by abolishing two of the places of worship under its roof, it was agreed upon by the city, and formed part of the requisite Parliamentary enactment, that two new churches should be erected in some part of the town, in place of those which were removed. The Presbytery was appointed to see this agreement carried into effect. Now, it happens to be very inconvenient for the city, in the present state of its funds, to erect two new churches; and it is the opinion of a vast majority of the citizens who are neither "revolutionists" nor "infidels," that they are not necessary—that, in short, the money, even if it could be got, would only be misspent on such erections. The reasons for forming this opinion are most obvious; for it cannot be denied that the two St Giles's Churches which at present exist are more than sufficient to contain all the people who seem inclined, or have for thirty years past seemed inclined, to attend public worship in that part of the town.

Under a conviction of this kind, the Lord Provost lately said in the Council, that, if any persons could be found who would build the two churches upon the security of the seat-rents, he would, so far as his voice went, give them the patronage of the churches also. For this he was openly denounced by one of the clergymen (Mr Bruce), in the Presbytery meeting of February 27, as "making common cause and identifying himself with the scoffers and revolutionary infidels of the town;" a class of persons whom it would be difficult, perhaps, to discover as having ever acted in the history of this case. The Lord Provost, at the council meeting of March 13, delivered a very warm address, in which he remonstrated against the language used respecting him by the reverend gentleman, and said, that he was only prevented from seeking to right himself in a court of law by a consideration for the usefulness of the offender as a clergyman. The Council, to mark their feelings on the occasion, voted that his Lordship's speech should be entered upon the record of the city.

Against this Mr Bruce remonstrated, by a letter laid before the Town Council on the 20th instant, in which he pointed out that thus to censure him without being heard in his own defence, and without his offence having been fixed as such in a court of law, was unjust. The Council, however, agreed, without a division, to leave the Lord Provost's speech upon the record.

DEPOSITION OF THE REV. EDWARD IRVING.

THE Presbytery of Annan met on the 13th ult., for the purpose of trying the Rev. E. Irving on a charge of heresy, having published works objectionable in point of doctrine, as well as derogatory to the honour and character of the Church of Scotland. Mr Irving at great length defended the doctrines which he had published, and quoted several passages from the Scriptures in proof of their truth. He denied the right of the General Assembly to interfere with him. Mr Sloan, Dr Duncan, Mr Nivison, and Mr Monilaws, delivered their opinions, condemning the doctrines as being contrary to the standards of the church, and as Mr Irving had avowed them, sentence of deposition ought to be passed upon him. The Moderator was about to proceed to the solemn duty which had devolved upon him, and, as a preliminary, requested Mr Sloan, the senior member of Presbytery, to offer up a prayer to Almighty God, when a voice was heard from the pew in which Mr Irving was seated, and which immediately was found to be that of Mr Dow, late minister of Inragray, exclaiming, "Arise, depart—arise, depart! Flee ye out—flee ye out of her! Ye cannot pray. How can ye pray to Christ, whom ye deny? Ye cannot pray. Depart—depart! Flee—flee!" As he uttered these words, his countenance assumed the appearance of one under the influence of a temporary aberration of mind, and though interrupted by repeated cries of order, he continued with little abatement till exhaustion forced him to conclude. The assembly, which was very numerous, and had acted in the most becoming manner, now became confused, and Mr Dow rose to leave the house, leading Mr Irving after him. Mr Irving lifted up his hand as he was going, and said, "Will ye not obey the voice of the Holy Ghost which ye have now heard? As many as will obey the Holy Ghost, follow!" The two gentlemen, along with several others who belonged to their party, having left the church, Mr Sloan prayed, and the Moderator then solemnly pronounced the sentence of deposition. The Presbytery being closed by a blessing, was dismissed.

We trust we have now done, once and for aye, with this reverend gentleman, whose spiritual vagaries have occupied, in our opinion, far too large a portion of public attention for some years, and which, notwithstanding the assurances we have to the contrary from many who know him intimately in private life, we cannot help suspecting to proceed more from an insatiable love of fame and notoriety, than actual fanaticism.

Feb. 25. Important to Publishers.—Baillie Court of Edinburgh. A. Deuchar, seal-engraver, agent for the British Herald, v. Thomas Johnston.—Johnston was an original subscriber to the British Herald, which, by the prospectus, it was stated would be published in four parts, price 21s. each. On the publication of the fourth part it was announced, that the work would extend to five parts, and the price of the whole to L.5. 5s. instead of L.4. 4s. The Baillies held, that the publisher was bound by his prospectus, and that the defender was entitled to have the work complete for L.4. 4s., however many parts it might extend to.

March 1. The petitions from this city for the immediate abolition of slavery were forwarded this morning to London, each containing 20,206 names. They are about 300 feet long, of three columns of names wide, weigh one stone each, and are equal to 3600 feet in continued signatures together.

7. This evening, about 1000 individuals, almost wholly trades-lads, assembled in the large Waterloo Rooms, called by an anonymous placard, to consider the propriety of petitioning Parliament against passing a bill "for the suppression (as the placard had it) of the liberties of Ireland." James Aytoun, Esq. advocate, was called to the chair, when several resolutions against the measures now in the House of Commons were moved and seconded, and, along with a petition to Parliament, carried by acclamation. Besides the chairman, the meeting was addressed by Mr Tait, bookseller, Mr Jameson, W.S., Mr Moffat, Dalkeith, Major Brown, and several others.

9. The Court of Session rose this day for the spring vacation. The box-days are Thursday 4th, and Thursday 25th April. The Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle announces rather a remarkable fact, namely, that the Theatre-Royal, Edinburgh, pays L.36, 10s. 4d. per annum as annuity money, or ministers' stipend. Altogether, the local taxation on this establishment, for the year 1832, amounted to L.201, 13s. 4d.

Le Baron de Damas, governor to his Royal Highness the Duc de Bordeaux, has transmitted the sum of thirty pounds sterling, for the monument about to be erected here to the memory of Sir Walter Scott.

Provincial Branch Bank.—The Directors of the National Bank of Scotland have resolved to open a branch at Forres.

The long-talked of christening of the infant Earl of Dalkeith has at length been performed. The ceremony took place at Dalkeith Palace, near Edinburgh, and was quite private. Their Majesties were sponsors, by proxy, for the infant heir to the house of Buccleuch, who received the names of William Walter. On the same occasion the Duke's youngest son, an infant of three months old, was christened, the sponsors being Lord Montague, uncle to his Grace, and Lord John Scott, from whom he received the names of Henry John.

15. The evening, at a meeting of the working classes of Edinburgh, Mr Prentice in the chair, held in the Old Burgher Chapel, to petition Parliament against the Irish Coercion Bill, nearly 600 being present, Mr Peddie begged to direct the attention of the meeting to an article in the Scotsman of that day, which called forth the vehement disapprobation of the meeting, and there were loud cries of "Burn it, burn it," which ceremony was performed rite et solemniter, amidst groans and hisses.

16. An accident of a most appalling and fatal nature occurred this day at the sale of the late Lord Eldin's splendid collection of pictures, at his Lordship's house, in Picardy Place, Leith Walk, Edinburgh. It was the third day of the sale, which was going on in the back drawing-room, on the second flat, in which there were at the time about 150 individuals, almost all of the upper classes of life. About half past two, whilst a keen competition was going on for a valuable Teniers, the floor in an instant, and without any previous warning, gave way, and about 100 individuals of both sexes were precipitated in a mass into the flat below, amidst broken joists, bindings, lath, plaster, furniture, &c. The room into which they fell was filled with valuable china, and other articles of virtu arranged for sale, and the door was consequently locked. A considerable time, therefore, elapsed before it was got broken open, and the sufferers who survived rescued from their perilous situation. Luckily, they maintained a coolness and collectedness of mind, which, under all the circumstances, is almost incredible, and they remained perfectly steady, patiently awaiting the result of the exertions making for their relief. When the door was got opened, and the obstructions removed, the condition of those who had escaped with life was truly deplorable. The clothes of many were literally torn from their backs, their faces begrimed with blood and dust, and their respiration almost choked with the dense cloud of dirt which arose from the deafening of the fallen floor. On removing a large chest of drawers, which had descended with the crash, Alexander Smith, Esq. banker, partner of the house of Kinnear, Smith, and Co. was lying below it almost lifeless, and he very soon afterwards expired. It was supposed that his death was occasioned by concussion of the brain. Amongst the individuals more or less injured were—Mr George Thomson of the Trustees' Office, the friend and correspondent of Burns, who received a severe blow in the chest; Mr Ross, a son of Charles Ross, Esq. advocate, has had his leg fractured and ankle dislocated; Mrs John Anderson, Mansfield Place, was severely bruised; Mrs Keay of Snago slightly hurt; Mr William Lang, W.S. Assistant-Clerk of Session; Mr Smellie Watson, Forth Street; Mr Kid; Dr MacLagan; Mr P. Dalmahoy, W.S.; Mr Haldane, engraver, from Glasgow; Mr Majoribanks of Majoribanks; Mr Lorimer, Elm Row; Mr Falconer of Falcon Hall; Mr Belshes, accountant, Greenside Street, two ribs broken; Mr John Dewar; Mr D. Stewart of the Custom-house; Mr Wright, auctioneer; Mr J. E. Williams, artist, three ribs broken; Mr Monteith, advocate; Mr Siewright of Meggetland; Mr T. Forrest, jeweller; Mr H. Jack, carver and gilder; Rev. J. B. Howison. None of the injuries, we are happy to say, are likely to prove of any ultimately serious consequence, and the sufferers are all doing well. One of the gentlemen who fell, but escaped comparatively uninjured, informed us, that his first impression (and we believe it was shared by all) was, that the whole house was falling about them. His next fear was that of suffocation, to which many of them, indeed, would no doubt have fallen victims, had they not been speedily rescued. The cause of the accident is understood to have been the breaking of a large beam which extended across the room, and supported the flooring. Upon afterwards examining the beam which supports the floor of the lower room into which they fell, it was found to be started, so that they narrowly escaped being precipitated down another story. Strange to tell, little of the china in the lower flat was destroyed; and from the pictures being in a side room on the second flat, only the one in the course of being disposed of was injured. The proceeds of the two days' sale, previous to the accident, amounted to L.337.

Toll Duties—Important.—It has been decided by the Sheriff of Ayrshire, that loaded carriages which have paid toll on passing through a bar, are not liable to a second charge on returning with a fresh load, if the latter be for the benefit of the same individual, and the carriage his own. Only hired carriages are liable to the second charge. A similar decision was very lately given in a case originating at the Leith Walk toll-bar, and this point—which has so long been the subject of harassing and irritating disputes between tollmen and agriculturists, and others—may, therefore, be considered as finally settled. The counsel to whom the latter case was referred was the Dean of Faculty (Hope), whose able report was considered perfectly unsatisfactory and conclusive.

Presbytery of Edinburgh.—On Wednesday, 27th ult., the Presbytery of Edinburgh proceeded to elect ministers and elders to represent the body in the ensuing General Assembly.—Ministers, Dr Chalmers, Mr Balfour of Colinton, Drs Brunton and Brown, and Mr Marshall of Edinburgh, and Mr Buchanan of North Leith.—Dr Grant then proposed that the Lord President, Mr Crawford of Carlsburn, and Bailie Wright, be elected elders for the same purpose.—Dr Dickson proposed the Lord President, Mr George Ross, advocate, and Mr Archibald Anderson. A vote having been taken, the first list was carried by 25 to 18.

Postscript.

It is announced in the Globe and other Ministerial papers, that the following changes in the arrangement of the administration have been finally settled:—Lord Goderich to succeed Lord Durham as Lord Privy Seal; Mr Stanley to succeed Lord Goderich as Colonial Secretary; and Sir John Hobhouse to succeed Mr Stanley as Secretary for Ireland. The Courier adds, that Mr Edward Ellice is to be Secretary at War.

Authentic accounts have arrived of the taking possession of Smyrna by Ibrahim Pacha, with a detachment of troops who were foraging for provision for the main body of the army. The Governor threw open the gates to Ibrahim, who immediately ordered the abolition of certain obnoxious taxes which weighed heavy upon the inhabitants. This took place three days before the drawing up of the treaty, of which we have taken notice under the head of Turkey.

The French papers announce the dismissal of M. Dubois, and the elevation of Sebastiani to a seat in the Cabinet, but without any official appointment.

The intentions of Ministers have now been in a manner officially declared concerning the East India Company. They propose to abolish the monopoly of the China trade, which could not possibly have been continued longer; to leave to the Directors, under certain limitations, the political administration of their vast territories; and to guarantee to the proprietors of East India stock the payment of their ordinary dividend for a limited time; after which to pay it off with L.100 of capital stock for every annuity of L.5. 5s. It is understood, besides, that British subjects will be allowed freely to settle and to colonize the country, to purchase lands, and to introduce into all parts European commerce and capital, and European improvement. The abolition of the tea monopoly is, of course, strongly objected to by the Directors as a heavy loss to the Company.

CRIMES.

High Court of Justiciary.—The calendar of crimes to be disposed of at the usual sitting of the Justiciary Court after the rising of the session, on the 9th ult., for the spring vacation, was unusually heavy. We are forced, for the sake of brevity, to omit the trials for the more petty thefts.

Monday, 10th, Joseph M'Ewan and William Scott were charged with breaking into the house of Robert Grant, Esq. of Kinross, in Melville Street, and stealing a variety of articles of jewellery, &c. Scott pleaded guilty, and M'Ewan not guilty. The jury found M'Ewan also guilty, and he was sentenced to fourteen years' transportation. [Scott likewise pleaded guilty to another charge at a subsequent part of the day, and was sentenced to fourteen years' transportation.]

Edward Cochrane, the associate of Michael M'Cabe, who was lately sentenced to death (which sentence has been commuted to transportation for life) for knocking down and robbing Alexander Bain, fish-curer, Burntisland, in December last, in Blair Street, was placed at the bar for his participation in said assault and robbery. Prisoner pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to transportation for life.

James Blackburn, charged with stealing from the person of James Gray, armor, at or near the head of Canongate, on the 6th of February last, a silver watch, with steel chain and brass key, was found guilty by a jury, as libelled, and was sentenced to 14 years' transportation.

John St George, charged with theft, and being habit and reputed a thief, and previously convicted, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to seven years' transportation.

William Cusine, charged with theft, habit and reputed, and previous conviction, pleaded not guilty. He was found guilty, and sentenced to transportation for seven years. The Court adjourned at half-past seven o'clock.

Thursday, 14th, the court was occupied all day, until nearly eight o'clock at night, with the trial of William Grieve, accused of rape, committed on the 25th of December last, on the person of a married woman, residing in Haddington. The investigation was, of course, conducted with closed doors. The jury, after resting about twenty minutes, returned a verdict finding the libel proven, with one dissentient voice, but, in consideration of the character given of him, unanimously recommended him to mercy. Lord Meadowbank, who was the presiding judge, after a feeling address, read the sentence, ordering the prisoner to be executed at the usual place of execution, on Wednesday, 3d April next. The prisoner is a young man, about twenty-two years of age, and has been married for some time.

Janet Turnbull, charged with perjury, on the 9th of November last, in the trial of Helen McChie and Margaret Campbell, indicted for theft, and Mary Smith, or Hill, of reset of theft, pleaded guilty. After suitable addresses from the judges, she was sentenced to seven years' transportation. The Right Honourable the Lord Justice Clerk was cited as one of the witnesses in this case.

Messrs CHAMBERS act as Publishing Agents (in Scotland) for the following Works:—

THE BRITISH LIBRARY.—This publication is intended to comprise the works of all the classic authors of Great Britain. It appears in a series of handsome monthly volumes, correctly and elegantly printed, at a price hitherto unprecedented. Each work will be carefully edited; notes, when necessary, are given; and the life of the author, either selected or written expressly for the purpose, is prefixed.

The British Library rests its claims to public patronage, chiefly on its correctness and unequalled cheapness; but in beauty of typography and elegance of outward appearance, it will yield to no other publication of the day; and although the proprietors do not hold out the inducement of illustrations, these, of first rate quality, will not be spared in works such as White's Selborne, Walton and Angler, &c., where they will be useful as well as ornamental.

The first volume of the British Library contains White's Natural History of Selborne, with Observations on Nature, and the Naturalist's Calendar. The second forms the first volume of Goldsmith's Miscellaneous Works. To be completed in four volumes. Price of each volume, only 3s.; or, in morocco cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

THE BRITISH CYCLOPEDIA OF ARTS, SCIENCES, MANUFACTURE, COMMERCE, LITERATURE, HISTORY, GEOGRAPHY, POLITICS, BIOGRAPHY, NATURAL HISTORY, &c. Conducted by Charles F. Pangloss, Esq. Published in weekly numbers, in a large octavo size, price 3d. each, or in monthly parts. The British Cyclopaedia is a work calculated in a great measure, to supersede the necessity of purchasing large expensive Encyclopedias, and will prove, when completed, a most useful digest, not only for occasional reference, but regular instructive and entertaining reading. Already, the weekly circulation amounts to 13,000 copies.

THE FIELD NATURALIST'S MAGAZINE AND REVIEW OF ANIMAL PLANTS, MINERALS, THE STRUCTURE OF THE EARTH, AND APPEARANCE OF THE SKY. By James Rennie, M.A. Professor of Zoology. Published monthly, price 1s.

THE DIAMOND BIBLE, with Notes explanatory and practical. By the Rev. H. Seebing. With engravings from the old master. This is an exceedingly beautiful edition of the Bible, of the smallest pocket size; publishing in weekly numbers, at 6d. each. The part containing the New Testament is in course of being issued, and will be completed in six numbers.

All the preceding publications are sold by every bookseller in the United Kingdom.

REAL LIFE.—We cordially add our humble, but distinguished testimony to that of an admiring circle of new papers and other works, respecting the merits of this modest volume, which has now been published for several months. It contains many homely and striking pictures of the Scottish peasantry, and abounds in judicious and benevolent views of human nature.

The number of sheets printed monthly of Messrs CHAMBERS'S publications amounts to 320,000, or annually four millions one hundred and fifty-six thousand—fully more than one-half of which are disposed of in Scotland, and the remainder in England and Ireland. Such is the activity of the printing trade at present in Edinburgh, and the consequent difficulty of getting steady workmen, that this week Messrs CHAMBERS have been under the necessity of removing the execution of their printing to Glasgow, where the work for some time will most probably be done, and sent back to Edinburgh.

HUMAN BEINGS AND MACHINERY.

THE necessity of labouring for subsistence was a doom imposed upon man at the beginning, and it has ever since maintained its sway over him. So thoroughly indeed has the human race become habituated to this duty, and so expressly have all their circumstances in life been calculated with a reference to it, that labour is looked upon as a real good, and the want of it an evil. To be out of work, in an industrious community like that of Great Britain, exposes an individual to every kind of hardship; and it is only found that there are any complaints, when all classes are not like busily, and, it may be, slavishly employed.

Yet, though we have thus become accustomed to regard the hardest labour as a good, it cannot, philosophically, be set forward as an abstract good. By this we mean, that, though it may be advantageous under particular circumstances, or as a preventive of evil, it is not in its very nature advantageous. On the contrary, there are many kinds of labour which large classes of men have been contented to undergo for the sake of subsistence for many ages, and which, nevertheless have an undeniably bad effect, both in so far as they impair the health and shorten the lives of men, and because they can hardly fail to produce a certain degree of moral degradation. It may be better for men to have these employments, and live by them, than to starve utterly; but it is not better to have men thus living and thus suffering, than to want many of the human race altogether. Better, we say, that men should not be brought into the world, than be brought into it only to spend all their days in miserable toil, and with no chance of fulfilling those moral ends for which we are informed that man is, after all, principally created, and without which, it is very certain, his enjoyments are of a very wretched character.

We have been led into this train of reflection by some circumstances which have lately occurred in the management of our own publications. For several months previous to the past March, our publications were printed by a machine, which, while it served us at a somewhat cheaper rate than the hand-press, evidently did no injury to the class of men usually maintained by labouring at those engines, seeing that they were ever busier in Edinburgh than during the very time when our works were thus printed. All at once, in consequence of a pressure of employment at the machine, we were compelled to have recourse to the usual modes of printing, thereby throwing a new load of work, of a very uncommon amount, upon men who were already almost fully occupied. The result was one which has unfortunately been conspicuous in the appearance of some of our late sheets. Overpowered by a labour so severe, so constant, and so monotonous, the men had more than usual recourse to artificial stimulants of a debasing nature, and thus on several occasions fairly broke down under their employment, leaving us, of course, in a state of anxiety respecting the punctuality of our publications, such as we never experienced respecting their literary composition, any other matter, however important, connected with them. All this, be it observed, was not the result, in any degree, of what are called extra hours: it appeared to arise solely from the harassing and degrading nature of an employment which requires so much exertion of the physical, and so little of the mental powers of men.* It impressed us with the idea, that thus to tear and wear the sinews of human beings, and force them into practices which debase their whole natures, were as well avoided, provided that it can be avoided without producing a greater evil; and this, we humbly conceive, can be done by the employment of a machine, which, unlike men, has no moral nature to be degraded or lost through the influence of its labours, and does not, at least in this instance, as has been shown, abstract any labour upon which working men have hitherto depended for their subsistence. Let it not be supposed, that, in this argument, we are influenced by any feelings of resentment towards these operatives. Much as we have lately suffered on account of what we are now stating, we view the case entirely as a speculative question; or, if we have any feeling on the subject, it is one of a philanthropical kind only.

It is surprising for what a length of time public writers will go on debating a subject connected with public economy, and yet never hit upon the little bit of common-sense observation, which generally can afford a key to the whole. The proneness of the working-people to liquor, and other base habits, have long been lamented by the better-off classes; and temperance societies have been instituted over the country, in the hope of correcting the principal evil. It seems to be always assumed that drinking is just a bad habit, and that it can be banished through the efficacy of good advice and good example. Now, although all the middle and upper ranks were, with one consent, to leave off whisky or brandy, and take to wine, we do not believe that they would produce much impression upon the class which is presumed to be here at fault. The plain truth is, that, if men are held closely to severe labour, with little exertion of the mental faculties during its continuance, and few intervals of leisure in which to cultivate or exercise those faculties, they will not be prevented from spending a considerable portion of their earnings upon liquor—and this, for the very good reason that it is the most convenient, if not almost the only accessible means of supplying to themselves that mental stimulus which their labour does not afford, and that compensation for a general hardship of condition, which they have no other comforts to alleviate. It is tedious and grinding toil which drives men to this delusive comfort; and so long as they are any where employed, during almost all their waking hours, in a mere exertion of their animal strength, they will be liable to become its victims.

Ungrateful as the truth must be to many workmen, it is not to be concealed that the advance of machinery holds out a prospect of abolishing, in a great measure, the evil here complained of. By far the greater part of the trades and arts are in no danger of having to compete with this powerful rival; but there are many, requiring little but muscular exertion, and unavoidably inducing the degradation of those engaged in them, which must sink, and with the full approbation of society, before its gigantic influence. Now, in the preservation of those arts which require an exertion of ingenuity, there will certainly be preserved a large and comparatively respectable class of workmen—so that the population of the country runs hardly any risk of reduction; while, on the other hand, in the gradual extinction of those arts which brutalize men, there will be nothing to be regretted, provided that the extinction only takes place gradually enough to prevent individual distress for want of a new means of subsistence. In all probability, the increase of employment in the better arts, emigration, and natural deaths, will absorb the superfluous operatives; and thus the change will be achieved with little or even temporary evil. But, whether or not, the change will take place. The general community will then have reason to rejoice that the work, which formerly was executed by men, to the abbreviation of their lives, and the deterioration of both their physical and moral condition—which, in fact, brought into existence numbers who lived and died without even the chance of fulfilling the higher objects of the human creation—is performed by a complication of artificial powers, comprising perhaps many which yet exist as latent bounties in the bosom of nature, and are only to be developed by the ingenuity of a future generation.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS.

In our last, the report of the business of Parliament was brought down to Friday, 22d March, inclusive, when both houses adjourned to the following Monday.

1. NAVY ESTIMATES.—On Monday (25th), Sir James Graham proposed the navy estimates for the year to the whole house in committee. They amounted to L.4,658,134; being, he said, a diminution, as compared with those of last year, of L.220,500. He entered into a long detail of our position in regard to foreign nations, the nature and extent of our colonies, &c., &c., as justifying, although we were now in a condition of perfect peace, the keeping up of our large naval establishment. At present we had a hundred and eighty sail of the line, and altogether five hundred and twenty ships of war. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving, "That there be employed, for the service of the year commencing on the 1st of April 1833, 27,000 men, including 9000 royal marines."

—Sir Edward Codrington, after stating some objections to the manner in which naval pensions were granted, took occasion to refer to some observations made by Sir Robert Peel in the house, five years ago, in reference to some particulars connected with the battle of Navarino, and called upon him for an explanation.—Sir Robert Peel said, that a more extraordinary call had never been made in that house. Five years had elapsed since the statements imputed to him had been made, without the slightest objection having ever been started to them; and he was now called on, without a moment's notice, to substantiate these. He would, however, turn back to his private papers, and other documents, and prepare himself to answer the demand now made.—Mr Hume, after observing that he could not for the soul of him see upon what grounds Ministers could justify the keeping up such an enormous naval force, moved, as an amendment to the motion, that the number of seamen be reduced to 20,000.—Upon a division, there appeared for the amendment, 44; for the original motion, 347. Majority, 303.—On the vote of L.953,220 for the wages of seamen being proposed, Mr Hume moved an amendment that it be reduced by the sum of L.6910, the amount of marine sinecures.—Sir James Graham denied that the offices alluded to were sinecures.—The amendment was supported by Mr O'Connell, Mr Wilks, Mr Briscoe, Mr Gisborne, and Mr O'Dwyer; and it was opposed by Mr Sandford, Mr Robinson, Mr N. Calvert, Colonel Hay, Lord Palmerston, Mr Petre, Sir R. Price, and Lord Ebrington. On a division, the numbers were, for the amendment, 83; against it, 223. Majority for the original vote, 140.—The sum of L.438,004 was then voted for victuals for seamen and marines.

2. PROPERTY TAX.—On Tuesday (26th), Mr Robinson brought forward his motion for the repeal of certain taxes on articles of general consumpt, and the imposition, in lieu thereof, of a tax on property. The hon. gentleman went at great length into the subject,

*Deducting the impression of our Newspaper, which has always been done by machine, the number of sheets to be printed of our publications in Edinburgh, in the space of four weeks, was, and is, very nearly 130,000. The labour of printing a hundred and fifty thousand sheets of paper can easily be imagined.

describing the unequal pressure of our system of taxation, the sufferings of our labouring classes therefrom, the discontent and misery which it generated, &c.; and then proceeded to develop the plan which he proposed to adopt. He should go to the root of the evil, and take £12,000,000 or £14,000,000 of taxes from off the shoulders of the labouring and industrious classes. This sum he would supply by a property tax, but not in addition to the taxes which property at present paid. He should repeal the house and window tax, together with the whole body of assessed taxes, to the amount of £4,000,000. He would remove the duties from cotton, advertisements, newspapers, bricks, tiles, glass, hops, malt, paper, soap, starch, &c. &c. All the taxes which he had stated would form a gross aggregate of £15,720,000. There would be a saving in the collection of those taxes of £500,000. He calculated the increased consumption of sugar at £500,000, looking to the additional quantity which would be used as well in Ireland as in England. He considered that the effect of such a reduction of taxation on the necessities of life would be, to induce the people to spend a good deal of money on various articles, and he should take the increase of revenue thus obtained at £700,000. These three items amounted to £1,700,000, which, deducted from £15,720,000, left a deficiency of £14,000,000; that was the sum which he would raise by a property tax. This tax he proposed should be a graduated one. After some further remarks, the hon. gentleman concluded by moving, "That a select committee be appointed to consider and revise our existing taxation, with the view to a repeal of those burdens which press most heavily on productive industry, and the substitution of an equitable tax on property in lieu thereof."

—Mr Warburton seconded the motion.—Lord Althorp could not agree to the proposition. It was true he had stated in 1830 that he thought a property tax might be fairly adopted; but since then he had had a great deal more experience. He agreed that taxes ought to be placed upon the rich rather than the labouring classes; but he could not see how a property tax would relieve the burdens of the latter. Such a tax was more suited to a period of war than that of peace.—Mr Cobbett and Mr Hume shortly supported the motion.—Mr Poulett Thompson opposed it at great length. If a property tax were imposed to the full extent which honourable gentlemen advised, what would become of the capital of the country? It was said that such a tax would reach absentees; but they would take all their property with them. The total amount of taxes which had been repealed since the war was no less than £34,137,000; there was only £14,000,000 of the revenue now unpledged; and he trusted himself and colleagues had shown no indisposition to economise upon that, as far as they possibly could.—Mr Pease (the Quaker) supported the motion; and, after a reply from Mr Robinson, the house divided, when there appeared, for the motion, 155; against it, 221. Majority against it, 66.

3. SCOTCH ENTAILS BILL.—Same day (26th), these bills, brought in by Mr Kennedy, were read a first time, and the second reading fixed for the 19th April.

4. GOVERNOR DARLING.—On Wednesday (27th), Dr Lushington presented a petition from Captain Robinson, complaining of oppressive and illegal conduct on the part of General Darling, governor of New South Wales. The petitioner prayed that the house would require the minutes of the court-martial to be laid before it, and that an inquiry should be made into the allegations of the petition. The learned gentleman said that on the 23d of May he would move for the production of the papers, when he would go more at length into the details of the case.

5. IRISH DISTURBANCES BILL.—On the same day (27th), the report of this bill was brought up, and several verbal amendments proposed and agreed to.—Mr O'Connell proposed that, in the event of a dissolution of Parliament, the powers of the act be suspended during the elections. Upon a division, this proposal was negatived by a majority of 214 to 72; and three other amendments, suggested by the same gentleman, were negatived without dividing. The report was then agreed to, and the third reading fixed for the following Friday.—On that day (29th), when the bill was brought up, Mr Cobbett again opposed the passing of it at great length, and moved a long amendment, the concluding clause of which was to the effect, that, "suspecting this bill is intended as a prelude to the adoption of similar measures in Great Britain, this house will read this bill this day six months."

Mr Fielden, Sir Samuel Whalley, Mr Hume, and others, supported the amendment.—Mr Ward said the opposition of many members to this bill was purely from factious motives. The honourable member for Bath (Mr Roebuck), for instance, would not hesitate to throw the empire into confusion, in order to verify some of his propositions in the Westminster Review. Whence did the petitions against this bill proceed? From the Political Unions.

—Mr O'Connell asked who was it that, about a year ago, kept Ministers in their places, and carried the great question of reform? Why, these very Political Unions. He had himself seen in the hands of one of the promoters of the Political Unions the franks of one of the Ministers, addressed to various influential members of the Unions throughout the country. Letters were written and sent under those franks, and upon their receipt the movement took place which reinstated the present Ministry. (Continued cheers from the Opposition, and a cry of "Name!") "I will," said the hon. member, "mention the name, if any Minister asks me for it." (Cheers.)—After several other members had spoken, the house divided, when there appeared, for the amendment, 86; against it, 345. Majority for the third reading, 259.—The bill was then read a third time and passed.

On Monday (April 1), the bill was re-introduced, as amended, into the House of Lords, by Earl Grey, who proposed that it should be adopted. He did not consider that any serious objections could be offered to the amendments.—Lord Ellenborough and the Earl of Eldon considered that the alterations in the court-martial clause did away with the main purpose of the bill, and expressed astonishment how Earl Grey could now ask them to annul that which he had so strongly advocated, as indispensably necessary, only a week or two before. Nothing had since occurred in the state of Ireland to justify this alteration in the bill.—Earl Grey and Lord Plunkett contended that the bill was still as efficient as ever—the former adding, that he would not for any earthly consideration give up any essential clause of it.—The Duke of Wellington said that the amendment asserted that which the preamble declared to be impossible, namely, that the common law of the land was sufficient to punish a certain class of political offenders. If it could, then court-martial ought not to be resorted to at all. If it could not (which Ministers at first asserted as being their chief motive for introducing the bill), then the present alteration ought not to be entertained. Ministers were now acting and speaking most inconsistently with their former statements.—After considerable discussion, the amendment, with the others, was ultimately carried, and the bill passed.

6. ARMY ESTIMATES.—On Wednesday (27th), the House of Commons went into a committee of supply, when Sir John C. Hobhouse submitted the army estimates for the year. From a table which he held in his hand, there appeared to be, from 1820 up to the present period, an annual decrease in the army estimates of £276,000. The effective force for this year, rank and file, was 78,500, and of which number there were 23,000 in Ireland. The right hon. gentleman then compared the strength of the standing army in 1793 with that of 1833. In the former year it was 48,843 men, while in this year it amounted to 95,000 men. He then went into a calculation, showing the increase of the population at home and abroad, between 1792 and 1833—which, at home at least, had nearly doubled its number—for the purpose of justifying the increase of the regular force. With respect to a standing army, there could not be the same objection on that score now as had been made when there was a wanton and lavish expenditure, over which the representatives of the people had scarcely any control. The case now was different. The right hon. Baronet concluded by proposing his resolution, "That 89,419 men, exclusive of the military force kept up in the territories of the East India Company, be voted for the service of the year, from the 1st of March 1833, to the 1st of March 1834, both inclusive."—Mr Hume contended for a reduction in the standing army. The effective force of this year would cost more, by £58,000, than at any time under the Wellington administration. He had no doubt the army might safely be reduced to 60,000; but he would only now move that it be restricted to what it was under the Wellington administration, namely, 81,164 men.—After considerable discussion, the original motion was agreed to without a division, on the understanding that a debate and division would take place on the grant for money.

7. CRIMINALS' COUNSEL.—On Thursday (28th), Mr Ewart obtained leave to bring in a bill to allow criminals, in all cases, a full defence by counsel.

8. GAME ACT.—On the same day, Mr Lennard moved for leave to bring in a bill for repealing the seventh clause of the recent game act, and for allowing all tenants to shoot over the lands in their possession. The present act was as injurious to the landlord as to the tenant.—Sir E. Knatchbull seconded the motion, which, after some opposition, was carried.

—Mr Lennard, on Wednesday (17th), moved the second reading of this bill.—Mr Fiske Palmer objected to legislating again on the subject, till the bill of 1831 had had a fair trial.—Mr Horatio Ross moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

—Mr Lamb opposed the bill.—The house divided.—For the amendment, 43; for the second reading, 29. Majority against the bill, 14.

9. LAW OF LIBEL.—On the same day, Sir Francis Vincent obtained leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the law of libel—particularly that part of it which compelled the publishers of pamphlets to enter into bonds and find collateral securities—and to do away with ex officio informations, substituting action or indictments, &c. &c.

10. OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH.—On Friday (29th), Sir Andrew Agnew presented about twenty petitions from various places and bodies in England and Scotland, in favour of the bill for enforcing the better observance of the Sabbath.—Mr Beaumont (member for Northumberland) said he was of opinion that there was much cant and hypocrisy in these petitions, and should move an amendment to the title of the bill, which he should designate "a bill for the better promotion of cant."—Mr

Potter, Mr O'Connell, Mr Cobbett, and others, followed in the same strain.—Mr Cullar Ferguson, Mr A. Johnstone, Sir A. Hope, and others, strongly reprobated the using of such terms as most unwarrantable, and insulting equally to the hon. Baronet (Sir A. Agnew) and the large and respectable bodies of persons from whom the petitions in favour of his bill emanated.

11. NEGRO EMANCIPATION.—In the House of Lords, on Thursday (March 28th), Lord Suffield, on presenting several petitions in favour of the abolition of slavery, said that great consternation had arisen in the public mind, in consequence of certain rumours regarding the plan of emancipation said to be entertained by government. Nothing but total and immediate emancipation, he said, would satisfy the country; at the same time, he begged to observe, that the term "immediate" did not mean that the slaves should be at once liberated on the sending out of a dispatch or the sailing of a ship, but at the earliest possible period there should take place a substitution of legal restraint for the present absolute and irresponsible power of the slave-master. The petition he should first present came from the city of Edinburgh, and was signed by 21,291 persons.—Earl Grey was glad to hear the explanation of his noble friend, of the term "immediate." The question was one of great difficulty, and he could only assure the house that government was applying itself to its consideration with the utmost anxiety. He would state, however, that he was not prepared to adopt any plan for absolute and immediate emancipation.—In the House of Commons, on Thursday (18th), Mr Stanley obtained leave for postponing the motion relative to the proposed government plan of emancipation, which had been fixed for the 23d April, to the 14th of May.

12. CHURCH REFORM BILL.—In the House of Commons on Monday (April 1st), on Lord Althorp moving that the house resolve itself into a committee on the Irish temporalties bill, Mr A. Johnstone brought under their consideration the oath taken by Catholic members of that house, and their right to vote on questions affecting the interests of the Protestant church. He believed it was a Catholic principle that "Catholics were not bound to keep faith with heretics;" and concluded by moving, that the oath contained in the Catholic relief bill be read.—Mr O'Connell said, the calumnies of the hon. member were too ridiculous to be noticed, and had been refuted and ridiculed a thousand times. They (the Catholics) came into the house upon the same footing and with the same privileges as Protestants. They did not ask for more, but they would not take less.

—Lord Althorp acknowledged the right of Catholics to vote and speak upon every question that came before the house. A proposition to introduce a clause into the Catholic relief bill, prohibiting members of that creed interfering in such matter was rejected.—The house then resolved itself into a committee, when Lord Althorp re-detailed his plan of reform in the temporalties of the Irish church which he had formerly explained to the house.—(Vide our Parliamentary reports in our March and April numbers. It will be recollected that this measure has been delayed to the present time, in consequence of an informality in the mode of its introduction.) There was but one alteration. That as church-cess was to be abolished by the bill, the cess of this year should not be collected, to provide for which government would make an advance. The new resolution refer only to those portions of the bill, which, involving matters of taxation, constitute it a money bill, and, consequently, according to the usages of the house, rendered it indispensable to obtain the preliminary sanction of a committee. The fiscal characteristics of the bill, as embodied in Lord Althorp's three resolutions, were, 1st, the power of conferring salaries on the ecclesiastical commissioners; 2d, levying an annual assessment on bishops and benefices for ecclesiastical purposes; and, 3d, of abolishing vestry assessments for the same purpose. His Lordship then moved the first resolution, that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland be empowered to appoint commissioners to ascertain the value of the church temporalties of Ireland.—Mr Ecfroy said he had received a great many letters from the highest ecclesiastical and other authorities, expressive of extreme apprehension of the consequences of this measure. The hon. gentleman then went into a long argument demonstrating its danger, impolicy, and injustice to the rights of the church to the property it possessed &c. The Protestant clergy of Ireland held the titles, their property, upon the same tenure, and other, than private individuals held their property, and he would ask whether it was a principle of constitutional legislation to take it away, in the manner proposed, from the former, any more than from the latter. This act not only violated the coronation oath but also directly violated that act of the legislature under which the union of the two countries and the crown was established.—Sir John Hanmer followed on the same side.—Mr Shiel, Mr Gillon, and others, asserted the right of Parliament to interfere with church property. The latter gentleman remarked, that the church establishment altogether was most repugnant to common sense, and ought to be abolished. It ought to be recollected that the clergy were the most strenuous opponents of reform, and thought the revenues for paying them might be paid to much more beneficial purposes. He would move a clause in the progress of the bill, enacting, that after the death of the present incumbents, the property of the church should revert to the state. If people wished bishops, let them maintain them themselves.—A long and animated discussion ensued, in which Sir Robert Inglis, Sir Robert Peel, Mr Finch, and others, opposed the resolutions, which were defended by Mr Macaulay and Lord John Russell, when the debate was adjourned.—Next day (Tuesday, 2d), it was resumed, and Lord Althorp, in reply to the speech of Sir Robert Peel, observed, that the argument of the latter against taxing the present incumbents had great weight, and should receive the serious consideration of government.—After various other members had spoken, the resolutions were ultimately agreed to.

13. JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.—On Tuesday (2d), this bill, which, amongst other provisos, renders the L.10 freeholders and L.15 leaseholders in Ireland eligible as jurymen, was, after considerable opposition, read a second time.—Next day it passed through the committee, with several verbal amendments; and, on Thursday, the report was received.

14. MINISTERS AND THE POLITICAL UNIONS.—On Tuesday (2d), Sir J. Tyrell asked Lord Althorp whether there was any truth in the statement that one of his Majesty's Ministers had franked fifty letters to the Political Unions, to excite them to a manifestation in favour of the present administration, when they were likely to be obliged to retire from office?—Lord Althorp replied, he had that morning asked Earl Grey whether there was any truth in the statement, and the noble Earl had assured him, that if any franks had been given at the time referred to, they must have been given by his private secretary, Mr C. Wood.—Mr Wood rose and said, if any such thing had taken place, the blame must be imputed to himself; but he never had given a frank to a member of a Political Union, knowing him to be so, nor acknowledged the receipt of petitions and addresses, as coming from such bodies.

15. POOR LAWS IN IRELAND.—On the same day, a desultory conversation arose on the subject of poor laws, upon Lord Althorp's tabling various extracts from the minutes of evidence taken before the committee on the subject.—Mr O'Connell observed, that some statements of his, in reference to this question, had been misunderstood, and he now begged decidedly to say, that he could not acquiesce in any proposal of poor laws for Ireland. Amidst all her misfortunes, this was an evil which his country had yet escaped.—Mr Richards, Sir E. Knatchbull, Colonel Wood, and Mr Grattan, spoke in favour of poor laws.—Mr Hume, Lord J. Russell, Mr Pease, and Sir Robert Peel, expressed themselves decidedly against them.

16. FLOGGING IN THE ARMY.—On the same day, after the report of the mutiny bill being brought up, and the amendments agreed to, Mr Hume, after commenting at great length on the brutality and impolicy of the present system of military flogging, said he hoped Ministers would now carry into effect what they had so often and strenuously advocated when out of office—namely, the substitution of another mode of punishment. He concluded by moving the introduction of a clause into the act to that effect.—A long and animated discussion followed, in which Mr R. Grant, Lord Althorp, Sir J. Byng, and Lord Palmerston, resisted the motion, on the ground that the testimony of the oldest and most experienced officers proved that it was impossible to maintain proper discipline in the army without flogging.—Mr O'Connell, Mr Shiel, and others, contended that officers were not competent judges of the question.—Other members suggested, that, if not abolished entirely, flogging should only be reserved as an ultimatum remedium.—Upon a division, there appeared, for the motion, 140; against it, 151. Majority against it, 11.

17. CHURCH (OF SCOTLAND) PATRONAGE.—On Wednesday (3d), Mr Sinclair (member for Caithness) postponed his motion relative to church patronage in Scotland to the 4th of June.—On the same day, various petitions from parishes and public bodies in Scotland were presented to the house by Mr Cullar Ferguson and Mr Ewing, praying for an alteration or entire abolition of the present system. The former gentleman stated his belief that it was the prime cause of "dissenting" in Scotland, and that it had estranged one-fourth of the whole population from the church. The number of petitions to the same effect, which have been presented since the opening of the session to the date of our publication, amount to about a hundred. On the 17th ultimo alone, no fewer than thirty-five were laid on the table.

18. FACTORY BILL.—Wednesday (3d), Mr Wilson Patten presented petitions from Preston, Blackburn, and Rochdale, for a commission to inquire into the state of labour in cotton factories, the prayer of which he supported, and introduced a motion to the same effect, of which he had given notice early in the session. It was with no design, he said, of defeating the bill of his noble friend, Lord Ashley, which was recommended by every appearance of justice and humanity, but the master-manufacturers had not been fairly dealt with. They had not been allowed to produce evidence before the committee in their own defence and exculpation, and he had himself seen letters to parties in the country, cautioning them not to send up witnesses that would state any thing prejudicial to the bill. He therefore moved an address to his Majesty, praying the appointment of a commission for the above purpose.—Lord Ashley opposed the motion. The case had been before Parliament for forty years, and every bill brought forward for the relief of the children had continually been met with a cry for further investigation. He contended that the whole case rested on the medical evidence, which was quite decisive of the necessity of the measure he advocated.—A very lengthened and warm debate followed, and many arguments and facts were brought forward on both sides in support of their respective views; the advocates for the commission contending that the evidence as yet brought forward was entirely on one side, and was grossly partial and exaggerated; while its opponents contended that the sole object of it was to delay and defeat the bill.—Upon a division, there appeared, for the motion, 74; against it, 72. Majority in favour of the motion, 2.—Upon the result being declared, Lord Ashley observed, that, as he considered his bill as lost, he trusted the members of the commission to be appointed would be of such high and correct character, and competent ability for the task, as to be above all suspicion.—Mr Spring Rice assured the noble Lord that the utmost care should be taken in the appointment.—(The inquiry into the condition of the factory children is to be conducted, it is understood, by five commissions, four of which will proceed into the manufacturing districts, and the fifth remain in London, to receive the reports from the four travelling commissions, and to lay the substance of those reports from time to time before Parliament. Each of the commissions to be sent into the country is to consist of three members, one of whom is to be a medical man. The districts to which the commissions will proceed are, Gloucestershire and North Wiltshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire, the West Riding of Yorkshire, and the manufacturing district round Glasgow and Belfast. The commissioners have the power of examining witnesses on oath; and they are specially instructed to prosecute their labours with such diligence as to permit Parliament to legislate on the question during the present session.)

19. EASTER HOLIDAYS.—On Thursday (4th), both houses, at rising, adjourned to the 15th, on account of the Easter holidays.

20. CRIMINAL LAWS.—Friday (19th), Lord Lyndhurst moved for returns of certain documents regarding the operation of the late alterations in the criminal laws. By the result of certain trials in which he had been recently engaged, it appeared to him that the laws in certain cases were unduly harsh and severe, and in others that they operated most unfairly in respect to the magnitude of the crimes. A case occurred to him during the last summer assizes, where he had to try a cottager for stealing a lamb. This person had to mind a large flock of sheep, one of which dropped a lamb, which was lost. A lamb from a neighbour's flock strayed into that which the cottager had the care of; he took it, and represented it to his master as the same lamb he had lost. For this he was taken and tried, and he (Lord Lyndhurst) felt it incumbent to transport him for life, just as if he had stolen the whole flock. The alteration in the law left him no other alternative, though there was no similarity as to the extent of the crime. As he had cited a case of sheep-stealing, he would mention one of housebreaking. A number of professed thieves confederated together—they armed themselves with all the implements of housebreakers—they took an empty house near a rich warehouse; the contiguity of the houses facilitated their entrance into the warehouse, out of which they took an immense quantity of valuable property, and made their escape. The case was an atrocious one, and ought to be punished with the utmost severity; yet these housebreakers would not be more severely punished than the hungry wretch who, pressed by famine, lifted the latch of a baker's door, and stole from his shop a loaf of bread. This last case constituted housebreaking as well as the former, and was consequently subject to the punishment of transportation for life.—Lord Melbourne said, any suggestions from the noble and learned Baron would be thankfully received; and the motion was agreed to.—In the Commons, Mr Leonard obtained leave to bring in a bill for abolishing the punishment of death for breaking into and stealing from dwelling-houses to any amount whatever. In making his motion, the hon. gentleman grounded his arguments on the fact, that the severity of the present laws deterred juries from convicting, and the persons robbed from coming forward to prosecute; thus indirectly encouraging crime.

21. NAVY ESTIMATES.—On Monday (15th), Sir J. Graham, on rising to move for a vote for the Admiralty, observed, it gave him great pleasure to announce, that, notwithstanding the reductions made last year, amounting to L.7000, in his department, there had been a further reduction effected, amounting to L.17,000, besides L.5000 which had been heretofore charged in the shape of fees; making altogether a saving of L.29,000.—Upon the resolution being put by the chairman, that L.104,070 be granted to defray the salaries of officers and contingent expenses of the Admiralty Office, to the 31st March 1834, Mr Hume said, the saving effected by the right hon. Baronet was by no means commensurate with the expectations of the country.—The grant was then agreed to, as were the following:—L.21,725 for the salaries of officers and contingent expenses of the Navy Pay Office; L.22,109 for the scientific department of the navy; L.114,970, for expenses of naval establishments at home, and L.23,422 for those abroad; with L.438,426 for wages of persons employed in the former, and L.26,905 for persons employed in the latter; L.423,000 for naval stores; and L.63,700 for changes and improvements in the dock-yards.—Upon the motion that L.871,858 be granted for the half-pay of officers and marines, Mr Hume objected to the amount, and observed, that the vacancies which occurred in the service ought to be filled up with officers on the half-pay list.—Sir Edward Codrington said, that such a plan, if adopted, would fill our ships, not with young and efficient officers, but men worn out in the service. So far from the half-pay list being too large, its scantiness was a disgrace to the country; and yet half-pay officers were not allowed to eke out their paltry incomes by engaging in other occupations. He particularly pointed out the injustice which was done to pursers, who, after serving thirty years, were only entitled to a pension of 3s. a-day.—Sir James Graham said, the Admiralty were placed between two fires, in being exposed to the calls for retrenchment and reduction by the hon. member for Middlesex, and the appeals of the hon. and gallant admiral.—The resolution was then agreed to, as were also the following votes:—L.533,403 for military pensions and allowances; L.220,342 for civil pensions and allowances; L.200,800 for freight of ships for the transport of troops and stores; L.118,300 for the conveyance of convicts to New South Wales.

22. CHURCH (OF ENGLAND) REFORM.—On Tuesday (16th), Mr Faithful rose to submit his promised motion in reference to the established church of England. His proposition was divided into three heads, each involving a separate principle of great public importance. The first was, that the church of England, as by law established, was not recommended by practical utility; the second, that its revenues have always been subject to legislative enactments; and, thirdly, that the greater part, if not the whole of these revenues, ought to be appropriated to the relief of the nation. The resolution was not brought forward by him in any spirit of prejudice or hostility to the church of England—far from it. The adherents to that church might have their archbishops and their bishops, in all their worldly humility and habits of usefulness, so like the apostles and first teachers of Christianity, and their archdeacons, and their deans, and their prebendaries, and their canons, and their minor canons, and all the rest of their overworked and underpaid functionaries, as long as they liked; all he asked was, that, to maintain those gentlemen, no man should be compelled to pay for the support of a clergyman of whose communion he was not a member. This was all he asked; he would not be content with less. The hon. member proceeded, at considerable length, to state the grounds on which he founded these propositions.—Mr Cobbett seconded the motion.—Lord Althorp said, that the house would hardly expect that he should answer the speech of the hon. member. He should therefore not detain the house by attempting to enter into a discussion, which, however it might suit a polemical assembly, was hardly fit for the consideration of that house.—After some remarks by other members, the motion was negatived without a division.—(The observations of Lord Althorp were loudly and generally cheered in the house.)

23. SAVINGS BANKS.—On the same day, Lord Althorp obtained leave to bring in a bill (which was, the same evening, introduced and read a first time) to enable persons to purchase small annuities through the means of the savings banks. The noble Lord said that the object of the measure was to place it in the power of the labouring classes, through the means of the savings banks, to purchase government annuities so low as L.20 a-year. It was proposed by this bill, taking a person between the ages of twenty and thirty, that by paying 6s. a-month into the savings bank as an instalment, he should, on arriving at the age of sixty, be entitled to an annuity of L.20 a-year. From calculations which had been made, it appeared that the government would lose nothing by this arrangement, and it was one that might be attended with much advantage to the industrious classes.—Mr T. Attwood complained of the expense of savings banks to the country, which, he said, were delusive in their operation, and were not applied to the purposes they professed to be.

24. BURGH (SCOTCH) REFORM.—On the same day, Mr Kennedy, in the absence of the Lord Advocate, who was prevented from attending by indisposition, obtained leave to bring in the following bills, of which that learned Lord had given notice some time ago:—“A bill to provide for the appointment and election of magistrates and councillors for the several burghs and towns of Scotland which now return, or contribute to return, members to Parliament, and are not royal burghs, towns, and places in Scotland which send no representatives to Parliament, and are not royal burghs; also a bill to regulate and diminish the annuity tax now levied on the city of Edinburgh, and to take away the exemption of members of the College of Justice from payment of the said annuity tax, and the assessments for the poor; also a bill to empower his Majesty to issue a commission for inquiring into the condition of the several royal burghs, and other burghs and towns in Scotland, and reporting what may be fit to be done for their improvement, and the correction of any defects or abuses that may be found to exist."

25. RECEIPT STAMP ACT.—On Wednesday (17th), Mr J. A. Murray presented to the house a petition from the merchants, traders, and other inhabitants of Leith, for an alteration in the receipt stamp act. The petitioners described the law, as it at present existed, as unequal in principle, immoral in its tendency, grievous in its operation, and unproductive to the revenue. The subject excited great interest in Scotland; the stamps, particularly in small transactions, were there felt to be an intolerable grievance, and he hoped government would turn their serious attention to the matter, with the view of either altogether remitting the tax, or placing it on a new and more equitable footing.—Similar petitions have since been sent from Edinburgh, Dumfries, and other places.

26. EMANCIPATION OF THE JEWS.—On the same day, after the presentation of various petitions for the removal of the disabilities affecting the Jews (one of these, from the city of London, signed by upwards of 17,000 individuals, including the most eminent bankers, merchants, tradesmen, &c. in the metropolis), Mr R. Grant moved that the house resolve itself into a committee for considering the subject, preparatory to the introduction of a measure of relief. The motion was agreed to without one dissentient voice, and the hon. mover then entered at great length into the question, demonstrating the injustice of withholding the rights and privileges of British citizens from a body of people who, whether for number, wealth, respectability, or loyalty, were fully as much entitled to these as any class of men in the nation. They were equally interested in the welfare of the nation, and in the administration of law and justice. If it was inquired whether, with the introduction of Jews into the house, it would still be a Christian Parliament, he would answer, that it would be still as Christian in name, and more Christian in spirit. The honourable gentleman concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That it is expedient to remove the civil disabilities at present existing under the laws against his Majesty's subjects professing the Jewish religion, in the same manner as the disabilities had been removed from his Majesty's Catholic subjects."—Sir Robert Inglis resisted the motion, not from religious, but political motives. He saw no point where they could stop, when they came to begin the system of abolishing oaths as qualifications for political situations, short of that which seemed to be approved of by the hon. member for Middlesex, viz.—the abolition of all oaths whatever. He would ask whether there ever had existed a single community in which oaths were not considered necessary for the support of the civil establishment? The question was—whether they were prepared to get rid of all religious sanction, as a motive to influence human action? Was the house prepared to declare that it was not necessary for persons to be Christians, in order to become members of that assembly?—Mr Macaulay replied to Sir Robert Inglis in a speech of uncommon eloquence, which was loudly cheered throughout. In supporting the motion, he conceived he was consulting the true interests of Christianity. All history proved that Christianity had every thing to dread with persecution for her ally, and nothing to fear with it for her foe. "Might that religion continue long a blessing to the world, strong in its lessons of philosophy—strong in its examples of morality—strong in those evidences to which the most acute and comprehensive human intellects have surrendered themselves, the last consolation of those who had outlived all earthly hope, and the last restraint of those who were above earthly fear! but let not Christians violate the first precepts of their faith, by fighting the battle of truth with the weapons of error, and supporting, by a partial and oppressive system, a religion, whose noblest distinction was, that it first taught the human race the lesson of universal charity."—After a few words in explanation from Sir Robert Inglis, the motion was agreed to without a dissentient voice, and amid loud cheers.—On Thursday (18th), the report of the committee was brought up, and a bill ordered to be prepared, in terms of the resolution.—On Friday (19th), the bill was introduced and read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on the 1st of May.

27. PROCLAMATION OF KILKENNY.—On Wednesday (17th), Mr O'Connell called the notice of the house to the fact of Kilkenny county and city having already been proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as he thought without sufficient cause; and moved for copies of all proclamations and orders issued by his Lordship, and other papers and documents.—After a few words in reply from Sir J. C. Hobhouse, the motion was negatived without a division.

28. COMMUTATION OF TITHES.—On Thursday (18th), Lord Althorp moved for leave to bring in a bill for the general commutation of tithes. Before going into the question, he thought it right to explain certain facts regarding the revenues of the church, about which much exaggeration and delusion was abroad. On a late occasion it had been asserted that the church property amounted to L.9,000,000 a-year.

The fact was, that the net income of all the bishops, including the Bishop of Sodor and Man, was only L.158,527. The incomes of all the deans and chapters together amounted to L.236,358. The income of the parochial clergy did not exceed L.3,000,000. The whole income of the clergy, therefore, did not exceed L.3,500,000, instead of L.9,000,000. That sum, equally divided, would give to each clergyman about L.285 a-year. If to that they added the income of the prebends, and the deans and chapters, the average income of each clergyman would be about L.300 a-year. He thought, that, in the present circumstances of this country, which, in many respects, was different from other countries, no gentleman would consider that a very extravagant income to devote to the support of a national church. His Lordship then proceeded to detail the propositions in his intended measure, which were founded on the principle of a contrast between the tithe-payer and the tithe-owner for a corn rent in lieu of tithes, to be varied at certain periods of the year according to the average of the fluctuations. Each (the payer and receiver) is to select a valuator from a body of valuers, an equal number of which are to be nominated by the bishop of the diocese and the magistrates of the quarter sessions.—After a few words from Mr Hume, objecting to several of the propositions, and from Sir R. Peel, Mr Baring, and Sir M. W. Ridley, in commendation of the measure, the motion was agreed to, without any opposition.

29. SINECURES.—On the same evening, Mr Hume brought forward a motion on the subject, and entered into a lengthened figurative statement of their character and amount. It was not going too far, he said, to assert that one-half of the national debt had been created by the payment of sinecures. After eulogizing the Marquis Camden for the noble manner in which he had resigned the profits of his sinecure office, amounting to L.23,117 per annum, to the public treasury, he proceeded to mention some of the sinecures at present existing, as follows:—Clerk of Idiot, L.963—Clerk of the Hanaper, held by two young ladies, daughters of an Earl, L.2070—Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, Earl Bathurst, L.1103—Clerk of the King's Bench, Lord Ellenborough, L.7905—Keeper of the Seals in the Court of Common Pleas, the Duke of Grafton, L.2286—Registrar of Affidavits in Chancery, Hon. W. H. Scott, L.1816—Pateente of Bankrupts, Lord Thurlow, L.8502—Keeper of the Hanaper, Lord Thurlow, L.1192—Chancellor of Scotland, the Earl of Rosslyn, L.1712—Clerk in Chancery, held for his children, the Earl of Rosslyn, L.925. He asked the house whether such a system ought to be continued at a time when government were discharging labourers from the public establishments? The honourable member then read his resolutions; namely, first, "that, on all future vacancies of sinecure offices, at home and abroad, no new appointment shall be made, nor any salary, allowances, or emoluments granted." The second resolution was, "that no person shall receive an appointment to any situation to which emolument was attached, the duties of which were to be performed by deputy."—Lord Althorp said he would agree most readily to the substance of the motion; but as Lord Ebrington intended to move a committee of inquiry into military offices, (which, so far from opposing, he had himself suggested the addition of naval offices), he wished the hon. member not to interfere with that motion.—Mr Hume having agreed to alter his resolution accordingly, the motion was agreed to without any opposition.—Another resolution, proposed by Mr Hume, was objected to by Lord Althorp as unconstitutional, and was withdrawn.

30. THE BUDGET.—On Friday (19th), Lord Althorp made his annual financial statement to the house, which he introduced by a review of the course pursued by himself and colleagues in the management of the revenue, the reforms introduced, the savings effected, &c. &c. The last Ministry had repealed L.4,000,000 of taxes; the present had already (including those now proposed to be taken off) repealed about L.3,000,000. The latter, too, had abolished 1387 places, the salaries of which amounted to L.231,400 per annum. The immediate saving in this branch is L.193,000. His Lordship calculated the surplus revenue for the current year at L.1,572,000. The taxes he meant now to remit or reduce would amount to L.1,349,000, and were as follows:—

The whole of the present duty on tiles, estimated at	L.37,000
On advertisements the duty to be reduced from 3s. 6d. to 2s. for the first insertion, 1s. 6d. for the second, and 1s. for the third	75,000
Marine Insurances.—The duty on foreign policies to be reduced to 1s. 3d. when the premium is under 15s., and when under 30s. to be 2s. 6d., above 30s. the present duty to continue	100,000
Assessed Taxes.—The duty on houses to remain as at present. The window duty on all shops, storerooms, and warerooms, to be taken off, and where houses and shops are together, one-third of the window and house duties to be repealed	244,000
On raw cotton the duty of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per lb., which was laid on in 1831, is to be repealed, and the former ad valorem duty of five-eighths of a penny per pound to be reduced one-half	L.300,000

On soap the duty is to be reduced one-half	593,000

L.1,349,000

His Lordship, however, calculated that there would be a return, from the increase of consumption on soap, to the amount of L.293,000, which would reduce the probable loss to the revenue, to L.1,056,000, which deducted from the estimated surplus on the year, of L.1,572,000, would still leave a surplus of revenue of L.516,000. Having made his statement, his Lordship said he declined entering into any arguments in favour of it, but would leave it entirely in the hands of the house, which he hoped would be satisfied at least with his anxiety to grant every possible relief to the country. His Lordship sat down amid very general cheering.—Mr Hume said he did not object to the reductions as far as they went; but they ought he said, to have been carried much farther. He could tell the noble Lord, that the country would not be satisfied with his paltry commutations of tithes and taxes. He then alluded to the malt and other taxes which he hoped the house would insist on having reduced, or abolished.—Sir Robert Peel said, that upon the whole, he approved of the noble Lord's propositions. His only doubt was—and he cared not if this statement were unpopular or not—if the noble Lord had not gone too far in the way of reduction. Of this, however, he was sure, that in order to maintain public credit, the principle of reduction had been carried far enough, and he for one would not push his Majesty's government to carry it any farther.—After various observations from other members, the resolution was agreed to.

Foreign News.

UNITED STATES.

THE storm which so lately threatened the total disruption of this immense republic, has, it would appear, fairly blown over, for a time at least. We stated in our last that Mr Clay had introduced into Congress a bill for modifying the provisions of the obnoxious tariff, which had excited so much ire and apprehension throughout the southern states of the Union. Subsequent arrivals have brought intelligence of the passing of this bill on the 25th of February, by a majority of 118 to 85. The bill was carried by direct coalition between the southern and western states, against the north, east, and the middle states, which was found irresistible. As usual, the great body of the members for the south sunk all minor differences among themselves, when the struggle came to be, as they supposed, between the north and south. One member from Virginia voted with the manufacturing interest: with that solitary exception every vote south of Ohio was given for the reduced scale of duties. Since the passing of the act, the South Carolina convention, for organizing resistance to the enforcement of the tariff, has given a proof of its disposition to reconciliation, by repealing its nullifying ordinances, and ceasing its functions. The unionists, or government party, have also formally dissolved their association.

Notwithstanding, however, this happy termination to the late perilous rupture, and apparently cordial reunion of the states, it is impossible even for the warmest admirers of the American system of government to avoid seeing that there is a radical flaw in its construction, which may at some future period and perhaps very speedily, lead to its total downfall. In fact, the bill of surrender, as that just passed may aptly be called, is, we believe, looked upon as a virtual abandonment of the American system as hitherto understood. And this advent, we suspect, must almost of necessity be practically recognised and acted on sooner or later, presuming the republic to go on in increasing as it has hitherto done, in point of population, and territorial wealth and extent.

TURKEY.

WE are utterly at a loss what to think or say relative to the important transactions now going on in the East. Every day brings us intelligence that completely upsets the news of the day before; and it not unfrequently happens, that two dispatches of the most opposite character possible, from different quarters of the globe, are brought at the same moment. One account stated that Mehemet Ali had made definite proposals to the beleaguered Sultan, which was calculated the latter, with the concurrence of the European powers, would accept. Another, that the Sultan had offered terms to his former vassal, which the latter had rejected with indignation, and that Ibrahim was in full march for Constantinople, when he would arrive before it was possible for either Russia, France, or Britain, to interpose a barrier to his victorious career. A later dispatch informed that the Russian fleet had taken possession of the Dardanelles, and that 10,000 Russian troops were in actual occupation of Constantinople. And, lastly, the Paris papers of Tuesday (April 25) contain intelligence of the acceptance by the Sultan of the terms of peace offered by the Pacha of Egypt. It is stated that the Sultan, after consulting all the Ministers of the Great Powers assembled at Constantinople, and finding that none of them would guarantee an effectual assistance to stop the progress the Egyptian army, had been compelled to accept the terms proposed. This intelligence is extracted from the Wurtemberg Gazette, and is given on the authority of a private letter, received by express, from Constantinople.—We must leave our readers to draw their own conclusions from these conflicting news, wishing to give any further intelligence which may arrive, in our Postscript. One important fact, at all events, is certain, that Mehemet Ali has unequivocally rejected the proffered treaty drawn up under the direction of the French Admiral, Roussin, and the terms of his answer will give our readers a better idea of his character and present views of the successful Pacha, than any language of our own.

M. L'Ambassadeur—I have received the dispatch, of Feb. 22, which you have forwarded to me by your principal aide-de-camp.

This dispatch intimates that I have no right to claim another territory than St Jean d'Acre, Jerusalem, Nablous, and Tripoli, in Syria, and that I ought immediately to withdraw my army; and that in case of refusal I shall expose myself to the most serious consequences. Your aide-camp, according to the instructions which you have given him, has added verbally, that if I persist in my pretensions, the combined French and English fleets will proceed to the coast of Egypt.

Pray (de grace), M. L'Ambassadeur, how have you thought to call on me to sacrifice myself thus?

I have in my favour the whole nation. It only rests with me to raise up Rumelia and Anatolia. United with my nation, I could effect much. Master of so many victories—victorious at all points—when I heard the decree of public opinion decree to me the possession of Syria, I retarded the march of my troops, with the view of sparing a useless effusion of blood, and consulting the dispositions of European policy. In recompense for this, and for the moderation which I have shown, and after so many sacrifices for a nation which has invited me, which had united itself with me, and asked me to obtain so many victories—to demand of me the abandonment of the country which I occupy, and that I shall withdraw my army into a small province composed of four districts which you call Pachalies, without this pronouncing against me a sentence of political death?

But I feel confident that France and England will do me justice. They will acknowledge my rights. My honour is opposed to this step. But if, unhappily, I am wholly deceived in this expectation, I will submit myself, under such circumstances, to the will of God, and preferring an honourable death to ignominy, joyfully devote myself for the cause of my nation, happy to contribute to it the last breath of my life. Upon this I am determined, and history offers more than one example of similar immolation.

Under all circumstances, I hope that your Excellency will recognise the justice of my rights, and recommend acceptance of the last propositions which I have made through the medium of his Excellency Halil Pacha. It is with this expectation, M. L'Ambassadeur, that I enclose you this friendly letter, and forward it through the hands of your aide-de-camp.

Alexandria, March 8, 1833.”

The French Ministry have explicitly disavowed to the Russian ambassador at Paris, all connivance with the proceedings of Admiral Roussin, who, it seems, has been acting solely upon his own judgment and responsibility. The Sultan, it is said, is becoming day more unpopular amongst his subjects, as always the case in Turkey during periods of adversity, and it seems not unlikely that he may resort to the usual mode of giving vent to his irritated feelings on such occasions, by cutting off his head, unless the European powers interfere in his behalf.

GERMANY.

Violent riots, attended with considerable loss of life, took place at Frankfort on the 4th ultimo. Great excitement has prevailed in that capital, as indeed throughout most parts of the nation, since the promulgation of the well-known decrees at the late sitting of the Diet. The restrictions laid on the press, in a particular manner, to have excited the indignation of the people, which ultimately broke out in open tumult on the evening of the above day, in consequence of a rumour having gone abroad that the Diet further contemplated a suspension of the meeting of the Chambers for five years. The people seized the principal guard-house, dispersed the soldiers, and, it would appear, were at one time in complete possession of the city; but they were ultimately dispersed, and tranquillity restored, although not until a severe and bloody struggle. There are rumours of tumults having taken place in other parts of Germany, and it is said that the palace of the Duke of Saxe, at Bierberich, has been burnt to the ground. There is evidently great excitement at present prevailing, and the apprehensions of the Germanic despots cannot be traced in the activity with which they are organising and distributing their military force over their territories. It is probably in Germany that the next united and decisive popular movement of liberal institutions will take place.

SPAIN.

An important change has taken place in the composition of affairs at the Spanish court since our last. We have informed our readers that the queen had triumphed over the apostolical, or church party, headed by Don Carlos, who, with his princess and a retinue of adherents, had set sail for Portugal. But it would now appear that she had only been a mere instrument in the hands of others in the matter; and that, whilst she imagined herself forwarding her own interests, and, indeed, almost within reach of the supreme power, she had in fact only been clearing the way for the advancement of others. Scarcely had Don Carlos and the Princess of Beira left Madrid, when the Ministers of Finance, of Justice, and of Marine, all of them friends of the queen, and men of liberal politics, were dismissed from their respective offices, and their place filled up by partisans of Bermudez, who may be termed the Metternich of Spain. This revolution in the Spanish cabinet was quite unexpected, and is reckoned a decisive blow for the present to the hopes of the “Liberal” party, as, besides his absolute principles, Zea Bermudez is acknowledged to be a man of consummate talent and undoubted firmness. The first act of the successful Minister was to promulgate a decree, under the royal authority, convoking the Cortes for the 20th June, and ordering a general oath of fidelity to be taken to the Infanta Donna Maria Elizabeth Louisa, as the hereditary Princess of Spain, and successor to her father. It is stated that Ferdinand, aware of his precarious state, mental and bodily, has made his will, and arranged all things relative to the succession. One of the clauses of his will is, that his daughter shall marry Don Carlos' eldest son, when she arrives at thirteen years of age. Another appoints Queen Christina regent of the kingdom during the princess's minority, and her guardian; and a third provides, that the Cortes shall be immediately convoked after his death, to appoint the Council of Regency, &c. It is said that these arrangements, together with the result of the late struggle, have given very general satisfaction throughout the kingdom, and that Spain has seldom, if ever, had a fairer prospect of a long period of internal peace and unanimity.

PORTUGAL.

The prospects of Don Pedro, and the situation of his adherents in Oporto, appear to be getting daily worse and worse. Miguel still continues his system of close blockade, by which the supplies of provisions to the besieged are rendered scanty, and procured with difficulty. A quarrel has also taken place between Don Pedro and Sartorius, the admiral of the constitutional fleet. In consequence of repeated and angry remonstrances from the latter, complaining not only of the non-payment of the seamen's wages, and other supplies for the support of the fleet, but of the continual thwarting of his plans and movements by Don Pedro, the latter had taken so much umbrage, that, on the 25th of March, he sent Sir John M. Doyle on board to arrest him, along with a Captain Crosbie, the latter of whom was directed to take the command of the squadron. Instead of submitting, however, Sartorius immediately arrested Sir John and Captain Crosbie, and wrote a most indignant letter to Don Pedro, defending his whole conduct since he took command of the squadron; enumerating the many personal sacrifices he had made for the sake of the constitutional cause, and concluding by threatening, that if the arrears to the ships' companies were not immediately paid up (the delay in which was occasioning almost daily mutinies in the fleet), he would quit the service with the squadron, and have recourse to the individuals who entered into contract with him for all such claims as the officers and men were entitled to. In the event of Don Pedro satisfying these claims, Sartorius declares his willingness to surrender the command of the squadron to any one whom the former may depute. What Don Pedro means to do, in this dilemma, is not very clear, and we suspect it is out of his power to help himself, as all the efforts of his agents in this country to raise a loan have been unsuccessful. This contrasts strongly with the fact that little difficulty was found lately in raising a loan in London of £50,000, for the behoof of Don Miguel, and affords a pretty satisfactory proof of the credit in which the respective causes of the two brothers stand, amongst those who are in general pretty correct in their calculations as to who are “good men” and who are not. Pedro has invited the Marquis of Palmella, whom he formerly dismissed so unceremoniously, to rejoin his councils, but it is not known whether the latter will accept the offer. The Scotch corps under Major Shaw, with a devotion and generosity honourable to their country, have intimated to Don Pedro that they mean to ask for no pay or other remuneration for their services, until Donna Maria be placed on the throne of Portugal. The princess became of age to assume the reins of government on the 19th ult.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

We learn from the London journals, that negotiations are actively going on between M. Dedel, the new Dutch plenipotentiary, and the representatives of the other powers, but as yet all is a mystery as to the probable result of their deliberations. In the meantime, King Leopold seems to be on any thing rather than a good understanding with the leading men of his government. A few days ago, his Ministers again resigned, being now the fifth or sixth time of their doing so within the last eight or ten months—and M. de Theux, whom Leopold employed either to reconcile matters or form a new administration, has abandoned the task in despair. The Chambers have, in consequence, been adjourned to the 6th of May, in order to allow time for making new arrangements. It seems not at all improbable that these divisions in King Leopold's councils may influence the Dutch King somewhat in the pertinacity with which he holds out against the proposals of the mediatory powers for concluding the disputes between the two nations.

FRANCE.

The unpopularity of the French government, according to all accounts, is increasing, chiefly, it would appear, on account of the rigorous persecution which is still kept up against the press, of which the following is a sample:—M. Lionne, the responsible editor of the Tribune, has been found guilty of libelling the French Chamber of Deputies, by a majority of 256 members of that Chamber against 50. By a majority of 204 against 103, he has been sentenced to an imprisonment of three years, and a fine of 10,000 francs—about £400. The punishment is the heaviest which the law empowers the Chamber to inflict for a libellous offence. The editor lost no time, it is said, in taking his departure for England; and a subscription has been opened at the office of the National, to pay the fine imposed upon him. The whole of this proceeding is singular. The editor's offence consisted in terming the Chamber “prostituted.” The Chamber then assumes the offices of prosecutor, jury, and judge, and having found the accused guilty, sentences him to the heaviest punishment the law allows.

A rising of the ultra-republican party was expected to take place at Paris on the 14th ult., and large bodies of troops were put in readiness to suppress the insurgents, but nothing of the kind happened.

The Duchess de Berri is said to be dying, and physicians have been sent from Paris to attend her. She lately applied to government for liberty for M. Chateaubriand to visit her, to whom she wished to communicate certain particulars regarding her present equivocal situation, for the clearing up of her character, in the event of her death. The application, however, was refused.

The French Chamber has voted 50,000 francs for the purchase of the works and manuscripts of the late M. Champollion, and a pension of 3000 francs to his widow.

RUSSIA.

The Commercial Gazette of St Petersburg, of the 27th March, contains a review of the trade of Russia in 1832. The export of Russian merchandise exceeded the imports by fifty millions of rubles. The receipts of the customs were thirteen millions more than in 1831. The same paper mentions, that 149 new manufactories were established in 1832, and the number of masters and workmen was increased by 10,475. There existed last year in the empire 5599 manufactories, with 284,358 workmen. An improved breed of sheep was introduced into Western Siberia. At St Petersburg, Moscow, and Smolensk, preparations are making for establishing additional woollen cloth manufactories. The operations of the Russo-American Company had a favourable result; the dividends of each share for the two years 1830 and 1831, amount to 120 rubles.

IRELAND.

GOVERNMENT has lost no time in putting the efficacy of the suppression of disturbances act to the proof. This measure received the royal assent on the 3d ult., and on the morning of the 6th, a proclamation was issued by the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, putting the county of Kilkenny under the ban of the act. Others have since followed, suppressing the meetings of the Volunteer Association, and the Trades' Political Union. These proceedings have, of course, excited the utmost indignation in the minds of Mr O'Connell and his friends, and that gentleman has commenced a series of letters to his “Countrymen,” advising them how to avoid the operation of the “Algerine act,” and at the same time keep up the system of agitation for the repeal of the Union. He in particular recommends to his coadjutors to organize the electors preparatory to a new election, which, for three especial reasons, he is certain, will speedily take place. The first of these, he plainly states, is his expectation that the King will not live long; the second, that he reckons it impossible the Ministry can stand; and the third, is the heterogeneous materials of which the Parliament is composed. He says that “Hobhouse” will be found no better than “Stanley,” and speaks with deep execration of the Whitefeet, who, he says, have exactly “played the game which the enemies of Ireland wished them to play.” Several individuals have already been arrested at Kilkenny under the disturbance act, for being found out of doors after the prescribed hours, but all who could give a sufficient explanation of their conduct, and produce evidence of their good character, were immediately liberated.

The outrages still continue in various parts of the country, and it is expected that other districts will speedily be “proclaimed.” On the 2d ultimo, a policeman, while endeavouring to secure a man who had been concerned in a murderous attack on three harmless individuals at noon-day, on the public road, in the county of Meath, was shot dead on the spot. The heads of the unfortunate individuals attacked were almost battered to pieces with a mallet and a stone hammer. The murderer has yet escaped, but is known, and has been traced to Dublin. Two of his accomplices were secured and identified. The murderers of the unfortunate Mr Leonard, whose horrible death we detailed in our last, have, with one exception, been also secured and identified.

MAY, 1833.

ENGLAND.

EAST INDIA COMPANY.

THE East India Company was originally established for the purposes of trade, which was prosecuted with success till about the year 1744, when a war broke out between the British and the French in India, which ended in the expulsion of the latter, and in the establishment of the East India Company as a military power. From this period, their ascendancy in India has every day increased, until they have now established their wide-extended sway over 100 millions of people, from Cape Comorin to the Himalaya Mountains. About the year 1764, they acquired the Dewannee, or the right of collecting the revenues of Bengal, which, according to the maxims of the Mogul government, amounts to the sovereignty of the country. They had, in fact, long been sovereigns; and they now only assumed formally what they in reality possessed.

The revenues collected at that time in Bengal, and which were raised to their utmost height, amounted, in 1765, to L.1,607,826; in 1766 and 1767, to L.1,713,677. It soon appeared, however, that the people were over-taxed, the revenue fell into arrear, and the country declined. Numerous feeble remedies were devised for those evils, but the error still was in over-estimating the wealth of the country, and in seeking to draw from it a greater revenue than it could yield. In 1789, Lord Cornwallis introduced the settlement of the land revenues for ten years, which was afterwards converted into a permanent settlement, liable to no future increase, and, along with this, various extensive reforms in the judicial and police establishments of the country. But though these plans were conceived in the most benevolent and disinterested spirit, so congenial to the known character of that illustrious nobleman, it is now admitted on all hands that they were far from being successful; the truth is, that they were too European in their character; they were altogether at variance with the habits and modes of Hindoo life; and so sweeping an overthrow of existing institutions paved the way for the influx of numerous evils. Great zeal has since been displayed by the Directors and their servants in India, for the right administration of their vast dominions; and, in general, this system of the permanent settlement has, with limitations, been extended to the conquered countries.

The resources of the East India Company consist, therefore, chiefly of the original land-tax of the Mogul government, which is imposed throughout their wide-extended territories, and which amounts to a very large proportion of the produce of the soil, besides transit duties, the produce of the monopolies of salt, opium, post-office, subsidies from native powers, &c. In 1793, the revenue amounted to L.8,225,628—the expenditure to L.7,007,050, thus yielding a surplus of L.1,218,578, and the debt to L.7,971,665. In 1797, the expenditure again exceeded the income, and there was a deficit till 1810, when the revenue, now amounting to 15½ millions per annum, was found to exceed the expenditure, and in the course of 1816, 1817, and 1818, bullion had accumulated in the different treasuries of the Company, to the amount of eight millions sterling. But this great sum was expended in the prosecution of the Pindaree war, besides an additional sum of 4½ millions, which was borrowed, so that the India debt, which amounted in 1814 to 29 millions per annum, was raised to L.34,775,792. The military charges were again reduced; but the occurrence of the Burmese war swallowed up all the surplus revenues of India, and occasioned, besides, a great addition to the bond debts, which now amounted in India and Europe to L.42,870,876, bearing an interest of L.1,886,263. Since this period great retrenchments have been made; and the first care of those to whom the rule of India is now committed must be to bring the expenditure within the income.

It is extremely difficult to comprehend the real state of the Company's affairs, though an account is annually laid before Parliament as accurate as can be made out. But this account comprehends so many complicated details, and such various descriptions of articles included in the list of assets, that a wrong computation of their value may entirely derange the arithmetical results of the statement. Still it is evident, that though the Company have an immense debt, their stock must be of great value, and must go far to liquidate the claims against them. In a balance-sheet recently submitted to Parliament, the amount of their debts is given at L.60,479,802. Their stock is estimated at L.50,376,990, leaving a balance against them of L.10,102,812; and if we add the original stock which has been paid in by the proprietors, amounting to L.6,000,000, and charge it against the Company at the price at which it is to be redeemed by government, namely, L.200 per cent., the deficit will amount to L.22,102,812. On the other hand, the Company have not taken into their assets, which they justly might have done, the territorial and other revenues in India, amounting to L.22,691,721 per annum. On this revenue the debt of the Company constitutes at present an annual charge of L.1,886,263; the debt being L.42,870,876. But if, as is now proposed, the whole mercantile stock of the Company be converted into cash, and the debt be reduced to L.22,102,812, a saving of interest will thence accrue of about L.900,000, which, along with other savings and retrenchments which must be made, will, to a certainty, supply the necessary fund for paying the dividend of the proprietors, even though the lucrative monopoly of the China trade be lost. We have already mentioned that, prior to the Pindaree war, the finances of India were in a most flourishing state; and that a treasure of eight millions of bullion was accumulated in the Indian treasuries. Now, there is not the least chance of war at present in India. No such dark speck is to be seen in the political horizon. The fire has burnt out for want of fuel. We have no enemies to combat. Within the wide precincts of our extended sway, from the ocean to the great Himalaya range, not a man dare lift his arm against the masters of the land. The independence of India is crushed—it is a tale that was told—a romance with which the aged warrior and patriot may amuse his children. The only independent chief in India is Scindia, who is only nominally independent, seeing that he dare not move so as to give umbrage or jealousy to his conquerors. All others, Rajahs, Zemindars, Princedom, and Powers, have been laid in the dust under the weighty rod of the British power. They have no political influence. They are the feudatories and dependents of Britain, under the surveillance of her diplomatic police, with no power to create a disturbance which a squadron of horse could not instantly quell. The Nepaulese are most peaceably disposed, and there cannot be better neighbours than the Burmese, since the last fall they wrestled with their Herculean foes. All being so quiet, therefore, no necessity for large military establishments nor for extensive warlike preparations, an economical administration can have no difficulty in reducing the expenditure, and out of so large an income as L.22,691,721, in providing a surplus revenue for discharging the extra demand of the dividend with all other claims.

It will be observed that, since Ministers have declared their resolution of redeeming the capital of L.100 for every L.5, 5s. of annuity—and not as it was first erroneously stated of L.105 for every L.100 of capital—India stock has risen in the market from L.208 to L.222. The proprietors are now guaranteed in the high price of L.200 for every L.100 of their stock.—Edinburgh Evening Courant, March 30.

The changes in the administration mentioned in our last as likely to take place, have all been carried into effect, viz. Lord Goderich, from the Colonies to the Privy Seal. Mr Stanley from the Secretaryship of Ireland to that of the Colonies. Sir John C. Hobhouse from the Secretaryship of War to that of Ireland, and Mr Edward Ellice to succeed him in the War Department. Numerous speculations have of late been afloat in the ultra-Tory journals of farther changes in the administration, to the advantage of conservatism, but there seem no good grounds for supposing that such will take place at an early day at least.

Some very beautiful patterns of printed muslins were recently forwarded by Mr Thomas Barge, jun. of Peel Street, Manchester, for the approbation of her Majesty the Queen, who has ordered three dresses of the same.

Viscount Goderich has been created an Earl, by the title of Earl of Ripon.

The abstract of the revenue, just published, for the quarter ending 5th April last, shows a decrease, as compared with the corresponding quarter in 1832, of L.92,420. There is an increase, however, principally in the customs, on the whole year, of L.230,398.

It is now understood that the charter of the Bank of England is to be continued under certain limitations.

Various elections of members of Parliament have taken place since our last, and, singular to tell, the result, in the majority of these, has been in favour of the Conservatives. Amongst them are Mr Hope for Gloucester, in opposition to the Ministerialist, Captain Berkeley, who lately vacated his seat on being appointed a Lord of the Admiralty; Alderman Thompson for Sunderland, in the room of Captain Barrington, Earl Grey's son-in-law (who was lately called on by his constituents to resign his seat), and in opposition to Mr Barclay, the Whig candidate; and Mr Ireton for West Cumberland, in opposition to the Whig candidate, Major Aglionby. As a set-off to these, we have the election of Sir John C. Hobhouse for Westminster, and Mr Stanley for North Lancashire, upon the occasion of their shifting their situations in the Cabinet; Sir John, however, was very roughly handled on the hustings by some of the electors. Sir Henry Parnell has been returned for Dundee, in the room of Mr Kinloch, deceased.

Lieutenant Drummond, the engineer officer who was appointed to mark the boundaries under the reform bill, succeeds Mr Wickham as private secretary to Lord Althorp.

Mr J. Lefevre is appointed Under Secretary of the Colonies, in the room of Lord Howick.

The receipt stamp duties, for 1832, amounted to L.23,932, 9s. 11d. on twopenny stamps; L.28,359, 7s. 1d. on threepenny; L.38,324, 13s. 3d. on sixpenny; and L.49,485, 16s. on shilling stamps; a total of L.145,200, 0s. 3d.

The subscription for the Irish clergy already exceeds L.40,000.

By a printed list, just published, it appears that nearly six thousand individuals have passed their examination at Apothecaries' Hall since the 1st August 1815.

An important association is forming at this moment, having for its object to hasten the emancipation of the Jews in all parts of the globe. The association is to be divided into committees, and composed of citizens of all nations.

Upwards of L.60,000 have been lost during the present season by the merchants in the import of oranges into London only.

The committee for managing the outfit, &c. of Captain Back's expedition, have published a statement of the subscription, from which it appears, that, with the L.2000 from government, the total amount is L.6031, 3s. 8d., less by about L.350 of expenses. Thus the expedition is provided against two years' expenditure, but it is earnestly hoped that another L.1000 may yet be raised to enable it to stay out the full time proposed, three years. We observe with satisfaction that the seaports of Scotland stand distinguished by their liberality towards this humane and patriotic undertaking.—Edinburgh gives L.146; Glasgow, L.190; Greenock, L.130; Dundee, above L.50; Stranraer, above L.50; (we do not see Aberdeen); while Limerick is the only Irish town mentioned (L.40); and the great commercial Liverpool is little more than L.100; Bristol, unnamed; Devonport, L.15; Plymouth, L.12; Portsmouth, L.24; Hull, L.44.

An extraordinary entry was made on Thursday the 4th ult. at the Custom-house—forty-one chests of bullion, from China.

The Spectator of Saturday the 30th March contains a curious table of the number of speeches by each member from the beginning of the session, with the space which their remarks occupy in the "Mirror of Parliament." The most frequent speaker is Lord Althorp, who has addressed the house 182 times, filling 59 columns and 4 lines. The second speaker in point of frequency, and far the most voluminous, is Mr O'Connell, who has spoken 134 times, and filled 107 columns and 49 lines. The total speeches are 1776, filling 1057 columns and 4 lines. Of these the new members have contributed 3 speeches, 165 columns and 56 lines, leaving for old members 1456 speeches, filling 872 columns.

The London Gazette announces that no training exercising of the militia will take place this year.

Mr Godwin, the venerable author, has just received appointment of Yeoman Usher and Office-keeper of Exchequer. The duties are rather of an inferior order. The salary is L.200 a-year, with an official residence. Earl Grey, in bestowing this portion of his patronage, expressed his regret at having nothing better suitable more worthy the reception of this venerable literateur.

Noah Pease Folgar, the American captain, who sat at Mr William Mellish on the 18th February last, has been tried at the Old Bailey Sessions, and acquitted, the ground of insanity. He is ordered to be imprisoned till his Majesty's pleasure is known.

MEMORABILIA.

The manufactories for various articles of pottery, Wedgwood's improved principles afford maintenance upwards of 10,000 families in this country. Previous to 1763, most of the superior kinds of earthenware were imported from France.

The following were the prices at the school kept by the father of the late Dr Adam Clarke:—Reading, 1s. per week; writing, 2d.; writing and accounts, 4d.; Greek and Latin, 7s. per quarter.

It appears from a census taken in 1815, that the population of the Chinese empire amounted, in that year, to the enormous number of 361,693,879.

Last year the income of Upper Canada was nearly double the expenditure, which enabled the Company to pay off 10 per cent. of the debt contracted for the prosecution of canals and other public works.

In the reign of Elizabeth, the tolls of the port of Liverpool were only L.30 per annum; they now amount to L.50,000.

The number of drunken persons taken into custody by the London police, during the year 1832, and liberated sober, was 15,411 males, and 10,291 females. There were besides taken before the magistrates 6934 individuals in a state of intoxication, of whom 3505 were fined and 3429 lectured and discharged. The sum total of these public Bacchanals is 32,636.

In the last four years, 145,945 emigrants have settled in the Canadas, a part of the British dominions computed to comprehend about 3,400,000 square miles of land, which not more than 129,500 have yet been explored.

Fourteen railway bills have been brought forward in the British Parliament, of which three have been withdrawn or lost, and eleven progressed. Suppose all the latter to pass, the aggregate length of the railways will not probably be less than 300 miles; and, estimated at the average expense at L.20,000 per mile, the outlay will be six millions sterling, which will all be disbursed in six years or less. Next year will, of course, produce its contingent of bills, and we may thus calculate our annual expenditure of from one to two millions (the thirds of it for labour) on a species of improvement which, for commercial purposes, may be said to have been non-existent three or four years ago.

A Parliamentary return has just been published of number of brewers, licensed victuallers, and venders of beer by retail, from which it appears that the total number of brewers in England is 1753; of licensed victuallers, 50,796; and of venders of beer, 30,917. The number of publicans who brew their own beer is 24,293; the number of retailers of beer who brew is 13,102. The number of bushels of malt consumed by the brewers, victuallers, and retailers of beer last year respectively was 13,891,851; 8,898,789; and 3,093,519. The number of brewers in Scotland is 216; of licensed victuallers, 17; and the quantities of malt consumed by each respectively are 893,901, and 96,505 bushels. In Ireland there are 216 brewers, and the quantity of malt brewed 1,543 bushels. The total quantity of malt brewed in England, Scotland, and Ireland, last year, amounts to 28,417 bushels. The number of barrels of beer exported last year from England, Scotland, and Ireland, was 70,1 of which quantity, 28,881 barrels were exported to East Indies, 13,161 barrels to the West Indies, and 9 barrels to New South Wales.

SCOTLAND.

CITY AND CHURCH OF EDINBURGH.

SINCE our last publication, the city of Edinburgh has declared insolvent. On the 11th ult., the Lord Provost (Learmonth) called a private meeting of creditors, others interested in the town's affairs, and explained, owing to the vast accumulation of debt, and the inadequate income, it would be necessary to place the city under a Parliamentary trust or commission, while the Council might continue in the meantime to manage financial affairs. At an extraordinary meeting of Council on the 20th, this plan was agreed to, and Lord Provost has since gone to London to take the necessary steps for carrying it into effect. The aggregate debt of the city was stated at the first meeting at L.340,000, while the annual income is only L.34, which is by no means sufficient to pay the interest, also to cover the current expenses of the city.

On the 24th ult., it was resolved by the Presbytery of Edinburgh to appoint a committee to watch the progress of an act through Parliament for extending the tax over the College of Justice, and thereby rendering less burdensome to the inhabitants. The speeches

BROWN & POLSON'S

ered on this occasion by Mr Simpson of Kirknewton Dr Chalmers, expressed very strong censures upon the citizens of Edinburgh as refuse, in the meantime, to pay the tax, and a resolution on the part of the city to prosecute their right by all means in their power. We have classed these subjects under one head, because they are in a great measure one subject. For centuries, the affairs of the city corporation have been managed in the way which has at last ended appropriately in insolvency; and, to the misfortune of religion in Edinburgh, the ecclesiastical system has been inextricably entangled with it. At a most unpropitious time, the clergy seeking to uphold their part of the system, when it is evident from the sentiments of the inhabitants in general, that it can be no longer maintained, even with the realization of burden now proposed. It never seems to be supposed by this reverend body that a tax may be levied, and yet so very oppressive that men can no longer endure it. Such is the fact in this case. No one doubts a law which Mr Simpson has been at such pains to describe as such; but two-thirds of the citizens are endeavouring to procure its abrogation. A total reformation of the system is required, and as there could be no chance of that so long as payment of the tax was made, it is naturally resisted, in order that those who present the imposers of the tax may be induced to bear themselves in taking it off. If the system were corrected, the clergy would once more draw their full incomes; for the resistance arises from no anxiety to see the system decreased. A correction might perhaps be brought about by adopting the system pursued at Glasgow as a model. In that city, twelve full ministers and nine teachers in chapels of ease (that is, twenty-one churches in all) are supported by £6270, not one penny of which comes from a compulsory tax; while, in Edinburgh, thirteen churches are only maintained at an expense of £1800 to ten thousand pounds. Now, if the five tra or collegiate clergymen of Edinburgh were permitted to die out, surely the remaining thirteen might be supported by the same sum as that expended at Glasgow which sum would be produced by the seat-rents—and as the tax might be altogether taken off. If in Edinburgh 13 men get as much as 21 at Glasgow, assuredly the superiority of the stipends must be sufficient to keep up that dignity which some people imagine to be necessary in the metropolitan system. If it be objected that seat-rents, as now, are required to swell the funds of the city corporation, we answer, that that corporation must be deprived of them, and left to seek a compensation where it may, which were only the proper punishment of its misconduct in this whole matter. If the adding individuals in the city would apply themselves to novate the system in this manner, all might yet be well; but as for the idea of raising both a tax and seat-rents, it is no longer practicable. The tax, though it were at this moment extended over the College of Justice, would be as heartily resisted as ever; the principle of injustice and oppression still remaining.

CONFLICT OF JURISDICTIONS.

In our last number, we pointed out the injury often arising to the community of large towns by the strange conflict of local jurisdictions, and endeavoured to show, that, by the system of burgh reform, such should be remedied, simply by placing the whole town, suburbs included, under one distinct process of management. A striking instance of the evil we speak of has just occurred in Edinburgh. Some portions of the outskirts, considered to belong to the parish of St Cuthbert's, and out of the extended royalty, were taxed for the poor of the said parish, and the inhabitants duly paid these taxes annually. It seems, however, that these portions had been claimed so by the town, which, under pretence of having had its claim allowed by the Sheriff, now comes forward and insists on the inhabitants paying their arrear of town taxes, including town poor-rates, for several years back. In this case, these inhabitants will naturally look to the overseers of St Cuthbert's parish for protection, for they hold their receipts, and it is unjust that they should satisfy two conflicting jurisdictions. As one of the Editors of the present publication is an individual so circumstanced, there can be no mistake in the matter, which, however, brought forward here merely to show how exceedingly ill managed Edinburgh has been, and as an additional instance of the suffering of the inhabitants from local taxations.

POPULAR EDUCATION.

THE system of popular lecturing in the evenings, on various branches of science and the arts, so advantageously established in Edinburgh, both by societies and individuals, has generally ceased for the season. From what we have seen of this somewhat novel practice of instructing the people, we consider it of great use, and worthy of the best support and imitation. In reality, it almost amounts to the giving of a college education to that great middle and lower class of society hitherto excluded from receiving university instruction, both from want of time and means; and it is additionally valuable from the lectures being open to the attendance of females, whose education has all along been too much confined, considering the important duties they are called on to perform. The success of these unpretending and popular institutions is a tolerably convincing proof that the old educational establishments have been practically found inadequate to fulfil the extensive purposes of national instruction, and that the people have at length, naturally enough, begun to educate themselves. Next winter, these popular lectures will, in all probability, be still more numerous attended, and we have little doubt they will very speedily produce a perceptible alteration in the better on the understanding, and hence the moral of the age.

EMIGRATION.

To show the spirit of emigration that now prevails in Scotland, we have collated the substance of a few paragraphs in some of the latest newspapers on the subject.

Up to the 30th March, the number of passengers that had sailed from Glasgow since the commencement of the year, were 207, viz.—From Lanarkshire, 62; Renfrewshire, 52; Ayrshire, 22; Edinburgh, 38; Stirlingshire, 2; Perthshire, 12; Inverness-shire, 10; Ross-shire, 7; Haddington, 2; Clackmannan, 1. To the United States, up to the same date, 97, viz.:—Renfrewshire, 17; Forfarshire, 6; Edinburghshire, 13; Lanarkshire, 32; Dundee, 2; Mid-Lothian, 25; Linlithgow, 2. These emigrants are of the most respectable class. From the 1st to the 15th ult., 83 left Greenock for New York, and 150 for Canada. At Leven, Fifeshire, between 60 and 70 sailed on the 18th ult. On or about the same day, upwards of 100 emigrants sailed from Troon, in Ayrshire, for Quebec and Montreal; and up to 27th ult., about 300 emigrants have sailed from Leith during the month. These are the contents of mere random paragraphs picked up here and there among the provincial newspapers, and do not, we believe, mention one half of the actual average of self-expatriation daily going on in Great Britain.

CHURCH PATRONAGE IN SCOTLAND.

It will be seen by our Parliamentary report, that the consideration of this question, which is at present exciting so much interest in Scotland, has been postponed to the 4th of June. As any insight into the probable measure to be brought forward by government, will, we know, be acceptable to our readers, we extract the following outline of its main features from the Dumfries Journal, a zealous religious periodical, conducted by the Rev. Dr Duncan of Ruthwell, whose long and close intimacy with the Lord Chancellor, and other members of the government, warrants us in giving much credence to the statement:—1st, The abolition of patronage will be confined entirely to the crown livings, which, however, amount to one-third of all the livings in Scotland. 2d, As a new regulation on the subject of presentees is expected from the church itself, where such a regulation ought to originate, the measure will probably not be introduced into Parliament, but will be effected by an order of the Privy Council, as a mere temporary arrangement. 3d, Government will not give up its patronage, but will select its own nominee, and offer him for the approbation or disapprobation of the communicants. 4th, If a majority of the communicants do not disapprove, the nomination will be rendered absolute; if they do, a new nominee will be selected by government. 5th, Should two government nominees be rejected, the third nomination will probably be made absolute at once, a presentation being issued without allowing the communicants any previous voice. This will throw the question on the church courts, and bring into operation the ordinary forms.

SINGULAR EPIDEMIC.

WITHIN the last few weeks, a novel, and almost anomalous disease, has broken out in London, and spread with a rapidity perhaps unparalleled in the annals of epidemic disorders. Not the smallest street, and scarcely a family in the metropolis and neighbourhood, have escaped a visitation of it, and the services of the medical faculty have been in much greater requisition than even at the worst period of the cholera malady. No class or description of persons has been exempted from attack—from the peer to the peasant, from the seat of legislature to the workhouse. Amongst others of the House of Commons, Lord Althorp, Sir James Graham, Mr Hume, Mr O'Connell, and Mr Cobbett, have been laid up with it. Four of the principal theatres were closed at once, in consequence of the members of the respective houses being confined. In one day, in the Blue-Coat Hospital, there were 150 boys ill. In the Bank of England, 94 of the clerks were one morning reported ailing. Of one large commercial establishment, 32 were in bed—of another, 40. Two-thirds of the police corps have been arrested. Even the course of justice has been suspended at the Old Bailey, by the illness of the Recorder from the same cause. Half of those employed at the manufactories, government offices, docks, customhouse, &c. have been amissing in consequence. In short, this mysterious epidemic has spared neither age nor sex, and has seized upon rich and poor alike. We are happy to be able to add, that its fatality bears no proportion to its universality. We have heard, indeed, of but one case terminating fatally—that of Colonel Baillie of Leys, member for the Inverness district of burghs, who expired on the 20th ult. As the disorder is perfectly novel, the faculty have, on that account, as well as from its extraordinary epidemic character, denominated it by the general appellation of influenza. "The attack," says the Lancet, "is often extremely sudden, the person complaining at the instant of pain in the forehead, an aching of the eyelids, oppression at the stomach, with coldness and aching of the limbs, quickly followed either by coughing or sneezing, or both. At other times, a sensation of sickness is described as the first symptom of indisposition. In some instances, the patient is first seized with a violent fit of sneezing, with exceedingly severe headache, and extreme pain in the limbs. The cough, in many instances, is particularly distressing." The disorder generally goes off in two days, or less, leaving an extreme languor behind. The Medical Gazette recommends, as the most successful mode of treating the influenza, the use of saline diaphoretics, warm diluents, and a short confinement to bed. The Lancet recommends saline aperients, antimonials, and the vapour bath. The Medical and Surgical Gazette says, the treatment that has been found most serviceable has been small doses of calomel with antimonial powder at night, the saline effervescing draught during the day; for the cough, oxymel of squills; in some cases emetics have been employed at the first attack with great success. Dover's powders have also been found serviceable when taken at night. Opium and venesection have both been found very injurious.

The same disorder has also displayed itself in Edinburgh and Leith within the last ten days, although not with so much virulence, or to such an extent, as in London. We know of some few instances, however, where three or four individuals of one family have been laid up at the same time. In one large and respectable seminary in the New Town, no less than eight of the inmates were almost simultaneously seized one day last week. We have heard that in one instance it has even proved fatal. No doubt seems to exist as to the malady being purely epidemic, although its cause or origin is of course a mystery. We observe that it has also manifested itself at Liverpool, Inverness, and other places both in England and Scotland—in short, it seems to be regularly making the tour of Britain.

It is a somewhat curious coincidence, that a violent epidemic has at the same time displayed itself in France, chiefly in Paris and the neighbourhood, where it has raged with great severity, and seems to be even of a more distressing and dangerous character than our own. One peculiar feature of it is, that it has hitherto attacked none but adults, and chiefly persons convalescent from other maladies. It first displays itself in redness and inflammation of the feet, great heat, intense pain, and incapability of moving the parts affected. In some, the disease has extended to the hands, and all the joints of the extremities. Very few cases have proved fatal, but, at the same time, no spontaneous cures have been noticed.

HOUSE AND WINDOW TAXES.

A MEETING of the inhabitants of the metropolitan boroughs has just been held in the Crown and Anchor Tavern, for the purpose of taking into consideration such measures as were likely to lead to the total abolition of the house and window taxes. Mr Alderman Wood, Sir Francis Burdett, and Sir John Key, were, one after the other, appointed to the chair. The meeting was, to the last degree, uproarious, and sentiments of the deepest hatred of the above taxes prevailed, and to which effect motions were carried. Mr D. W. Harvey, M.P. addressed the assemblage in an animated speech, showing the impolitic measures of the Ministry regarding the finances, and promised to submit a motion in the house, on the 22d of May, "compelling every pensioner, man, woman, and child, in Scotland, Ireland, and England, to give in their names, and state the consideration they had given, or the services they had rendered, for the pensions they received." With reference to the object of this large meeting, it would still appear that the Ministry are in the greatest ignorance of the detestation of the house and window taxes, which prevails over the whole country. Some, indeed, allege they are fully aware of this fact, but cautiously abstain from removing these taxes, lest the ten-pound constituency should thereby be enlarged, which it certainly would. On whatever grounds, it is deeply to be lamented that the government will continue to enforce the levy of taxes, which, out of all other imposts on the country, are the only ones that are seen and felt to be a tax, and, therefore, the only ones about which we ever hear any complaint.

March 30. The annual prize of the gold medal of the Edinburgh Burnsfield Links Golfing Society, was gained by James Mitchell, Esq. after a very spirited and keen contest.

April 1. At an adjourned meeting of the Commissioners for Improvements in Edinburgh, held this day, Mr Hamilton was, on the motion of Sir James Gibson-Craig, and after much altercation and opposition, re-appointed architect to the Commission. The majority in his favour was 13 to 5.

—15. An awful calamity took place this morning at Tain. Between two and three o'clock A.M., the New Court House and Jail, a fine building, erected only in 1836, at an expense of several thousand pounds, was discovered to be on fire, and, notwithstanding the most prompt and vigorous exertions to save it, was totally destroyed by the devouring element. Melancholy to add, three individuals, confined in the debtors' ward, perished in the flames. They were perfectly aware of their situation, and were both seen and heard imploring for assistance in the most heart-rending manner, but it was found utterly impossible to rescue them. The names of the sufferers are, Mr George Alexander, architect at Golspie; Angus McLeod, waterman, Ballentrate; and the wife of the latter, who had come on a visit to him. Their remains were all got out, but almost reduced to a cinder. All the criminals were saved. It is not known how the fire originated, but an investigation is going on.—The spirited burgh of Dumfries has distinguished itself as much in the work of self-reformation, as it did in the cause of Parliamentary reform. This day, a public meeting of the inhabitants was held, Provost Carson in the chair, when it was announced that the privileges of the burgh had been thrown open by the magistrates, by which any person might hereafter commence business in the town without being called upon to enter as burgess. On the same day, resolutions were passed, and petitions, founded on them, sent off to the legislature, praying the entire abolition of all corporate rights and privileges whatever.

—17. The representation of Dundee having become vacant, in consequence of the death of Mr Kinloch, M.P., a requisition, most numerously signed by the electors, was sent to Sir Henry Parnell, soliciting him to stand as candidate, which he accepted, and instantly posted off to Dundee. The election came on this day, when Sir Henry was proposed by Provost Lindsay, and no other candidate appearing, he was declared duly elected amidst enthusiastic and unanimous cheering. Sir Daniel K. Sandford set off for Dundee, on hearing of Mr Kinloch's death, to offer himself as candidate, but found the electors so unanimous in Sir Henry's favour, that he declined a canvass.—At a meeting of the Glasgow Presbytery, held this day, Dr Brown of St John's, who had received a call to the church and parish of Ratho, near Edinburgh, rose and said, that he had at one time, and on account of his health, thought it his duty to accept of the offer made to him of Ratho, but that, finding the call from that parish with only a few signatures attached to it, he could not now, either on personal or public grounds, accept of such a call. He held the call of the people to be a proper and constitutional form, and he had too much respect for himself, and for the church to which he belonged, to think of entering upon the pastoral duties of any parish when there was so poor a welcome. He was, moreover, of opinion that this resolution by deputations from the Council of Glasgow and Session of St John's, affectionately urging him to remain. The Presbytery, in these circumstances, unanimously judged it inexpedient to take any step towards the translation; and Principal McFarlan, Dr McGill, and several other members, expressed their great satisfaction at having Dr Brown still continued a member of the Presbytery, and approved of the grounds on which the call from Ratho was judicially declined.

We understand the Pitt Club of Scotland intend to hold a public dinner in Edinburgh, on the 28th current, being the anniversary of Mr Pitt's birth-day.

The Sheriff of Lanarkshire has appointed James Veitch, Esq. advocate, to be Sheriff-Substitute of the Middle Ward of that county, in room of John Dick, Esq. advocate, resigned.

Cotton Trade with the East.—A Glasgow paper mentions that, during the quarter ending 31st March last, the shipments of white, coloured, and printed cottons, from the Clyde and Liverpool to Calcutta alone, amount to no less than 2,983,000 yards, officially valued at nearly £81,000. The shipments of cotton yarns to the same port, and during the same period, amount to 760,000 lbs. weight, and are officially valued at £52,000 sterling.

The quantity of whisky consumed last year in Scotland was 4,661,515 gallons, being about 700,000 gallons less than for the year before, and about 1,200,000 less than for the year 1830. The export from Scotland to Ireland was 470,000 gallons only, and to England 2,360,000.

A case of fraudulent bankruptcy has just occurred at Dundee, which, from the flagrant and peculiar circumstances attending it, is exciting a great sensation in that quarter at present. Mr Faulds, one of the partners of Messrs Haldane & Co., set sail in the barque Industry, belonging to the firm, for the ostensible purpose of taking a sea trip as far as Arbroath, for the benefit of his children, who were troubled with the whooping-cough. Various suspicious circumstances came out after the departure of the vessel (which had cleared for Quebec with a freight of about £800 worth, obtained on credit), which were strengthened by the disappearance, in a few days, of the other partner, Mr Haldane. One of the creditors immediately went in pursuit of the latter, who was traced to Glasgow, but there lost. At the same time, a fast-sailing smack was equipped, manned, appointed with fire-arms, &c., and despatched after the Industry, but after cruising as far as Stromness, returned unsuccessful. Mr Faulds has, however, written home from the Pentland Frith, saying, "please God," he will yet return and pay every body. The debts of the Company amount to upwards of £3,000.

Postscript.

Mr Attwood's motion for a select committee to inquire into the distress of the country, and how far it resulted from the present state of the monetary system, was negatived on the morning of Thursday the 25th, by a majority of 331 to 139. Lord Althorp's counter-resolution, that it is inexpedient to depreciate the present standard of value, was carried by a majority of 304 to 49. Lord Althorp, at the same time, gave notices of motions for two committees—one to inquire into the state of the agricultural interest, and the other into that of manufactures.

The question of the ballot was on Thursday night (25th) brought under the consideration of the House of Commons by Mr Grote, when it was lost by a majority of 105, the numbers being 211 to 106.

On Friday night, Sir William Ingleby moved for the reduction of the malt duty from 20s. 8d. to 10s. per quarter. After a long and stormy discussion, in which Lord Althorp declared that the repeal of the whole, or even the half, of the malt tax, would render it impossible for Ministers to proceed, the house divided against Ministers by a majority of 10—the numbers being—For the motion, 162; against it, 152. The effect of this will be a diminution of more than two millions from the revenue of the ensuing year, and, of course, nullifies the provisions of the present budget. In the postscript to the Spectator, dated late on Saturday evening, we find the following moving intelligence: "Ministers had a private meeting this morning in Downing Street, and a Cabinet Council has also been summoned, at which the course to be adopted in their present embarrassment will be decided upon. It is not believed that they will retire, although Mr Spring Rice held out retirement as a threat last night previous to the division. It is said that Lord Althorp will go out, and be succeeded by Mr Edward Ellice, and that Mr Spring Rice will go to the War Office; but this must be mere conjecture at present—and not a very probable conjecture. Ministers fully expect to be beaten on Sir John Key's motion (for the total repeal of the house and window taxes), if it should be persisted in; but there will probably be such an alteration of the budget as will render that motion unnecessary."

The discussion of the proposition of the government for the conditional renewal of the charter of the East India Company, has been continued by the Court of Proprietors during the whole of the recent week, and has terminated in the adoption of the resolutions of Sir John Malcolm, which involve the final rejection of the Ministerial project.

Captain Onslow, of his Majesty's ship Clio, has taken possession of the Falkland Islands, on behalf of the British government. There has been a dispute long pending between the United States and the Buenos Ayres government, as to which of them possessed the right to occupy these islands. Captain Onslow has rendered all future altercation on the subject unnecessary.

Admiral Nugent has been appointed to the high office of Admiral of the Fleet, vacant by the death of Lord Gambier.

Her Majesty the Queen is confined with the prevailing influenza.

MESSRS CHAMBERS act as Publishing Agents (in Scotland) for the following Works:—

THE BRITISH LIBRARY.—This publication is intended to comprise the works of all the classic authors of Great Britain, and appears in a series of handsome monthly volumes, correctly and elegantly printed, at a price hitherto unprecedented. Each volume will be carefully edited; notes, when necessary, are given; a life of the author, either selected or written expressly for the purpose, is prefixed.

The British Library rests its claims to public patronage, chiefly on its correctness and unequalled cheapness; but in beauty of typography and elegance of outward appearance, it will yield to no other publication of the day; and although the proprietors do not hold out the inducement of illustrations, these, of first-rate quality, will not be spared in works such as White's Selborne, Wallis's Angler, &c., where they will be useful as well as ornamental.

The first volume of the British Library contains White's Natural History of Selborne, with Observations on Nature, and the Naturalist's Calendar. The second forms the first volume of Col. Smith's Miscellaneous Works. To be completed in four volumes. Price of each volume, only 3s.; or in morocco cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

THE BRITISH CYCLOPEDIA OF ARTS, SCIENCES, MANUFACTURES, COMMERCE, LITERATURE, HISTORY, GEOGRAPHY, POLITICS, BIOGRAPHY, NATURAL HISTORY, &c. Conducted by Charles F. Partington, Esq. Published in weekly numbers, in a large octavo size, price 2d. each, or in monthly parts. The British Cyclopædia is a work calculated, in a great measure, to supersede the necessity of purchasing expensive Encyclopædias, and will prove, when completed, a useful digest, not only for occasional reference, but regular constructive and entertaining reading. Already, the weekly circulation amounts to 18,000 copies.

THE FIELD NATURALIST'S MAGAZINE AND REVIEW OF MINERALS, PLANTS, MINERALS, THE STRUCTURE OF THE EARTH, AND APPEARANCES OF THE SKY. By James Rennie, M.A. Professor of Zoology. Published monthly, price 1s.

THE DIAMOND BIBLE, with Notes explanatory and practical. By the Rev. H. Stebbing. With engravings from the old masters. This is an exceedingly beautiful edition of the Bible, of the smallest pocket size; publishing in weekly numbers, at 6d. each. The part containing the New Testament is in course of being issued, and will be completed in six numbers.

All the preceding publications are sold by every Bookseller in the United Kingdom.

THE GENERAL DISAPPOINTMENT.

WHEN the late reform bill was in progress, the opposing party very generally believed that it would, when carried, throw so much power into the hands of the populace, and give such an impulse to the desire of revolutionising and overturning our institutions, that things could not for many months after be put together.

At the same time, the favouring party looked forward with more or less sanguine anticipations to the passing of this measure. Few, perhaps, exactly expected an immediate fall in the price of spirituous liquors; but all hoped for an immediate melioration of our system of government, a very speedy reform of various institutions and modes of procedure which had long been cried out upon, and, above all things, a considerable reduction of taxes.

Strange to say, all have been disappointed. The first reformed House of Commons is composed of a class of persons exactly resembling those whom we have always seen in that situation—an aristocratic body, who, though individually very civil on the hustings, bear, in their collective capacity, all the appearance of a ruling council, and seem, when in St Stephen's chapel, if they were removed into an atmosphere superior to all plebeian ideas, and inaccessible to all plebeian influence. Even, however, upon the hustings, the general tone was, on this occasion, aristocratic. The people seemed to have, even at that early stage of the proceedings, recovered the respect for title, wealth, and standing, which the Tories feared was entirely gone; and, instead of the men of their own class, who used to vote exactly as they pleased, they chose, in almost every instance, somebody completely removed above their own sphere, some "respectable" person, the phrase is in this country—that is, an individual of the ruling and influential class; thereby showing that, though emancipated from all regard for old forms and rules, they had not yet shaken off the homage which they had been in the habit of paying to its privileged claimants. In hardly any case did the people choose an equal to represent them; they almost invariably preferred a superior to govern them, making no scruple if the candidate could only show the merit of having consulted his own interest by assuming their favourite badge of reform. In fact, it could almost appear as if the voters, at the very critical moment when called upon to exercise their new privileges, had taken fright at their power, and, reluctantly to err on the safe side, chose those very exalted characters whom they had previously seemed anxious to bring to the dust. The result has been, that the new House of Commons has disappointed all classes—the anti-reformers by its moderation and caution, and the reformers by its being so little different from its predecessors. Into all, little has been done. Three-fourths of the first session have passed away in talk. In short, it almost appears as if the agitation of the last two or three years had only interrupted the course of those real reforms which were going on under the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel, and which, somehow or other, passed through an unreformed course with hardly any difficulty, while all our reforms now-a-days are attended with a sickening suspense.

Such facts as these lead naturally to a suspicion that, in government, all is not as it seems. An apparently bad system is not in reality so bad, and an apparently good system is not so good. The disappointments of patriots with the result of their own achievements are proverbial in history; and here seems to be another grand instance to fortify the maxim. It is questionable, indeed, if governments have nearly so much to do with the happiness of the people under them as is supposed. The happiness of a people, we suspect, lies chiefly in their own management of their own individual concerns; and if governments only take care to do them no harm in that respect, they are pretty safe. There is amazingly little difference, after all, among what are called public men, and simply because the principles upon which a man is induced to offer himself for the public service are in the most of cases the same. It is impossible that a disinterested feeling can enter very largely into the motive: for who can be expected to throw away, upon the business of his fellow-creatures, that which he could turn to account by applying it to his own? There must in all cases be "a consideration." And not only are the motives likely to be the same, but the circumstances under which they find themselves when they begin to act, are also so likely to be similar, that a marked difference of conduct is almost impossible. Whoever may choose to become a British Minister, will still find "the debt" to be encountered—will still find that he has to deal more immediately with a rich and powerful, than with a plebeian class—and, while straining after what he once thought the right, will discover that he must in general be content to pursue the expedient. Hence the numerous instances of patriotic characters being exploded on coming into the management of what they had thought to be mismanaged by others. Hence the strange unpopularity of the present Ministers, who, with every sincere wish to do as they once wished others to do, and, we believe, many earnest endeavours to do what the majority of the people wish to see done, being still balked by circumstances beyond their control, are exposed to the blame of being very much like all former Ministers, and, as there is no gratitude in the public any more than there is disinterestedness in its servants, experience no benefit from even that exculpatory evidence which their actual services might be expected to have afforded. In this there is enough to inflict despair both upon governed and governors.

There is, however, we seriously believe, no need for despair in any quarter. Tumultuary as many late symptoms have been, they are only local, and cannot be more permanent than many others which we have seen pass away. Exaggerated as have been the popular hopes from the reform bill, time will also bring them to their proper shape; and a great deal of what embarrasses the Ministry being thus removed, some real good may be experienced from what has as yet been only a fallacy and a disappointment, and the cause of much animosity between parties, which ought now to be on both sides regretted. Whatever be the faults of the Ministry, it is evident that there must be some measure to their power of gratifying the people; and who can say, for certain, that that measure has not been reached? It would neither be generous nor rational to throw upon men the blame due to circumstances; and, desirable as it is that the just hopes of the people should be speedily fulfilled, a little patience perhaps would not have the effect of retarding that conclusion. In the meantime, notwithstanding all the distresses which are said to exist, there are many things with which the British people have just reason to be contented. Severe as the taxes are upon almost every thing that bears a price, there is no nation in the world which, upon the whole, has more enjoyment of the necessities and luxuries of life. Dreadful as the poor laws are, it is still better to endure them than to see one-third of the population in a state of pauperism, as is said to be the case in the capital of France. Severe as are the toils and small the earnings of the British artisans, their condition, in general, is that of gentlemen, as compared with the ignorant, degraded, and garbage-fed commonality of several European countries more favoured by the sun. There is, in short, no country where the people are, upon the whole, nearly so well off as in Great Britain: And neither is there any, where the government presses so little against the grain of popular wishes. Faults and deficiencies there must be in all human systems: but certainly the approach which the British have made to rendering their government an express creation of the people, and slave of the general will, is unexampled, and, though not what it may yet be, ought to give for the present a large measure of contentment.

PARLIAMENT.

IN our last we brought up the report of the Parliamentary business for the month, to Monday the 22d ult., on which evening Mr Matthias Attwood brought forward his motion on "the distress of the country, as proceeding from our present monetary system"—the result (after three nights' debate) of which we stated in our Postscript. The following is a brief outline of the discussion:—

1. DISTRESS OF THE COUNTRY—THE CURRENCY.

—Mr M. Attwood, after a lengthened preface, explanatory of the importance of his motion, observed that, for eighteen years, the prosperity of the country had been decaying, and its embarrassments increasing. He would show how it happened that the augmented population of 1833 was unable to support the burdens which had been easily borne by the more limited one of 1815. The hon. member then proceeded to detail his views relative to the operation of the present monetary system, to which he attributed all the mischief, the amount of taxation not having been reduced in an equal ratio to the limitation that had taken place in the circulation of money. He mentioned £33,800,000, £37,807,000, £34,500,000, as the comparative value of the money raised during the years preceding 1815. In that year the value of the taxes, as compared with the money of the present day, was only £43,700,000, so that the £50,200,000 raised at present was, in fact, £6,500,000 more than was paid in the year 1815. The real fact was, that the money being increased in value, the diminished tax was equal to the old one in its real amount. The hon. member then entered into various details upon the subject of the finances during the last eighteen years, which he said had all the while been conducted upon a false system, and it was now full time to retrace our steps. The hon. member then severally alluded to the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests, as being in the last stage of deterioration and distress—the labouring classes were unemployed—our ships were neither built, manned, provisioned, nor repaired as they used to be, and our manufactures were unsaleable. He then read certain documents, showing the great increase in crime since 1814. All these circumstances he asserted to proceed from the cause before stated. The hon. member concluded by moving—"That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the state of general distress, difficulties, and embarrassments which now pressed on the various orders of the community; how far they were the results of the operations of the monetary system; and to consider the effect produced by that system on the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests of the country, and on the industry of the people."—(The reporters state that the honourable member was inaudible through a great part of his speech, in consequence of his continued stumps on the table, which the Times estimated at 200 every quarter of an hour.)

and to amount altogether to 3000.)—Lord Althorp replied, that the consequences of adopting such an alteration in the currency as the hon. member evidently aimed at, would only increase immeasurably the very calamity he deplored. To alter the present system, on which the whole contracts of the country depended, would inevitably bring about public confusion, by which the labouring classes would be the first to suffer. If the motion of the honourable member were carried, every man who had a right to demand payment in gold would do it at once; the consequence must necessarily be a run upon all the banks, infinitely more severe than that of 1825; because no establishment could be secure from it—no amount of credit in the partners of any bank could save it from the sudden pressure of every individual, who would naturally be anxious to obtain gold currency at its present value, before that value should be reduced. He could not conceive any calamity to the country greater than the adoption of the motion of the honourable member. His Lordship concluded by moving the following amendment:—"That it is the opinion of the house, that any alteration of the monetary system of the country, which would have the effect of lowering the standard of value, would be highly inexpedient."—Mr Grote seconded the amendment.—Mr Cobbett, Mr Richards, and others, supported the motion for inquiry.—Mr Poulett Thompson characterised the plan of the honourable mover as simply one of confiscation and public robbery.—The debate was ultimately adjourned to next day, and again to the day following (Wednesday); the principal speakers for the motion being Sir H. Willoughby, Mr Cayley, Colonel Torrens, and others—against it, Mr A. Baring, Sir R. Peel, Sir Henry Parnell, &c.—The house divided early on Thursday morning, when there appeared—For, 139; against, 331.—Majority against the motion, 192.—A division subsequently took place upon Lord Althorp's amendment, when there appeared—For Lord Althorp's resolution, 304; against it, 49; majority against lowering the standard of value, 255.—(The Spectator newspaper, in allusion to this debate, says, "it is a curious fact, and strongly indicative of the way in which affairs are conducted in Parliament, that Sir Francis Burdett, who voted against Mr Attwood's motion, had previously offered to second it.")

2. THE BALLOT.—On Thursday (25th), Mr Grote brought forward his motion for introducing voting by ballot in the election of members of Parliament, which he advocated at great length. He relied fully and surely on the ballot as the means of destroying all influence over voters. No promise would be asked or given except those which coincided with the voters' inclination; nor would the proper and legitimate influence of wealth be at all destroyed by it. It was one of the first duties of government to remove, as far as possible, all temptation to dishonesty on the part of the people, and he reckoned the ballot one of the most effectual means of doing so.—Sir William Inglis seconded the motion, which was farther supported by Mr Tayleur, Mr C. Berkeley, Mr Cobbett, Dr Lushington, Mr O'Connell, and others, and opposed by Lord Althorp, Earl Darlington, Major Fancourt, and Sir R. Peel.—Upon a division, there appeared—Ayes, 106; Noes, 211.—Majority against the motion, 105.

3. AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.—On Friday (26th), the Marquis of Chandos introduced a motion in reference to the present distressed state of the agricultural interests. He could state, from certain knowledge, that the distress of the farmers was increasing daily. All that he desired was, that the farmer should be allowed the same advantages as the manufacturer. For the last four or five years no agricultural tax of any amount that bore directly on the farmer had been taken off. He therefore moved the following resolution:—"That in any reduction of taxation which it may be deemed expedient to adopt, it is necessary that the interests of the agricultural portion of the community should be duly considered."—Mr R. Palmer seconded the resolution, and it was supported by Mr Cobbett, Sir T. Freemantle, Mr Henry Handley, Mr Cutlar Fergusson, Sir John Tyrell, Mr Sinclair, Sir Edward Knatchbull, and Mr O'Connell.—Lord Althorp opposed it on the score of its interfering with his own motion for a committee to inquire into the state of the agricultural interests; and the motion was ultimately rejected by a majority of 28—the numbers being, Ayes, 90; Noes, 118.—On Friday (May 3), the committee here alluded to by his Lordship, was, on his own motion, appointed, and, at the same time, one to inquire into the state of the commercial interest.

4. REDUCTION OF MALT DUTY.—On the same day, Sir William Inglis moved that the duty on malt be reduced from 20s. 3d. to 10s. per quarter. He was at a loss to conceive why the landlords should bear so large, and the fundholders so small a share of the burdens of the country. He conceived that the reduction of the malt duty would be an exceedingly proper reduction, and a great relief to the country.—Mr Parrott seconded the motion. The revenue derived from the malt tax was £4,325,000; but if half the duty were taken off, the increase of consumption would be so great, that the actual deficiency would probably not exceed £1,200,000.—The motion was farther supported by Mr Hume, Mr Bennet, Mr A. Baring, Sir E. Wilmot, Mr D. W. Harvey, Mr M. Phillips, Mr R. Palmer, Captain Gordon, Mr O'Connell, Mr Lloyd, &c.—Lord Althorp opposed it, on the ground that its adoption would render indispensable the imposition of a property tax, to which he was extremely averse. He was aware that his refusal to take off the house and window taxes had made him unpopular in the city, and that his refusal to repeal the malt duty had made him unpopular in the country.—That he could not help. He was determined, as long as he retained his situation in the government, to act with impartiality towards all parts of the country.—After a few observations from Lord John Russell, the house divided, when there appeared—For the motion, 162; against it, 152.—Majority against Ministers, 10.—(The result of this motion, which completely upset the recent budget, naturally caused a great sensation in the house, and Lord Althorp declined proceeding with any other business for the night. His only observation upon the division was, "that it had placed Ministers in a situation of extreme embarrassment, and that his colleagues must be consulted respecting the course government must now pursue." The resolution, on being put from the chair, was carried amidst loud and general cheering.

5. MINISTERIAL DIFFICULTIES.—On Monday (29th), there was a great throng of members to the house, and the greatest interest prevailed to learn the course Ministers were determined to pursue under the circumstances in which they were placed by the vote of Friday, on the malt tax.—Lord Althorp, being called on by the Speaker, stated, that the decision of the house on Friday night had placed his Majesty's government in a most embarrassing situation. It had been considered desirable by his Majesty's Ministers that the subject should be again brought under the consideration of the house, that hon. members might see clearly the full consequences of the former vote, and come to a final determination, with a full knowledge of what the state of the case in reality was. With this view, he announced his intention, upon the motion of the hon. Bart., the member for the city of London (Sir John Key, for the repeal of the house and window taxes, which stood for next day), to move, as an amendment, the following resolution:—"That the deficiency in the revenue which would be occasioned by the reduction of the duty upon malt to 10s. the quarter, and by the repeal of the tax upon houses and windows, could only be supplied by the substitution of a tax upon real property, or an extensive change in our financial system, which at present would be inexpedient."—Sir W. Inglis begged to ask the noble Lord whether he intended to carry into effect the resolution of Friday night.—Lord Althorp said, that he stated on Friday night that his intention was merely to refrain from offering any farther opposition to the resolution on that night.—The Marquis of Chandos expressed his regret that the Ministers should attempt to get rid of the deliberate vote of the house on Friday night. He should feel ashamed of himself if he were to alter the vote he had given, and sooner than do so, he would give up his seat.—Mr Tenyson said, that Ministers were no longer the masters, but the servants of the House of Commons, and, if outvoted, ought at once to resign their power. He was ready to submit to the imposition of a property tax: so far from being a grievance to the landed interest, it would be a stimulus to agriculture, and increase the prosperity of all classes.—Mr Robinson was sure, that, if the government succeeded in carrying this vote, they would create as much obloquy and discussion out of doors as it was possible to conceive. He most solemnly invoked the house, without reference to the vote itself, to consider what must be the inevitable consequence of their overturning the vote of Friday last.—Sir John Wrottesley protested against the doctrine, that, because in a house of 300 members, a resolution had been carried, therefore the remaining members of the house should be bound by their decision.—Mr M. Attwood dreaded the consequences of rescinding a vote of that house. He trusted that the house would consider well the consequences of such a step.—Mr Hall Dare would support a property tax, believing it to be absolutely necessary that the revenue should be maintained at its present height.—Mr Alexander Baring preferred, if no alternative remained than to abandon the reduction in the duty upon malt, or to adopt a property and income tax, to rescind the resolution of Friday last.—Sir Robert Peel, though favourable to all possible reductions in taxation, would also look to the permanence of the institutions of the country. He would not consent to the reduction on the duty upon malt until he saw a proper substitute for it. Though evil might arise from rescinding a resolution of that house, yet greater evils would undoubtedly arise from acting upon a vote passed by not one-half of the number of its members.—Lord Sandon conceived it to be highly essential to the interests of the country, that the present Ministers should remain in office, and he agreed to the abandonment of the reduction in the duty upon malt.—After a few observations from Lord Ebrington and other members, the subject dropped.

6. GLASGOW LOTTERY.—On the same evening, Sir Robert Inglis begged Lord Althorp to give some explanation respecting a "lottery" which had been going forward at Glasgow, and which he understood to be forbidden by statute.—Lord Althorp confessed he had known nothing at all of the bill for sanctioning it, until it was passed. The word "lottery" did not occur until very near the end of the bill.—Sir R. Peel said the bill might be repealed—but was informed by an hon. member that the lottery was already drawn, and the conversation terminated.

7. ORDINANCE ESTIMATES.—On the same evening, Colonel Maberley brought forward the ordinance estimates for the year, all of which, after some resistance from Mr Hume, were voted.—It was stated that there was a saving of £83,000, as compared with those of last year.

8. STATISTICAL WORKS.—On the same evening, Mr Hume, after eulogising in high terms a work entitled a "Digest of Public Documents since the year 1799," by a Mr Marshall, moved that the sum of £2625 be paid to Mr Marshall for 1250 copies of his work, for the use of members, which motion, after some objections, was agreed to.

9. HOUSE AND WINDOW TAXES.—On Tuesday (30th), Sir John Key brought forward his promise motion for the repeal of the house and window tax, the result of which was looked to with intense interest. He observed, that the house tax at present force was assessed upon the annual value of all inhabited houses above £10 per annum, upon the following graduated scale:—£10, and under £20, 1s. 6d. in the pound; £20, and under £40, 2s. 3d.; £40 and upwards, 2s. 10d. Its present enormous amount exercised a most destructive influence upon trade, and absorbed a large portion of the incomes and disposable means of the industrious classes. The house tax, appeared by the returns of the House of Commons produced in the year ending in 1832, the net amount of £1,357,041, 13s. 11½d., of which sum, considerably more than one-half was paid by the city of London and the suburban districts; and with the addition of the three great trading counties, it would appear that three-fourths of the whole tax were paid by the manufacturing districts of the kingdom. The City of London Tavern alone actually paid for taxes, as an inhabited house, £141, 13s. 4d.; and in Cheapside the Poultry, and Cornhill, more than a hundred houses were assessed at upwards of £160 per annum. The hon. Baronet then reasoned upon the enormous expense of collecting the assessed taxes, it being £5, 7s. 7d. per cent.; whilst the cost of the customs and excise is only £6, 6s. 4½d.; and that of the star revenue no more than £2, 9s. 10d. He concluded by moving "That such portion of the assessed tax as related to the house and window tax be repealed."

—Mr Alderman Wood seconded the motion.—Lord Althorp, in rising to oppose the motion, felt necessary to allude to the recent vote on the duty, and to couple it with the present, as, if either one or other, or both, were adopted, it would be absolutely necessary to impose a property tax. If the latter were done, it would not be politic to impose one which would produce less than ten or twelve millions per annum; and he could not but recollect his odious the last property tax was to the whole nation. The inquisitorial proceedings of foreign governments were nothing compared to the dissecting and examining of men's private means and fortunes, which such a tax renders necessary. It led to fraud, false return, and a whole complication of evils. Should the house, however, adopt the motion of the honourable Baronet this night, he should retire from the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. The following amendment was then proposed by the noble Lord:—"That the deficiency in the revenue which would be occasioned by reduction of the tax upon malt to 10s. per quarter, and by the repeal of the tax upon houses and windows, could only be supplied by the substitution of a tax upon property and income, which would at present be inexpedient."—Mr Hume hoped the house would be true to its vote of the preceding Friday; but the present motion should unfortunately be lost, and would move that a tax on property and income be substituted for the present house and window tax, and the reduction on the malt tax.—Mr Robinson said, that to rescind the vote of Friday last would be fatal to the character of the house.—Mr Cobbett followed on the same side, and entered into an elaborate figurative statement, to show that all the taxes were specially framed so as only to oppress the poor and industrious, and bear lightly on the rich.—Spring Rice denied that the rich were taxed at a higher rate than the poor. The house of the Marquis of Stafford was assessed at £3900 per annum; Devonshire House at £2500; Northumberland House at £1500; Chesterfield House at £200; Lansdowne House at £1650; Apsley House at £1350; North House at £1000; and Burlington House at £1300. The number of houses paying window duty in England was no more than 377,441, whilst the whole number of houses was 2,384,879; hence, no more than 2,467,908 were exempted from the window tax. He decidedly opposed the motion.—Mr Serjeant Spankie supported the motion.—Sir R. Peel said he would unquestionably oppose this proposition, and also vote for rescinding the vote on the malt tax. The effect of the carrying of either of these measures would be the defrauding of the public creditor, as the present finances of the country could not allow of such sweeping repeals of taxation. He was, moreover, decidedly opposed to a property tax.—Mr O'Connell shuddered to contemplate the consequences of rescinding the vote on the malt tax. He was confident a million of persons would next morning declare their determination to pay no taxes at all.—Sir Francis Burdett said ould have supported the motion, if its adoption had embarrassed Ministers; but as that was the case, he sought every prudent and honest man was bound to vote against it.—Dr Lushington and Mr William rougham made similar observations.—Mr D. W. Harvey and Mr Tennyson supported the motion, and advocated a property tax.—The house then divided.—For the motion, 157; against it, 355.—Majority against the repeal, 198.—The house subsequently divided on Sir William Ingilby's motion of the previous Friday, which was rescinded by a majority of 162, being 238 to 76.—The question of the house and window taxes was again brought before the house on Tuesday, May 21, by Sir Samuel Whalley, who said he did so in the confidence that Ministers, from the public feeling which had been manifested at the result of the late debate, would now be anxious to accede to the proposition.—Mr Alderman Wood seconded the motion, which was resisted by Mr Spring Rice, the Attorney-General, and Lord Althorp; and a house having divided, there appeared.—For the motion, 124; against it, 273.—Majority for Ministers, 149.

10. PROPERTY TAX.—On Thursday (May 2), Colonel Torrens brought forward a motion for substituting a property tax for the taxes which press on the distasteful classes.—Lord Althorp said he declined together entering into a discussion on the subject, and that all he would say was, that the arguments of the hon. and gallant mover were far from being satisfactory.—The motion was accordingly negatived without a division.

11. POOR LAWS FOR IRELAND.—On the same day, Mr Richards introduced his motion for the establishment of poor laws in Ireland. He contended that poor laws were founded in natural justice, and described the evil consequences of the suppression of monasteries, and the consequent robbery of the rights of the poor. One consequence of the want of poor laws was the readiness of the people to listen to political agitators. He sought not by his present motion to make men charitable, but only to enforce the claims of justice.—Mr J. Grattan seconded the motion.—Lord Althorp was not prepared to declare against poor laws; but from the evils which had accompanied the English system, he thought an inquiry should first be instituted, and therefore moved as an amendment, That a humble address be presented to his Majesty, to give directions for issuing a commission of inquiry into the condition of the poorer classes of Ireland, and the various institutions established there for their relief.—Mr O'Connell seconded the amendment, and expressed his hearty satisfaction at the course proposed by the noble Lord. He considered the horror of the poor laws so great, that he never would give his consent to them in Ireland. Were he disposed to agitate or the introduction of such a system into Ireland, he could raise such a commotion as would shake the foundations of society. The poor laws produce in England nothing but disgrace and degradation. The people of Ireland were suffering, undoubtedly, under every deep distress; but he implored the house not to afflict a farther and a greater curse upon that unhappy country, by degrading the moral feelings of the people of Ireland, and destroying their sense of personal independence.—Mr D. W. Harvey, Mr H. Grattan, and Mr Culler Fergusson, supported the motion, which was opposed by Mr Hume, Col. Conolly, Sir R. Peel, and others, and finally negatived without division, and Lord Althorp's amendment adopted.

12. DEBTOR AND CREDITOR IN SCOTLAND.—On the same evening, the Lord Advocate obtained leave to bring in a bill for rendering the payment of creditors more certain and expeditious, and for the better regulation of mercantile bankruptcies.—(The London journals state, that from the noise in the house, the explanation by the learned Lord of the principle of the bill could not be heard, nor have we seen any statement regarding it elsewhere.)

13. UNEQUAL TAXATION.—On Friday (May 3d), Mr Cobbett made a motion regarding various taxes, which he contended had been framed expressly for grinding the poor and industrious classes, and to exempt the rich from their operation. The hon. member went into an elaborate statement of figures and calculations in support of his motion, pointing out particularly the legacy, auction, and stamp duties, as most unjust and partial. The poor, he said, paid forty times more taxation than the rich. He concluded by moving that the house will, without delay, equalize these duties so as to make peers, baronets, nobles, and great landowners, pay an equal proportion with the labouring classes.—Mr Spring Rice, after remarking the extreme want of candour in the statements just made, read numerous extracts from public documents, in direct disproof of them all.—After a few observations by other members, the house divided, when there appeared.—For Mr Cobbett's motion, 26; against it, 250.—Majority against it, 224.

14. ARMY ESTIMATES.—On the same evening, Mr Ellice moved that the sum of £3,163,216 be granted to his Majesty, to defray the expenses of the land forces at home and abroad, from the 3d of April 1833, to the 31st of March 1834. The right hon. gentleman stated, that the number of troops had this year been increased 6000; 3000 additional having been required for Ireland, and the rest for the Mauritius and the West Indies.—Mr Hume moved, as an amendment, that the army be reduced by 19,000 men.—After a discussion of considerable length, the house divided.—For the motion, 233; for the amendment, 70.—Majority for Ministers, 168.—On Friday (10th), the rest of the grants were voted without almost any opposition, unless upon the proposition that £103,318 be voted for paying the volunteer corps of Great Britain and Ireland, when Mr Hume moved that only half that sum be granted. A warm discussion followed; but the amendment was finally negatived by a majority of 205 to 53.

15. IRISH CHURCH REFORM BILL.—On Monday (6th), after some preliminary discussion respecting the proper mode of bringing forward this bill, Mr Shaw (member for Dublin University) moved, that this bill be read a second time that day six months. He fully approved of many parts of the bill—the abolition of pluralities and the vestry cess, the augmentation of small livings and the required residence of the clergy; but he was strongly opposed to the violation of church property it included, and reducing the numbers of the bishops and clergy.—Mr Estcourt seconded the amendment, and expressed his entire concurrence in Mr Shaw's opinions.—Mr Stanley commented at some length on the inconsistency of those members, who, while they admitted the propriety of the principal clauses of the bill, would yet throw it aside altogether, on account of some frivolous objections. The arguments he had heard against the bill were so trifling and immaterial, that he would not occupy the time of the house by combating them.—Sir R. Inglis objected to the bill in toto.—Sir R. Peel took the same view of the question as Mr Shaw. His opposition to the measure rested chiefly on the ground, that, if the principle of applying the additional value of improved church property to state purposes were admitted, then the right to every kind of property might in like manner be invaded.—Lord Althorp agreed with Sir R. Peel as to the danger of interfering with the established right of property, but he thought the principle did not fairly apply in the present instance. He was perfectly convinced of the propriety of reducing the number of bishoprics.—Upon a division, Mr Shaw's amendment was negatived by a majority of 239; being—Ayes, 78; Noes, 317.—The bill was then read a second time.

16. ADVERTISEMENT DUTY.—The house having, after the above discussion, gone into a committee on the stamp duties acts, Lord Althorp moved that a fixed duty of 1s. 6d. be in future exacted on all advertisements, instead of the graduated scale he had formerly recommended, which was unanimously agreed to.

17. QUAKERS' AFFIRMATIONS.—On Tuesday (7th), upon the members of the committee appointed to investigate the proceeding of the late Coleraine election coming to the table to be sworn, the Speaker called the attention of the house to the case of Mr Pease, the Quaker, who had been chosen one of the committee, and wished to know if his affirmation, which had been accepted on his taking his seat as a member of the house, implied its acceptance under all the duties of a member of Parliament. The case had never occurred before.—Mr O'Connell, Sir R. Peel, Lord Althorp, &c. thought the affirmation ought to be received, which was accordingly done, nem. con.—On the following day, Lord Morpeth obtained leave to bring in a bill for enabling Quakers and Moravians to make an affirmation in all cases where an oath was at present required. He said that Quakers were now only subject to two disqualifications, owing to their indisposition to take oaths—namely, holding offices under government, and serving on juries. Nevertheless, Quakers frequently sat as jurors, even at present.

18. CROWN LANDS.—In consequence of a message from his Majesty, recommending that "an inquiry should be made into the land revenues of the crown, with the view of rendering them more efficient to the public service," Lord Althorp, on Tuesday (7th), proposed the appointment of a select committee for that purpose, observing, that the statements made by honourable members regarding the value and importance of these would be found to be greatly exaggerated.

19. CHAMBERLAINSHIP OF ETRICK FOREST.—On Wednesday (8th), Mr Hume moved that an address be presented to his Majesty, praying that the law-officers of the crown be directed to inquire into the validity of the right of Lord Dunglass to hold the office of Chamberlain of Etrick Forest, under the appointment of George the Fourth, after the demise of that sovereign, in order to have it decided by the courts of law in Scotland. The hon. member said, it had been pretended that the salary attached to this office had been reduced from £500 to £300; but the fact was, that the salary of the office was £500 Scots, that is to say, £8, 12s. sterling, and the sum now received was £300 sterling, instead of £8, 12s., which was the plain English for £500 Scots. However, he denied the validity of the grant altogether, as the King, having only a life interest in the hereditary revenues of the crown, could have no right to grant this office for any period extending beyond that of his own existence, and the grant, therefore, must have become void on the late demise of the crown, and the accession of his present Majesty.—The Lord Advocate said that his own opinion was, that the grant was illegal, but it was in reality only another mode of conferring a pension.—The motion was agreed to.

20. SAVINGS' BANKS' ANNUITIES BILL.—On the same evening, this bill, the nature of which we detailed in our last, was read a third time and passed.

21. DRAMATIC AUTHORS' BILL.—This bill was also read a third time and passed on the above evening.

22. DUTCH EMBARGO.—On Friday (10th), Alderman Thompson moved for an account of all vessels detained under the order in council of the 5th of November last, laying an embargo on Dutch vessels in our ports; also for copies of all applications that had been made to the Privy Council for the release of such vessels. He supported his motion in a speech of considerable length, dwelling upon the injury which the merchants of this country sustained from the policy of Ministers towards Holland. The injury was much greater to England than to Holland, whose merchants evaded the order in council by trading under the Hanoverian and other flags. He had petitions from South Shields, Sunderland, and Newcastle, complaining of the injury inflicted upon them by the embargo. In 1832, the number of British vessels engaged in the trade to Holland was 1617; tonnage 179,488. Every ton of this was now idle. There was also considerable alarm and inconvenience felt in the East Indies, lest the Dutch should make reprisals on our vessels at Batavia. In point of fact, many of the cargoes which we had seized belonged to English capitalists, or were insured in England; and not one commercial failure had occurred in Holland in consequence of our measures.—Lord Palmerston was perfectly well aware of the inconvenience created by the embargo, but asserted the necessity of the measure by the obstinacy of the King of Holland. France and England had adopted an embargo to avoid a war.—Mr Lyall, Mr Baring, Sir Robert Peel, and others, strongly reprobated the treatment of the King of Holland, which they declared most unwarrantable and illegal.—After a few words in reply from Lord J. Russell and Lord Althorp, defending the conduct of government, the motion was agreed to.

23. AFFAIRS IN THE EAST.—On the same evening, Mr Hume moved for information respecting the part taken by Great Britain in the recent momentous transactions in the East. As far as he could learn, our negotiations there had been conducted with great want of judgment and good policy.—Lord Palmerston opposed the motion, on the score that matters were not yet mature for a disclosure; but he was confident that in due time he would be able to show that Ministers had not neglected their duty in respect to these affairs.—The motion was withdrawn.

24. BANK AND EAST INDIA CHARTERS.—In reply to a question from Mr Baring on the above evening, Lord Althorp stated that he intended to bring forward the bank question towards the end of next week; and Mr Charles Grant said that he should most certainly bring forward the East India question in the course of the session, but could not fix any time, as the correspondence between the company and the government was still going on.—Lord Althorp has since given notice that he will submit the bank question to the house on Friday, 31st May; and Mr Grant that he will move resolutions relative to the East India Company's charter on the 11th of June.—(We see it announced in a respectable London journal (the Observer), that the bank directors, after a protracted negotiation, have finally made an arrangement with the government, which they hope the proprietors will sanction, and even approve. The terms of the bargain are, by a mutual understanding, to be kept secret until the morning of the day on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to expound his plan to the House of Commons.)

25. TRIAL OF A PEER FOR CONSPIRACY.—On Monday (May 13), the Earl of Winchelsea called the attention of the House of Lords to the report of the trial of Lord Teynham for conspiracy (vide our English news), and was proceeding to animadvert on the slur cast on the House of Lords by the circumstance, when he was interrupted by the Lord Chancellor, who stated, that Lord Teynham must yet be considered as "upon his trial." Sentence could not be pronounced until next term, and before that, Lord Teynham might move to have the verdict set aside.

26. CORN LAWS.—On Tuesday (14th), Earl Fitzwilliam submitted a long series of resolutions for a change in the duties on foreign corn. The noble Earl spoke at great length in support of his resolutions, and advocated a free trade in corn, characterising the present corn laws as framed for and producing a modified scarcity in corn. In the course of his observations, he expressed his conviction that the assembly he addressed was so much under the influence of interest and prejudice, as to be incapable of forming an impartial opinion upon the subject of his dissertation.—The Earl of Ripon (late Lord Goderich) resisted the resolutions, on account of the time and circumstances under which they were brought forward, from the fallacious premises built upon them, and because they had for their object the pulling down of the whole present structure, and were to raise nothing in its stead. He was satisfied (and he mentioned several cases to substantiate the fact) that the present corn laws had neither produced nor perpetuated a higher amount of poor's rates. The noble Earl concluded by saying, he was sure that the people themselves would be the first to thank their Lordships for resisting the noble Earl's resolutions.—The Earl of Winchelsea in strong terms deprecated the disturbing of the present system. He had witnessed greater distress amongst the manufacturing classes during that year, when wheat was 45s. a-quarter, than when it was at its highest price.—The Earl of Wicklow contended that a free trade in corn would be attended with many disadvantages affecting the manufacturing interest.—Earl Fitzwilliam replied, and the resolutions were put and negatived without a division.—On the following Friday (17th), Mr Whitmore introduced the subject into the House of Commons, and proposed a fixed moderate duty (he did not state the amount) in place of the present varying one.—Mr O'Connell alone spoke at any length in support of the motion, which was resisted by Lord Newark, Mr F. O'Connor, Captain Heathcote, Colonel Wood, Mr C. Fergusson, Mr Bennet, Colonel Conolly, &c. &c., and by Lord Althorp, who moved the previous question of the evening.—Upon a division, there appeared—For Lord Althorp's amendment, 305; against it, 106.—Majority for Ministers, 199.

27. ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.—On Monday (13th), Lord Suffield presented 201 petitions for the immediate abolition of slavery, one of which was signed by 179,576 females. It was so massive, that the noble Lord had some difficulty in placing the petition on the table, and much laughter was excited by the circumstance. He next presented a petition from Edinburgh, signed by 13,500 females, with a similar prayer. He said he had now presented 2000 petitions, and had a thousand more to present. The noble Lord protested against the government plan of emancipation which had been made public, as equally unjust and inefficient.—On the same day, in the House of Commons, Mr Buxton presented (amongst 300 others) a petition to the same purpose, from about 190,000 females, which, the reporters state, was as large as a sack of flour, and required the strength of Mr Buxton, and three other members, to lift on the table. The first name on it was Amelia Opie.—Mr Stanley also presented several petitions on the same subject, and then proceeded, at very great length, to unfold and defend the plan of emancipation decided on by government. From our limits, we are precluded from attempting any outline of the eloquent and argumentative speech of the right honourable secretary, and must restrict ourselves to simply stating the resolutions he concluded by proposing:—

1. That immediate and effectual measures be taken for the entire abolition of slavery throughout the colonies, under such provisions for regulating the condition of the negroes, as may combine their welfare with the interests of the proprietors.

2. That it is expedient that all children born after the passing of any act, or who shall be under the age of six years, at the time of passing any act of Parliament for this purpose, be declared free; subject, nevertheless, to such temporary restrictions as may be deemed necessary for their support and maintenance.

3. That all persons now slaves be entitled to be registered as apprenticed labourers, and to acquire thereby all rights and privileges of freemen; subject to the restriction of labouring, under conditions, and for a time to be fixed by Parliament, for their present owners.

4. That to provide against the risk of loss which his Majesty's colonial possessions might sustain by the abolition of slavery, his Majesty be enabled to advance, by way of loan, to be raised from time to time, a sum not exceeding in the whole £15,000,000, to be repaid in such manner, and at such rate of interest, as shall be prescribed by Parliament.

5. That his Majesty be enabled to defray any such expense he may incur in establishing an efficient stipendiary magistracy in the colonies, and in aiding the local legislatures in providing for the religious and moral education of the negro population to be emancipated.

Lord Howick said he was compelled, from a sense of duty, to object to the plan in toto, and proceeded at great length to show that it was as unfair to the negro as to the master.—After a few remarks from Sir R. Peel, Mr Buxton, and others, the further discussion of the question was postponed to the 30th May; and it is generally understood that nothing more will be done upon it during the present session.—(It seems not a little remarkable that the first decided opposition to this measure of the government should be given by the son of the Premier. It since appears, however, to have been received with disavowal by all parties in the kingdom. The West India merchants in London have unequivocally declared against it; while the immediate abolitionists denounce it as a measure for "perpetuating" slavery. It is said that the building and freighting of vessels for the West Indies have been entirely stopped—individuals refusing to fulfil their contracts; in short, excitement and apprehension amongst all connected with the colonies seem to be at the highest pitch.)

28. MR COBBETT AND SIR R. PEEL.—On Thursday (16th), agreeably to the consent of all who had notices on the paper, and at the earnest solicitation of Sir R. Peel, who said he was under the necessity of leaving town, the motion of the hon. member for Oldham had the preference of all others, and he rose amidst universal calls.—Mr Cobbett proceeded to move an address to the King to erase the name of Sir R. Peel from the list of Privy Counsellors, on the ground of his want of knowledge, and proceeding, in spite of his (Mr Cobbett's) forewarnings, in the currency measures of 1819, 1822, and 1826. He moved a long series of resolutions, embodying his sentiments on the subject, and contended that the deficient knowledge, and disregard of warning, evinced by Sir R. Peel, justified the motion now made.—Mr Fielden having seconded the motion, Sir R. Peel rose, amidst loud and universal cheering, and proceeded to defend himself from the attack made on him, in a strain of the most poignant sarcasm and retort. His chief subject of comment was Mr Cobbett's own writings, especially a letter addressed to himself by the designation of "Baronet and Cotton-Spinner." "Nothing," says the Spectator, "could be more triumphant than Sir Robert's reply, or more effective than the castigation which he lavishly bestowed on the aggressor in the strife." The hon. Baronet was interrupted at almost every sentence by universal cheering, and sat down amidst thunders of applause from all parts of the house.—When Mr Cobbett rose to reply, the scene that occurred (says the Morning Chronicle) was such as we have seldom witnessed, even in the most stormy of our public meetings; the continued yells of indignant execration with which every sentence of the honourable member was assailed, rendered him for a considerable time perfectly inaudible. When order was somewhat restored, he proceeded to apply certain abusive epithets to Sir Robert Peel, for which he was called to order by the Speaker; and had to apologise to the house. After a few other remarks, the house divided (Sir Robert Peel having first withdrawn, amidst loud and long-continued cheering).—For the motion, 4; against it, 298.—Majority against Mr Cobbett's motion, 294.—Lord Althorp then said, that never within his memory or knowledge had a personal attack been made within those walls upon such grounds, or supported like that of Mr Cobbett, and he proposed "that the resolutions which had been moved be not entered on the minutes."—Mr Cobbett, Mr Fielden, and Mr Lalor, opposed the motion.—The house again divided.—For Lord Althorp's motion, 295; against it, 4.—Majority for expunging the proceedings, 291.—(The four members who composed the minority were Mr T. Attwood, Mr Roe, Mr J. O'Connell, and Mr Lalor; the tellers being Mr Cobbett and Mr Fielden.)

29. OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH.—On the above evening, Sir Andrew Agnew moved the second reading of this bill.—Mr Lefroy seconded the motion.—Mr Plumtree, Mr Lefroy, Mr R. Grant, Mr Shaw, Mr Hardy, Mr Buxton, and Mr A. Johnstone, supported the bill.—It was strongly opposed by Mr Poulter, Mr Roebuck, Lord Althorp, Lord Morpeth, and Mr Hill.—The house divided.—For the second reading, 73; against it, 79.—Majority, 6: so the bill is lost.—(It appears to be almost universally thought that this measure was by far too arbitrary and extreme in its character, and that, although a more moderate one may be equally proper and necessary, that of the hon. Baronet was more likely to be productive of evil than good.)

Foreign News.

FRANCE.

THE principal topic of interest which has engaged the attention of our southern neighbours since our last, is the accouchement of the Duchess de Berri, who was delivered of a daughter, at her residence in Blaye, on the 10th ult. The circumstances attending this event are of rather an odd character. The officials of the new dynasty in France appear to have taken every precaution that no farther doubt should exist respecting the duchess's "untoward" situation; and it must certainly be allowed that their measures for this purpose were dictated with rather more regard to truth than delicacy. At about half-past three in the morning, a crowd of doctors, magistrates, commanders of garrisons, and presidents of legal and commercial tribunals, were summoned to attend in the room adjoining the one in which the duchess lay. The following is an extract from the official account of what then took place:—

Dr Dubois, General Bugeaud, and M. Delord, were in the room when the pains first came on, and declared to the other witnesses that the Duchess de Berri had been delivered, at twenty minutes before three o'clock, after suffering but a very short time; that they saw her in labour, and receiving the assistance of Dr Deneux and Dr Menière, Dr Dubois remaining in the apartment till the delivery. General Bugeaud then entered, and asked the duchess whether she would receive the witnesses. She answered, "Yes, as soon as the child is washed and dressed." A few minutes afterwards, Madame d'Hauteport came out, by desire of the duchess, to request that the witnesses would enter, which we did immediately. We found the duchess lying in her bed, with a new-born child on her left side. At the foot of the bed were seated Madame d'Hauteport and Madame Hanster; Dr Deneux and Dr Menière were standing at its head. President Pastoureaux then approached the princess, and addressed to her in a loud voice the following questions:—"Is it to the Duchess de Berri that I have the honour to speak?" "Yes." "You are positively the Duchess de Berri?" "Yes, Sir." "Is the new-born infant near you yours?" "Yes, Sir, this infant is mine." "What is its sex?" "It is of the female sex. Moreover, I have charged M. Deneux to make declaration thereof." And, instantly, Louis Charles Deneux, Doctor in Medicine, ex-Professor of Clinical Midwifery of the Faculty of Paris, Titular Member of the Royal Academy of Medicine, made the following declaration:—"I have just delivered the Duchess de Berri, here present, wife by lawful marriage of Count Hector Lucchesi Palli, of the Princes of Campo-Franco, Gentleman of the Chamber of the King of the Two Sicilies, domiciliated at Palermo."

The child is named Anne Marie Rosalie. The titular father, Count Lucchesi Palli, is Neapolitan envoy at the Hague, from which, as stated by the Times, he has not absented himself during the last twelve months at least. The same paper also asserts that the count only consented that the child should be affiliated to him on condition of receiving £40,000; and that the real father is M. Guibours, her confidential adviser, who has been with her in most of her wanderings. These assertions, however, seem to proceed on no veritable authority. The duchess is to be sent to Naples as soon as she is well enough to bear the voyage. A vessel is already ordered to proceed to Blaye in order to take her there.

Since the preceding was in types, Paris papers of late date have been received, stating that the marriage of the Duchess de Berri to Count Lucchesi Palli has been clearly ascertained; that the marriage took place at Massa, three days previously to her leaving Marseilles. And Viscount Chateaubriand is about to undertake a mission to the ex-royal family of France, to obtain their consent to the Countess Palli retaining the title, rank, and honours of a princess of the blood, notwithstanding her marriage.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

SOMETHING like a temporary settlement, at least, of some of the long pending points of dispute between Holland and Belgium, has at last been effected. On Tuesday, May 21st, a preliminary treaty was signed by the Plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, France, and Holland. The treaty consists of six articles, by the first of which the English and French embargoes will be taken off the respective ports of each nation, and the consequent measures in interruption of the navigation by the Dutch nation will be removed. 2. The intercourse between the respective parties will assume the same posture as before the French expedition in November last, and the services of the French and English squadrons be dispensed with. 3. The Dutch garrison of Antwerp, prisoners of war, will be sent home. 4. The armistice between Holland and Belgium will be continued till the settlement of a permanent separation. 5. The navigation of the Scheldt will in the meantime remain free. 6. The navigation of the Meuse during the same period will be open subject to the tariff settled by the treaty of Mayence. It is obvious, from the tenor of this treaty, that while it is so far good as implying a removal of much mutual annoyance, the subsequent negotiation will be both critical and important. The King of Holland does not recognise Leopold as King of Belgium, no pledge himself, in any way, to consent to any one of the demands either of Belgium or of Great Britain and France; and the palpable concessions now made to his interest, indeed, seem not a little inconsistent with the severe coercive measures lately adopted by the mediatory powers to compel him to an arrangement. There seems little doubt, that the great deterioration and loud complaints of the commercial interests of the respective kingdoms, from the hostile position in which they stood, have had much influence in bringing about the present treaty; and it is no improbable that the same cause may ultimately lead to a more certain and definite termination of disputes, although the reservation of the Dutch kin respecting the Belgian throne certainly looks equivocal.

The Brussels papers are principally filled with accounts of the prosecution of the press by the military officers of the government, who openly attack the editors of the journals unfavourable to the king, and in some instances these affrays have terminated fatally.

King Leopold is, in the meantime, making a royal progress through his dominions, and is everywhere well received. The Earl of Durham arrived at Bruges with a splendid retinue, during the king's sojourn there, and it was said would accompany him to Ostend.

TURKEY.

THE affairs of the East appear now to be in a fair train for settlement. Accounts from Alexandria of the 18th April represent the treaty between the Sultan and Mehemet Ali to be concluded. A courier stated to have arrived there from Ibrahim's headquarters, bringing the intelligence of the conclusion of the treaty on terms most favourable to the Pash, and that the city was illuminated, and other demonstrations of joy had taken place in consequence. The whole of Syria and the district of Adama are said to have been ceded to Mehemet. It appears that the protraction of a settlement between the Sublime Porte and Mehemet Ali was latterly occasioned by the Sultan, who seems to have gathered courage from the multiplicity of friendly hands stretched out to his rescue. Strange to tell, it is affirmed that he appeared inclined to accept the aid of Russia—the ancient, we might rather say, the hereditary foe of Turkey—rather than that of France or England; and recent accounts from Constantinople state, that his diffidence in treating was suspected to be with a view to gain time till Russian auxiliaries arrive. A French fleet, however, was collecting in the Dardanelles, where Lord Ponsonby, the English diplomatist, had arrived, and an English fleet was expected shortly to follow him. This belief would appear to be confirmed, by the circumstance of Sir Pulteney Malcolm having set off to assume the command.

val of the dispatches announcing the death of the

SPAIN.

the last accounts from Spain, the election of cortes who are to attend the Cortes was going on.
Count Altamira, a nobleman of constitutional principles, had been returned for Madrid. It was hoped that the Cortes might yet become more serviceable to the country than was either intended or expected by the Court. Don Carlos had transmitted from Lisbon the king a formal protest against the abolition of the Salic law, to the prejudice of his claims to the throne. He intends, it is said, to renew it when the cortes assemble. Considerable importance is attached to this proceeding in Spain. It is called a proclamation to the Carlists, an appeal to their strength, and the sure forerunner of a civil war. The king is mentioned in the bulletins as enjoying excellent health; whenever he appears in public, he looks wretchedly

PORTUGAL.

ACCORDING to all we can learn, the prospects of Don Pedro have undergone a very favourable change since our last. Considerable reinforcements of men, money, and provisions, are said to have arrived at Oporto, and General Ramarino, at the head of 500 men, and a large number of them Poles, and all old soldiers, is now off the coast of Portugal. These, with other late reinforcements, amount to about 350 men; which increases the disposable force of Pedro to about 7000, leaving about 3000 regulars and 2000 militia for the defence of Oporto. Don Pedro has made up his quarrel with Sartorius, by paying the debt of the fleet; and Marshal Solignac is preparing to take the field against Miguel early in June, with a force of 10,000. It is also reported that great discontent prevails amongst Don Miguel's troops, and even that one or two of his regiments of cavalry have openly revolted. Little reliance, however, is to be placed on these reports, coming to the partial and interested source whence they originate. In the meantime, it appears that a great deal of paltry intrigue is constantly going on in the little court of Don Pedro, the members of which seem to have nothing better to do than to fabricate calumnious reports against each other, and to sow dissensions between their master and the commanders of his troops.

GERMANY.

THE late insurrection at Frankfort, detailed in our pages, still continues to be the subject of much anxiety in Germany, and the Suabian Mercury says that a report is current of the formation of a federal army in the environs of Frankfort, to be composed of from 1000 to 15,000 men, and commanded by a German Prince, who has already distinguished himself by numerous exploits. It is evident that the late attack at Frankfort has given rise to this measure.
But, independently of this, the German governments are resolved on adopting more energetic measures, in which travellers and merchants will unfortunately suffer.

UNITED STATES.

THE Washington papers announce the total destruction of the Treasury building in that city by fire, but state, that almost all the public accounts and important government vouchers have been saved. The manner in which the fire originated has not been ascertained.
The offices of the departments at Washington have been extremely unfortunate. Besides the conflagration of the Capitol, &c. during the war of 1812, the Treasury Office was burnt in January 1801, and the War Office, if we recollect right, the same winter; at which fires, most of the public papers were destroyed belonging to those departments.

SOUTH AMERICA.

THE New York paper states, that while mass was being celebrated in a church near Faguina, in the Republic of Ecuador, on the festival of "Del Corpus," fire was communicated to the building by means of a cigarette, and that, in the rush to the door, it became impossible to open it, and the pressure rendering it impossible to open the whole congregation perished in the flames, except the curate, who escaped through a window. The number of lives lost was estimated at upwards of 500, besides children.

CANADA.

AN official return ordered by Parliament, it appears, that, during the last five years, 1828 to 1832 inclusive, there have been imported into Great Britain from Canada, 387,220 quarters of wheat, barley, oats, peas, and Indian corn; and 230,454 cwt. of beef meal, or flour, oatmeal, Indian meal, and rye meal.—At a recent meeting of the shareholders of the Canada Company in London, it was stated that the total sales of land by the Company, during the year 1832, were 114,804 acres, of which 89,779 obtained an average of 11s. 4d. per acre, and 25,025, in the Huron tract, 7s. 6d. per acre. The produce of these sales is £60,800. The cost of the land sold in the own reserves, at 3s. 2d. per acre, was £14,210; and that in the Huron Tract, £3020. The produce of the sales of land, added to other items of income, made a total of £69,700, leaving a balance in favour of the Company of £35,435. As government intended to raise the minimum price of land from 5s. to 12s. per acre, it was anticipated that the Company would obtain improved prices also.

VAN DIEMAN'S LAND.

A NUMBER of newspapers have lately been received (in Edinburgh) from this colony, some of which are dated 7th December last. The ship North Briton, from Leith, had arrived safe. She sailed from Leith in July 1832, and reached Hobart Town on the 12th November, having made her voyage in less than four months. The country was receiving hundreds of emigrants from Great Britain and Ireland, and also from the East Indies, whence the Europeans proceed to the salubrious climate of Van Dieman's Land for health. The papers are filled with advertisements of stage coaches, omnibusses, carriers' waggons, &c., proceeding from Hobart Town to various places in the interior, and all other kinds of advertisements which are usual in a land of trade and plenty—horse races, balls, and routs, charitable societies, and such like, are among the number. The country was internally quiet and flourishing. The demand for mechanics, labourers, &c. had not diminished; and the necessaries and luxuries of life were in the greatest abundance.

IRELAND.

IRELAND has seldom been so tranquil, for many years, as what it is at the present moment. The outrages, which previously were of daily occurrence, appear to have ceased as if by magic. The Ministerial and Conservative journals attribute this happy change entirely to the effects of the coercion act, for which, they say, the whole of the well-disposed peasantry in the country are most thankful to government. The "Liberal" papers, again, contend that the new state of matters is not in consequence, but in spite, of the Ministerial measure; and complain that it has been converted solely into a means for enforcing the payment of tithe. It appears, indeed, that a party of police were lately publicly reprimanded for putting this in practice.

ENGLAND.

His Majesty has given directions that no articles shall be purchased or delivered for the use of the Palace or Windsor Castle, on Sunday.

The Duke of Wellington seems to take a pleasure in giving proofs of the vigour of his strong constitution.
The other day, before appearing at Lady Salisbury's rout, his Grace hunted at Strathfieldsaye; after a hard run of at least 45 miles, he set out for Hatfield, which is a journey of about 62 miles, and appeared at Lady Salisbury's the same evening, one of the most lively of the party.

The plan for separating the judicial and political duties of the Chancellorship has been given up.

The office of Secretary for Ireland, vacated by Sir John Hobhouse, has been filled up by the appointment of Mr Littleton.

Viscount Granville has been created a Baron and Earl of the United Kingdom, by the title of Baron Leveson of Stone, in the county of Stafford, and Earl Granville.

The infant Viscount Goderich, only son to the Earl of Ripon, now in his sixth year, is heir presumptive to three peerages and four large fortunes. The Countess of Ri-pon succeeded, on the death of her father, the late Earl of Buckinghamshire, to all the unentailed estates of the Hobart family, including their splendid seat of Nocton-hall, in Lincolnshire; Lord Grantham, brother to Lord Ripon, heir to the Countess de Grey, has no son; consequently the infant son of Lord Ripon will probably inherit those honours.

A dinner was given on Wednesday, May 16th, at the Eyre Arms, St John's Wood, to Mr O'Connell, by the working classes of the metropolis. A piece of silver plate was presented to him on the occasion. It cost £200, and consists of an elegant candelabrum and flower-basket, supported by three female figures, representing England, Ireland, and Scotland, adorned by the emblems of their respective countries. The base on one side is decorated with Mr O'Connell's arms; on another, is an inscription in verse, highly flattering to the "Glory of Erin;" and on the third, a prose inscription in the following words:—"Presented to Daniel O'Connell, Esq. M.P., by the working classes resident in London, natives of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the European and American Continents, as a testimony of their esteem and admiration for his splendid and successful exertions in the cause of civil and religious liberty.— London, 15th May 1833." This incident may be viewed as a significant indication of the prevailing feeling amongst the above classes of the metropolis on political matters.

Death of Edmund Kean, Esq.—This eminent tragedian expired at his house at Richmond, on Wednesday morning, the 15th May, at twenty minutes past nine o'clock, in the presence of M. Douchez, his medical attendant, and Mr Lee, his secretary. It is stated that Mr Kean was born in Castle Street, Leicester Square, on the 4th November 1787, from which it would appear he was 45 years of age. He first performed in his fifth year at Drury Lane Theatre as one of the children in the incantation scene in Macbeth.

A fatal duel was fought at Exeter, on the 10th May, between Dr Hennis, a young Irish physician, and Sir John W. Jeffcott, recently appointed Chief Justice of the Vice-Admiralty Court, Sierra Leone. The cause of the meeting was Dr Hennis propagating some calumnious reports of Sir John, which he would neither retract nor substantiate, and which had occasioned Sir John's being dismissed from the family of Colonel Macdonald, with one of whose daughters he was on the eve of marriage.

Dr Hennis received his antagonist's ball in his right side, and fell without returning the fire. He is since dead.

We are very far from being averse to the patronage of foreign talent in Great Britain, as we are convinced it is one great means of stimulating native genius to increased exertion; but we confess, that, in the present circumstances of the country, we never read such notices as the following, which we find in the London journals, without a disagreeable sensation. What must not the poor, industrious, and half-starved mechanic's reflections be, on observing such prodigal and wanton expenditure on foreign luxuries, at a time like the present, on the part of our aristocracy? "Madame Pasta is to have two thousand guineas for her season at the Italian Opera, and it was secured to her before she would agree to come over! Ma-libran is to have two thousand guineas also."

At the general annual meeting of the London Literary Fund held lately, the Duke of Somerset was re-elected president; and the vacancy in the vice-presidency, occasioned by the death of the Earl of Dudley, was filled up by the election of Sir John Malcolm, a compliment equally due to his high literary character, and to his great liberality towards the institution.

Sir Thomas Dyke Acland has, in the last 19 years, planted, on his estates in Devon and Cornwall, 1,500,000 trees, one-third of which are oaks.

On the 30th April, an omnibus, worked by steam, on a new and ingenious principle, was tried on the Paddington road. The inventor has obtained a patent for his very useful discovery. The machine altogether does not exceed the space which an ordinary omnibus with horses attached would occupy, and the appearance is peculiarly neat. The body is capable of accommodating fourteen persons, the engine dividing that from the furnace in the rear. The passengers experience no inconvenience from heat, and coke being the fuel employed, there is no annoyance by smoke. The engine works on a crank, not on the axle, and the propelling power is applied to the wheels by means of iron chains. The chief recommendation is, that there can be no possibility of explosion.
The propelling power is equal to from 15 to 20 miles an hour; but even when the steam is raised to its very highest pressure, there is no risk, the water being deposited in several iron pipes, or what are termed chamber boilers, with a valve to carry off the superfluous steam. The guide, who sits in front, has complete control of the vehicle, and can arrest its progress instantaneously. It left the Patent Steam Coach Company's yard in Charles Street, City Road, at four o'clock, with a full complement of passengers, chiefly ladies, guided, in this instance, by Mr Hancock, the patentee. At first it proceeded at a pace of about six miles an hour; but having cleared the crowd who assembled in large numbers to witness the exhibition, the velocity was increased to the rate of ten miles an hour. It is intended to ply regularly from Paddington to the Bank.

A working carpenter, named Wooral, of Woodsthorpe, has been declared the heir to property worth £120,000, which had been for a long time unclaimed in the Court of Chancery. The discovery of the heir was perfectly accidental.

The great house of Mackintosh and Co. Calcutta, has stopped payment. Its debts are estimated at £2,500,000.
Unusual exertions were made to prop up its falling credit; and it is said that they paid away upwards of £600,000 in the course of two or three weeks previously to their stoppage. The native merchants also did all in their power to prevent the calamity; and the government was applied to, though without effect, to lend their assistance. Rickards, Mackintosh, and Co., of London, have stopped payment in consequence of this failure.
The creditors of Alexander and Co., another great Calcutta house, which failed some time since, have had a second meeting, when a flattering balance-sheet was submitted to them. The distress occasioned by the ruin of the latter concern in India was very extensive; and many persons residing in England, who had deposited large sums in their hands, suffered severely. It is said that the loss of annual income to residents in Cheltenham alone was £70,000.

Loss of the Hibernia.—The Hibernia, Captain Brend, sailed from Liverpool for New South Wales on the 6th December last, with about 232 souls on board, of whom 208 were passengers, going out as settlers. On the 5th April, in about 22° west long, and 4° south lat., at about eleven o'clock in the morning, the second mate went below to draw off the usual allowance of rum for the people, and by some means set fire to the spirits. Various endeavours were used to extinguish the flames, but they increased alarmingly, till they were obliged to batten down the hatches, leaving only small apertures, through which water was continually poured. All, however, was unavailing, and they were compelled to betake themselves to the boats. These, shameful to say, were not sufficient for the reception of more than one-third of their number, and the long-boat, which was the largest, was so old, that great fears were entertained of her going to pieces while hoisting over the ship's side. The other two boats were the pinnace and the gig. The long-boat contained 52 souls, the gig 11, and the pinnace 17; about 30 more got on a raft, but have not since been heard of. Unfortunately there was a prevailing desire to secure luggage and property, which caused many to jeopardize their own and their fellow-creatures' lives for the sake of an old box or a bundle. The husband of one of the female passengers furnishes a singular illustration of this mania: the wife had secured a place in the long-boat, and her husband was seated by her side, when suddenly a child was thrown from the deck, and fell on her leg, the pain caused by the contusion of which was so great that she fainted. On recovering, she missed her husband, and seeing that the boat had pushed off from the vessel, she inquired, in great alarm, what had become of him? "Oh!" said another, "he is gone on board to look for a bundle." The deck at that moment fell in, and he most probably perished in the flames. Those in the long-boat and gig were picked up, after six days and nights of suffering, by the Lotus convict ship, and those in the pinnace by the brig Isabella, from Guernsey. Both these vessels put into this port, the former on the 20th and the latter on the 21st instant. A subscription was immediately commenced by the British merchants, and about L.1400 sterling was speedily raised for the sufferers. Many of the passengers were invited to the houses of the merchants, and large contributions were made from their wardrobes. The ladies were also most active in preparing various articles of dress for the unfortunates. It is in contemplation to charter a vessel to take them on. The number lost was about 150.

On the 16th May, an explosion of fire-damp took place at Springwell colliery, the property of Lord Ravensworth and others, near Wreckington, in the county of Durham, about five miles from Newcastle, by which forty-seven individuals were instantaneously killed, and many others severely wounded.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

Few events in the political world have excited so great a sensation for a considerable length of time, as the result of the election for Westminster, by which Sir John Cam Hobhouse has been expelled from the seat which he has held unopposed, and with such universal popularity amongst the "free electors," for the long period of fifteen years. The circumstances which led to this result appear to be these:—Upon the occasion of Sir John's re-election for Westminster, at his removal from the Secretaryship of War to that of Ireland, noticed in our last, it would seem that he came under various pledges to his constituents, to vote for the repeal of certain of the assessed taxes. By our Parliamentary report, it will be seen that a proposition for the repeal of those on houses and windows was brought before the House of Commons on the 30th April, by Sir J. Key, member for the city of London; but as government had previously resolved to resist the motion, Sir J. Hobhouse appears to have considered that, on the one hand, his duty as a Minister forbade his fulfilling his pledge to his electors; whilst, on the other, that pledge precluded him, as a point of honour, from supporting his colleagues in their opposition to the motion. In order to get over this dilemma, therefore, he resolved both to throw up his place in the Cabinet, and vacate his seat for Westminster, and once more come before the electors, free from the trammels of place. Such is the ostensible principle on which he acted; but as a suspicion had gone abroad that his surrendering his place was a mere pretence, and that he would again be publicly re-appointed in the event of his re-election, a very general feeling of indignation obtained amongst the electors, together with a determination to prevent his return. Several public meetings were accordingly held, at which Sir John's conduct was arraigned and denounced in the most unequivocal terms; and a requisition was got up, calling on Colonel de Lacey Evans to stand as a candidate. That gentleman (being in the Radical interest) immediately accepted the invitation; and a Mr Escott, a Conservative, likewise offered himself as a candidate. On Tuesday (May 7th), the candidates were nominated at the usual place, in Covent Garden market. The polling commenced on Thursday, and continued till the Friday afternoon. Colonel Evans took and kept the head of the poll to the last, and was finally elected by a majority of 166 above Sir John Hobhouse; the numbers being at the close—Evans, 1996; Hobhouse, 1830; Escott, 710. No exertion, it is said, was spared by Sir John's friends to turn the fate of the election, but the current of popular opinion had set in too powerfully against him. Sufficient manifestation, indeed, of this fact, was given at the hustings, where, according to the Ministerial papers, the conduct of the crowd was in the last degree disgraceful. The nominator and seconder of Sir John (Mr De Veaz and Mr Duncombe) were literally pelted off the hustings with cabages, &c., amid groans and hisses; and when Sir John himself came forward, he was received with such a volley of mud, and all sorts of missiles, that he was compelled to take refuge in the adjoining committee room, and did not again venture to appear on the hustings. At a subsequent meeting of electors the same day, Sir John emphatically declared that he was most completely out of office, and had been so from his first announcement; and that he never would return to it unless he was convinced, and his friends the electors also, that he could do more good to the public in the king's government than out of it. Some expressions, attributed to Sir John, at the same meeting, in reference to Colonel Evans, gave rise to a somewhat hostile message from the latter gentleman, who was afterwards appeased, however, upon Sir John's declaring that his words had been misreported. The most intense interest prevailed amongst all classes in the metropolis during the progress of the election; and it is even said his Majesty sent several special messengers to ascertain the state of the poll. The result is naturally looked upon as a strong indication of the increasing unpopularity of government. Several meetings have since been held amongst the Westminster electors, at which the political conduct and character of Sir Francis Burdett have been severely handled, and requisitions drawn up calling on him to resign his seat. A similar summons has likewise been sent to Mr W. Brougham, by a great body of the Southwark electors.

MEETING IN GOLDBATHFIELDS.

EARLY in May, placards were posted in London, addressed to the members of political unions, and signed by a man named Russell, calling upon them to meet on Monday the 13th, to adopt preliminary measures necessary for calling together "a national convention." A proclamation was issued from the Home Secretary's Office, but not signed by any one, declaring that the meeting would be illegal, and warning all persons from attending it. By this means, a real publicity was given to what had previously been an obscure and disregarded affair; and numerous individuals were attracted to the spot at the time referred to, who would not otherwise have thought of going. The meeting was fixed for two o'clock; the place, an open space behind Coldbathfields Prison, with streets running into it. At two o'clock, three or four thousand persons had assembled.

In the meanwhile, large bodies of the police were drawn to the neighbourhood from different parts of the metropolis, and stationed in the riding-school of the London volunteers, and in several livery-stables in the vicinity. Lord Melbourne, Colonel Rowan and Mr Mayne, the two commissioners of police, with about a dozen magistrates, were at the White Hart in Gray's Inn Lane. Two officers of the first regiment of Life Guards, in plain clothes, were on the spot, and kept up a constant communication with their regiment, a detachment of which was ready to move at a moment's notice. The committee for conducting the proceedings of the meeting were consulting together at the Union public house, Bagnigge Wells, and there was some discussion as to who should ascend the hustings first. At length, a young man, named James Lee, undertook to open the meeting, by proposing a chairman. A caravan had been engaged as a temporary hustings, upon which Lee mounted, followed by a man named Mee, and several others. Lee waved his hat several times, and was cheered by the multitude. The owner of the caravan, however, did not like the appearance of things, and drove it away. The committee then jumped off; and Lee was carried to some palings, where he was supported, till he had proposed that Mee should take the chair. This having been seconded, Mee stood up, and commenced a harangue to the crowd.

A large body of the members of the political union came up while Mee was speaking, with colours and banners flying, and took up their position round the chairman. The banners were inscribed with such mottoes as the following:—"Liberty or Death," with a skull and cross-bones on a black ground and red border; "Holy Alliance of the Working Classes;" "Equal Rights and Equal Justice." There was also a tri-coloured flag, the flag of republican America, and a pole with the cap of liberty.

At this time, a body of four hundred policemen marched up to the railings, with their truncheons ready for action. What follows is from an account published in the Times.

"The mob gave a little way; but Mee the chairman, and Lee the proposer, never moved until they saw the danger that awaited them; and then Mee jumped down and effected his escape amongst the crowd. The scene that followed was truly dreadful. The police furiously attacked the multitude with their staves, felling every person indiscriminately before them; even the females did not escape the blows from their batons—men and boys were lying in every direction weltering in their blood, and calling for mercy. The inhabitants, from their windows and balconies, cried 'Shame, shame! mercy, mercy!' but the officers still continued the attack, which they kept up for several minutes. A large space of ground within our view was strewn with the wounded, besides others who were less injured, who were able to crawl to a surgeon's. A policeman, belonging to C division, 95, named Robert Culley, was stabbed to the heart by a man who was carrying a banner, and which he attempted to take from him. He walked a few paces, and then fell dead. His brother John, who belonged to the same division, was also stabbed, but not mortally. Serjeant Brooks, of the C division, was also wounded; and Redwood, another constable, was stabbed through the thick part of his left arm."

Lee, the proposer of the chairman, Furse, supposed to be the man who killed Culley the police man, and stabbed the other, were arrested, with about twenty-five more. In a stable to which Furse had been removed after his arrest, among the straw upon which he had been standing, a loaded horse-pistol, and a dagger with a sharp point, were found. The point of the dagger fits into the wound from which Culley died. About fifty persons among the crowd were hurt more or less. At four o'clock all was tolerably quiet again.

Another account states that the police acted with more calmness and forbearance than the extract given above would lead us to suppose. Before attacking the crowd, they halted in the middle of the street, and then moved forward with their staves in their hands, clearing the way of the mere spectators of the scene, in the direction of the man who was speaking. The mob (this account says) instantly attacked them, and then they began to deal about their blows with great resolution.

On Monday evening, the prisoners were brought up for examination at Bow Street. George Furse was remanded on the capital charge of stabbing Henry Redwood and John Brooks, policemen; James Lee, for uttering a treasonable address to the crowd; and seventeen others, for throwing stones at the police, carrying seditious placards, and otherwise breaking the peace.

Furse was again brought up for examination on Thursday. The two policemen swore positively to the fact that he stabbed them with a dagger, which he held in his right hand, while he carried the American flag in his left. Furse acknowledged that he carried the flag, but denied having any instrument at all. He was finally committed to take his trial.

A coroner's inquest upon Culley was held on Wednesday the 16th, and was continued on Thursday and Friday, when it was adjourned to Monday the 20th. The evidence went chiefly to prove the violence of the police; and it seemed to be the general opinion of the witnesses, that a few of these public guardians, judiciously employed in preventing the meeting, or even in peaceably warning away the people, would have terminated the whole affair without any mischief or disturbance. Under this impression, and also, perhaps, acting under the influence of several late circumstances which have rendered the Ministry unpopular in the metropolis, the jury, on Monday evening, returned a verdict to the following effect:—"We find a verdict of justifiable homicide on these grounds: that no riot act was read, nor any proclamation advising the people to disperse; that the government did not take the proper precautions to prevent the meeting from assembling, and that the conduct of the police was ferocious, brutal, and unprovoked by the people; and we, moreover, express our anxious hope that the government will in future take better precautions to prevent the recurrence of such disgraceful transactions in the metropolis." The verdict gave much dissatisfaction to the coroner, who endeavoured in vain to induce the jury to reconsider it; but it was received with vehement applause by the multitude.

The London Gazette contains a proclamation, offering his Majesty's most gracious pardon to any one (except the actual perpetrator thereof) who shall discover the murderer of Robert Culley, and a reward of L.100, on the conviction of the perpetrator of the murder.

MEETING AT BIRMINGHAM.

ON Monday, May 20, in consequence of a circular previously issued by Mr T. Attwood, president of a Birmingham Union, arraigning the conduct of Ministers as having falsified their promises and deceived the people, and calling upon his "dear friends and fellow citizens" to meet him "in their countless masses," order to petition his Majesty to dismiss them from office and deliberate what was to be done farther for the common good, as every thing now depended on the selves, a meeting was accordingly held. At no the various unions came on the ground, with banners of music, and flags and banners of a very significant character. It is calculated that not fewer than 70,000 to 80,000 individuals were congregated at Mr Attwood drove up to the hustings in an open carriage, accompanied by Mr O'Connell, the Rev. M'Donnell, the Catholic clergyman of Birmingham, Mr Muntz, and one or two others. Mr Muntz taking the chair, Mr Attwood proceeded to address the meeting at great length, alluding particularly to some communications which had passed betwixt himself and Ministers at the period of their temporary retirement from office, "when they needed his assistance." Mr O'Connell followed, in a speech of great bitterness against Ministers, whom he characterized by the epithets of the "bloody and brutal Minister." After one or two others had spoken in the same strain, the following resolution was proposed and carried unanimously:—

"That his Majesty's Ministers—first, by violating the constitution and destroying the liberties of Ireland; secondly, by refusing to allow the right of voting by ballot, necessary to their protection in their just and legal franchise; thirdly, by their denial of general distress amongst the industrious classes, and their refusal of inquiry into the means of relief; fourthly, by their refusal to make a perceptible reduction in the present overwhelming load of taxation, by their perpetuating the house and window tax, notwithstanding the relief so imperatively demanded by the present pressed state of trade, and more especially, persevering in inflicting on the country the whole of the unjust oppressive maltreatment, although its partial abolition had been decided on by a deliberate vote of the House of Commons, both of which partial and oppressive taxes are merely necessary to furnish them with the means of maintaining tyranny in Ireland and misery in England—have betrayed the confidence of the people, and turned their sanguine hopes into despair."

A petition, founded on the foregoing resolution, addressing his Majesty to dismiss his present Ministers accordingly, was then agreed to amid loud cheering, and about seven o'clock the crowd quietly dispersed.

TRIAL OF A PEER FOR CONSPIRACY TO SWINDLE.

A CASE of a very extraordinary and painful description came before the Court of King's Bench, on the 11th of Lord Teynham, and a man named Doulan, a tailor, trade, were tried on an indictment for a conspiracy to defraud the prosecutor, Didimus Langford, of L.1400 under the promise of obtaining for him a situation under government. It appeared, that, in October 1828, the prosecutor, who had at the time no employment, was anxious to procure some, and was introduced by a friend to a Mr White, who introduced him to Doulan. Doulan told him that he could put him in the way of getting a place under government, and introduced him to Lord Teynham, who, he said, had influence at the Treasury. The money to be paid for the situation, which was to be worth L.200 per annum the first year, and afterwards to be improved—was L.1400. Half the bank-notes to this amount were deposited by Langford with Doulan; who afterwards, under pretence that Lord Teynham was very short of cash, and by means of positive assurances that all was going on well, induced him to give him the other halves. Letters from Lord Teynham were repeatedly shown to him by Doulan, stating that his "noble friend at the Treasury" had promised to fill up the situation in a few days. He also saw Lord Teynham himself, who assured him that in a fortnight the situation would be ready for him, and that he would take him to Downing Street in his carriage, and put him into a situation good enough for his own son; but he must be prepared to swear that he had given no money for it. The prosecutor objected to perjure himself; and it was proposed that Lord Teynham should give him bond for the amount, afterwards to be returned, so that he might swear with a clear conscience that he had paid nothing for the place. He agreed to this, and received a bond for L.1400 from Lord Teynham. The condition of the bond was, that so long as the interest was regularly paid, the principal should not be called for. Langford never got his situation, and had great difficulty in procuring his interest; and at last he prosecuted Lord Teynham. The Duke of Wellington deposed that Lord Teynham had repeatedly applied to him to give him a son and nephew places, but he had never attended to his applications. No evidence was called on the other side. It was urged by counsel that the prosecutor had lent the money to Lord Teynham on his bond, but that it was a part of the bargain that a place was to be procured for him; as a friend merely, Lord Teynham was to try to get him a situation. The jury found both the defendants guilty.

ty.—Since the trial, Lord Feynham has published a er, intimating that he shall move for a new trial, ch, if granted, he says, will enable him to show that re has been no intention on his part to defraud or pire against Mr Langford, which the "misrepresentaions and extraordinary statements" made by the latter lead to suppose.

STATISTICAL FACTS.

The amount of monies invested in savings' banks and ndly societies in the United Kingdom, and standing he names of the commissioners for the reduction of national debt, is L.13,540,039, 7s. 10d. The invest-ent of this capital is—in three per cents, L.5,513,050;
per cents, L.592,015, 8s. 8d.; Exchequer bills,

SCOTLAND.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE CHURCH OF
SCOTLAND.

Thursday, the 14th May, this venerable body met in New Assembly House, St Giles's, Edinburgh—Lord Haven acting as Lord High Commissioner. Upon the tion of Dr Chalmers (old Moderator), Dr Stirling Craigie was chosen Moderator for the current year, and took his seat accordingly. The first topic of general erest that was discussed (May 16), was the Assembly's ision in India, when Dr Inglis read the report of the nmittee, which gave a most flattering account of the gress of conversion amongst the Hindoos; mention-g, in particular, that of one of them who conducted an English newspaper, called the "Inquirer," and who posessed great influence amongst his countrymen.—On the ne day, Principal Macfarlane of Glasgow read a ree, by a committee appointed by the last Assembly, to ure into the state of the Church in the British colo-ies, which strongly recommended, amongst other sugestions, "That ordained ministers of the Church of otland, connected with any fixed congregation in the British colonies, should, where circumstances admitted, themselves into the Church of Scotland: That no nister be a member of such Presbyteries or Synods, who was not ordained by some Presbytery of the Church;
at no minister of the Church should be afterwards re-ved as a minister, who did not come specially recomended by the Presbytery by which he was ordained, or which he had for some time resided: That no proban-er of the Church should receive ordination, but those who could produce certificates of good character and duct from the Presbytery in which he had resided ore leaving Scotland: That it is expedient that Presteries should be allowed to ordain probationers: That members of such congregations returning to Scot-d, shall be entitled to church privileges, on producg certificates from the minister of the church to which ey have belonged." It was stated that there were in e Canadas alone thirty congregations under the charge of ministers of the Church of Scotland, and that they re daily increasing and springing up in all quarters in ese colonies. In the whole British colonies the estimated number of Presbyterian congregations was from ty to sixty.—On the following Tuesday, a case of very onsiderable interest was discussed. This was a petition m a dissenting (Relief) congregation in Roxburgh reet, Edinburgh, praying to be incorporated with the Established Church. The only point on which doubt hesitation was entertained by the Assembly, was the rgyman's (Mr John Johnstone, a gentleman of great nd literary attainments) not producing the proper uments, showing his having gone through the usual eological course of instruction enjoined by the Church.
committee was therefore appointed to decide on his ifications, but, we believe, it was generally underod the report would be favourable.—On the same y, resolutions, condemnatory of the Irish education heme of government (similar to others of the same nor adopted last year) were carried by a large major-y, and petitions, founded on them, ordered to be mitted to both Houses of Parliament.—On Thursay the very important question of church patronage as discussed at great length, and with much animat-on, when two motions were submitted, one by Dr halmers, to the effect, that in future "the dissent of a majority of the male heads of families residing in the ish who are members of the congregation, and have en in communion with the Church for two years, shall sufficient to prevent the introduction of any presene to a parish; which dissent may be expressed without giving a reason, unless it shall be established by the tron, presentee, or the minority in the congregation, at this opposition has been produced by corrupt and ma-ious combination;" and another by Dr Cook, "that all cases of presentation to a vacant parish, a majority the congregation may give in to the Presbytery objections of whatever nature against the presentee; that the Presbytery shall consider these objections; and if they find them unfounded, shall proceed to the settlement;

but if they find them well founded, shall reject the pre-sentee; it being competent to all parties interested to dissent from the sentence so pronounced." Upon a division, Dr Cook's motion was carried by a majority of 12—the numbers being 149 to 137.—The subject of patronage was again brought under discussion on Saturday, the 25th, by Mr Clark of Inverness, who moved, "that the General Assembly should empower the commission to make due application to the King and Parliament for redress of the grievance of lay patronage." The motion was rejected by a majority of 134 to 33, on the score, that, from the decision come to on the previous evening, it was inexpedient to adopt any other proceedings on the subject at present.—Friday, the 24th, the case of Mr Tait of the College Church came on, the extraordinary particulars connected with which will be found detailed in another paragraph.

HERESY IN EDINBURGH.

On Monday, May 13, a similar instance to those "manifestations of the spirit," for which the disciples of Mr Irving of London, and Mr Campbell of Row, have become so celebrated, took place publicly, for the first time in Edinburgh, in one of our established churches; and the circumstance, which might in itself perhaps have only excited a sensation of ridicule in the public mind, has, from the respectability of the parties concerned, and the consequences likely to ensue to them, created considerable interest, as well as regret. The place of worship where the scene was enacted, was the College Church, in the cure of the Reverend Mr Tait, a gentleman highly respectable both in his public and private character, but who, with various members of his flock, has long been suspected of a leaning to the extraordinary doctrines of the Rowites. In fact, it has since come out, that the "visitations of the spirit" are nothing new or strange amongst them, and that repeated instances have heretofore occurred at select prayer meetings in the vestry room. On the day in question, Mr Tait, jun-son of the incumbent, was officiating in the pulpit, and in his prayer petitioned for an "outpouring of the spirit" on the congregation, which, of course, was taken in its usual accepted sense, when Mr Carlyle advocate, suddenly leapt from his seat in a state of great excitement, and, throwing his arms wildly round his head, exclaimed,
"I am bound in the spirit!" The congregation were taken by surprise, and, as may be well supposed, were much startled by this extraordinary exhibition, and still more so when Mr Tait proceeded with his sermon, and making allusions to what had taken place, exhorted his hearers to listen to what they had heard, and go "forward." The interruptions continued at intervals during the course of the sermon, with the same frantic accompaniments. The congregation were excited in the most painful degree during the course of these proceedings, and several left the church in evident alarm. At length, matters had gone so far, that the members of the congregation could no longer withhold their interference, and, accordingly, Lieutenant Macdonald rose and remonstrated with the preacher on the manifest impropriety of such a scene, and requested him to put a stop to it, adding, that they (the congregation) had come there to hear the gospel preached, and not to behold such displays as they had witnessed. The preacher taking no notice of this remonstrance, Messrs Hutcheson, Dassauville, and Ross, elders, left their seats, and went round to where their clergyman, the Rev. Mr Tait, was sitting, along with Mr Pitcairn, another of his elders, and the Rev. Mr Wylie of Carlisle. After a brief but earnest conversation with him, they found their entreaties unavailing, as he declined interfering. The feverish excitement, however, of the congregation, obliged the young preacher in the end to cut short his discourse. A session was held after service, when the three elders whom we have named put some questions on the subject to their minister, and noted down his answers. In the General Assembly, on the Thursday following, Dr Chalmers moved and obtained leave for the Edinburgh Presbytery to sit on Saturday to investigate those matters, with the view of reporting them to the Assembly. An extraordinary meeting of the Presbytery was accordingly held on Saturday, for that purpose. The proceedings were conducted with closed doors, but we believe little beyond what is above detailed was elicited. On Friday last (May 24), the Presbytery reported the case to the General Assembly, and Mr Tait, who was present, was asked if he had any thing to say in reply or in explanation. Mr Tait rose in considerable agitation, and observed, that, although weak and unworthy to speak on such a mysterious matter, he would say what the Lord pleased to give him to say. This was the first real case which had occurred to him of the manifestations of God's spirit. There was a person connected with his congregation about two years ago who pretended to these gifts, but he placed no confidence in him. When Mr Carlyle, about fifteen months ago, began to "utter words" at the vestry prayer meetings, he doubted whether it was really the voice of God;
but he was prevented from expelling Mr Carlyle, on account of his sane mind and blameless character. He could only wait on the Lord for assistance to light him through the mysterious matter; and when Mr Carlyle began about four months ago to speak more freely, he felt himself and his flock more than ever called upon to ascertain what was really the nature of those manifestations; to seek God by themselves, and pray to God to preserve them from delusion in a matter so important. The more they prayed, they were filled with a greater measure of love and holiness; and on looking into the nature of the manifestation, they found it calculated to rebuke them for their want of faith, to encourage their faith in God, to melt their hearts, and to bid them wait upon God to have more and more light given them in this matter. But he begged all present to understand that he did not look at any one instance of that kind. His mind could not but be directed to the doctrine of the spirit being restored, and upon this he begged to base his case before the Church of Scotland. If it was the truth that the spirit was again to be restored, he called upon that Assembly to pause before they said that it is not restored. He was himself at one time as much opposed to this as any one could possibly have been; but certainly when he began to see the distinction between ordinary and extraordinary gifts of the spirit, he thought that these might again be given to the Church, and that these were necessary, not only to establish the Church at first, but also necessary in the awful times in which we lived. He beseeched the Assembly to look at this, and consider that the time of Antichrist's appearing had arrived. The rev. gentleman then quoted largely from Scripture, and the works of Calvin, in support of his recently adopted views; and entered deeply into the warnings and prophecies thought to be embodied in some of the more mysterious passages of the Old Testament. He concluded by entreating the Assembly not to come to a speedy decision on the matter; recommending that Mr Carlyle and his son be first examined.—Several rev. members expressed deep regret at all the circumstances of the case, and recommended that it be remitted to the Presbytery, "to be dealt with in all wisdom, kindness, and tenderness." A remit was accordingly made in these terms; expressing, however, the high disapprobation of the Assembly at such irregularities and disorders, and authorising the Presbytery to pronounce such sentence, or sentences, as would prevent their recurrence—such sentences to take immediate effect.

We learn, that since the above case was disposed of, another instance of a similar nature has occurred, in the person of an elder of one of the city churches. This individual—a most respectable man of business—waited upon his minister, and informed him, that, as he felt himself under the influence of the spirit, he might probably be called upon to give utterance to his inspirations in the church. The clergyman told him he would permit no such doings in his church, and recommended the elder at once to resign his office, in order to obviate the painful necessity of expelling him; which advice the other adopted, and resigned his office accordingly.

May 6. The managers of the Royal Infirmary this day appointed Mr Syme, lately elected Professor of Clinical Surgery, to be one of the surgeons of that establishment.

—12. A Miraculous Escape.—A woman, named Fairly, residing in Halkerton's Wynd, in a state of excitement, in consequence of a quarrel with her mother, threw herself from a window four storeys high, with a child in her arms, about two years old, and, strange to tell, escaped with a very trifling injury, only having one rib broke, and a slight bruise or two; the child escaped unhurt.

—14. The Court of Session met this day for the summer session.
All their Lordships were present.—This morning, the last awful sentence of the law was inflicted in front of the public buildings, foot of Saltmarket Street, Glasgow, on John Barclay, aged 21, and Philip Carnie, apparently between 18 and 20 years of age, convicted at the spring assizes held there last month—the former of the murder of Samuel Neilson, cattle-dealer, Cambusnethan, in the dwelling-house of the deceased, on the 10th day of October last; and the latter of rape.

—15. The contest for the vacancy in the representation of the Inverness district of burghs, by the death of the late Colonel Baillie of Leys (a Whig), terminated this day in favour of Major Cumming Bruce (a Tory), in opposition to Mr Stewart of Belladrum (a Whig), by a majority of 67.

—23. The election of a successor to the late Dr Buchanan in the joint pastoral charge of the Canongate, Edinburgh, came on this day. The candidates nominated were the Rev. Alexander Clark, one of the ministers of Inverness, and the Rev. John Clark, minister of the Chapel of Ease, New Street, Canongate. The polling continued to a late hour of the evening, when it was announced that the Rev. A. Clark, Inverness, was elected by a majority of 8—the numbers being 239 to 231. A scrutiny of votes being demanded, the meeting adjourned to Tuesday the 4th June.

Valuable Discovery.—We have the gratification of stating, that the secret of spinning the wool of the Cachmere goat, so as to be suitable for the making of the shawls of that name—an art which in Europe the French alone have hitherto known, and have kept most strictly to themselves—has just been discovered by Captain Charles Cochrane, R.N. For this we may consider ourselves indebted to the exertions and liberality of the Board of Trustees, who have for some years offered a large premium for the discovery, and who have now awarded the one for the current year (L.300, we believe) to Captain Cochrane. The yarn produced was spun at Glasgow, and was in some respects even superior to that imported from France. By this means the Indian shawl trade, one of our most staple articles of manufacture, and for which Edinburgh in particular is so extensively famed, is now relieved from its entire dependence on foreign supply of the raw material, at all times obviously liable to be interrupted, or even stopt by political occurrences, and not fewer than 50,000 of our countrymen, engaged in carrying it on, removed from the hazard of being, on such a contingency occurring, thrown out of employment.
Until this subject was taken up by the Board of Trustees, the most intelligent and enterprising of our manufacturers, both in Scotland and England, had used every exertion to arrive at the knowledge of the invention, but in vain.

Church Patronage in Scotland.—The following resolutions on this important subject are to be proposed by Mr Sinclair to the House of Commons on Tuesday the 4th of June:—

1. That under the system of lay patronage, existing in the church of Scotland (a church in principle and constitution essentially popular), a very large proportion of its ministers is appointed either by the crown or by private individuals, who, according to that system, need not be members of the church, or possess any residence or local interest in the parishes over which they exercise this right.
2. That although many patrons have very laudably consulted the wishes of the people, and are distinguished by their intelligence and private worth, the nomination of parochial incumbents may fall into the hands of individuals deficient in moral character, indifferent to the Christian religion, or hostile to the church establishment; and that, in numerous instances, individuals have been appointed to the pastoral office, who possessed neither the confidence nor the affections of the congregations on which they have been imposed. 3. That the act of 1712, by which the right of patronage was restored, is considered by the people of Scotland as a pernicious infringement upon their dearest rights; and that their numerous petitions for its repeal, instead of arising from any want of attachment to the national church, are dictated by their sincere affections for its doctrines, and their anxiety for its permanence and prosperity. 4. That patronage, besides being deemed an intolerable grievance by many of the most eminent ministers, and most zealous members of the church of Scotland, has been the chief cause of the secession of some of its brightest ornaments, and is the main obstacle to the return of many zealous advocates of Presbyterianism into its communion. 5. That the people of Scotland are justly entitled, as well as fully qualified, to select their own pastors, and that it would therefore be expedient to repeal the act of 10 Anne, and take such further measures as shall have the effect of placing the nomination in the hands of the parishioners, being members of the church, under such limitations as may be deemed conducive to the welfare and stability of the establishment.

Our readers will keep in mind that the duty and drawback on soap is to be reduced one-half from the 1st June. The following are amongst others of the new government regulations in regard to the manufacturing of that article:—Soap manufacturers to be allowed to warehouse the whole of any making of soap cleansed subsequent to the 6th of May, upon giving notice to the surveyor of excise of their intention so to do at the same time as the notice for cleansing. Proper places to be entered for warehousing, and the soap so warehoused to be placed under the survey of the excise. The present duty to be charged on all soap cleansed before the 1st of June; and the difference of duty on the warehoused soap to be allowed to the manufacturers in the next account. No allowance, in charging the duty, to be made on the soap warehoused.

We understand the law authorities of the crown, having considered the prenotation taken of all the circumstances connected with the late calamitous occurrence at Tain (noticed in our last), are satisfied that it originated solely in accident.

On Thursday, 9th ult. (the fast day), no less than 3199 passengers were conveyed along the Edinburgh and Dalkeith railway, and though they were almost all of the working classes, no drunkenness or other impropriety was shown amongst them.

BIRTHS.

April 18. At Cantonsing, Viscountess Exmouth; a son.
22. At Comely Bank, near Edinburgh, Mrs Kirkwood; a son.
23. At London, the Countess of Denbigh; a son.
May 1. At Conan House, Lady Mackenzie of Gairloch; a son.
3. At Dumolly, Mrs M'Dougall of M'Dougall; a son.
7. At Caldwell, Ayrshire, the lady of W. Mure, Esq.; twins, a son and daughter.
12. At Glasgow, Mrs Hugh Cowan, junr.; a son.—At Fala manse, Mrs Sheriff; a son.
14. At Harrington House, Whitehall, the Countess of Harrington; a daughter.
16. At Kilmarnock Castle, Mrs Dalgleish; twin-daughters.
17. At Edinburgh, Mrs D. T. K. Drummond; a son.
21. At Edinburgh, the lady of Dr Malcolm; a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

April 25. In Spalding, Mr William Moore, miller and bachelor, to Miss Sarah Lee, spinster, in Pinchbeck Street, Spalding, celebrated for her famous eye and mouth water. They had experienced a long and tedious courtship of upwards of forty years duration. The groom is in his 71st year, and the bride in her 63d year.—Stamford News.

30. At Edinburgh, Mr De Pivas, to Miss Anne Lillie.—James Farquharson, Esq. of Invercauld, to Janet Hamilton, eldest daughter of the late General Francis Dundas, of Sanson, Berwickshire.

May 6. A curious wedding took place at Yaxley, in Suffolk. It attracted the attendance of more than 500 persons. The bridegroom, John Woods, a lad of 16, and the bride, a blind old woman, who has been more than 52 years in that situation. The marriage ceremony was succeeded by a merry peal on the church bells, and a large band of rough music. The parties are inmates of the parish house, and among the most conspicuous of the company was the discarded lover, a lame old man, mounted on an ass.—Norfolk Chronicle.

7. At Edinburgh, Adam Fergusson of Woodhill, Esq. advocate, to Jessy, daughter of the late George Tower, Esq. merchant in Aberdeen.—At St. George's, Hanover Square, Frederick, son of the late Right Hon. Hugh Elliot, to Jane, third daughter of the late James Perry, Esq.

16. At Edinburgh, Dr F. Farquharson, to Alison Mary, daughter of Robert Ainslie, Esq. W. S.

DEATHS.

Jan. 1. At Calcutta, about a month previous to the death of his father, Edward Marjoribanks, Esq. of the East India Company's Bengal civil service, eldest son of the late Sir John Marjoribanks of Fife, Bart. and fourth son.

19. At Glasgow, Vice-Admiral Sir Henry Hotham, K.C.B., Commander-in-Chief of the Mediterranean, in the Mediterranean.

21. At London, Dr Babington, in his 76th year. By the death of this venerable physician, the world has been deprived of a distinguished ornament, and a man of a kind, liberal, and cultivated mind. Dr Babington's life will have to deplore a man who formed, in a sense, the connecting link between the departed and the living members of the last half century; for, from Priestley to the present day, he so lately presided, down to Wollaston and Davy, Dr Babington was the personal friend and associate of the most distinguished persons of this country. In truth, his amiable temper, his manners, his judgment, liberal sentiments, and varied information, rendered his society highly acceptable to a class of men whose studies and labours occasionally required the soothing relief of an interesting conversation.—Globe.

At Beaumaris, aged 105, Mrs Elizabeth Henry, called the "Mother of Beaumaris." She was niece of Admiral Henry, who died lately, aged 107.

At Calcutta, Mr George Pritchard, editor of the Calcutta John Bull.

May 1. At Edinburgh, Mr William Petition, senior, merchant.—At Dunfermline, Mrs Johnston, formerly of Rathillet.

2. At Paisley, Mr J. Gardner, writer, aged 34.

3. At Edinburgh, Hugh Handyside, Esq. of Kirklands.

5. At Stanley Bridge, John Stewart, a military pensioner, who died lately, at the extremely advanced age of 103, and who was the oldest veteran receiving the pension from the crown; he was buried with military honours, amidst a concourse of from 8000 to 10,000 spectators.

7. At South Warrborough, Hants, Mr John Dicker, aged 95; on the Thursday following, Mr Thomas Dicker, aged 92 years. The two brothers were natives of the village.

8. At Bath, aged 73, Viscountess Lake.

9. At Dumfries, Mr W. Shaw, draper.

10. At Westhams, near Dunbar, Andrew Taylor, senior, Esq. distiller; a much esteemed member of society.—At Edinburgh, also much regretted, Captain Duncan MacPherson, late of the 92d regiment.

11. At London, Mrs Dickons, formerly a distinguished vocalist.—At Glasgow, Dr Heron, Professor of Natural Philosophy in Anderson's University.—Richard Denniston, Esq. of Kelvingrove.—At Shorefield, near Taunton, Captain Robert Pool, aged 72. He crossed the equator to and from the Pacific Ocean 22 times; passed Cape Horn 17 times; and sailed once round the globe.

12. At Glasgow, Mr F. M'Nab M'Gregor, student of medicine, much regretted.—At Edinburgh, Mr Charles Baxter.—At Leith, Mr G. Scott, W.S.

13. At Stockbridge, Edinburgh, Lieutenant-Colonel Watson, late of the marines.

14. At Edinburgh, Archibald Douglas, Esq. advocate.

15. At Carlisle, Henry Pearson, Esq.—At Edinburgh, Robert Bruce, Esq. W. S.

19. At Edinburgh, Captain James Watson, Royal Navy.

24. At Glasgow, the Rev. John Geddes, minister of St Andrew's parish.

PREFERRMENTS.

March and April. Rev. Mr Smith, one of the ministers of Kilmarnock, called to the parish of Penpont.—Rev. W. B. Cunningham to the parish of Prestonsburg, vacant by the death of Dr Primrose.—Rev. Moses Black ordained by the Presbytery of Belfast to the charge of the new Presbyterian congregation at Kilmore.—Rev. H. Wilks ordained to the charge of the Congregational or Independent Chapel in Albany Street, Edinburgh.—Rev. Mr S. Boyd called by the congregation of the United Associate Chapel, Hexham, Northumberland.—Rev. Mr Gillies ordained to the parish of Carverlock, Dumfriesshire.

May. Rev. James Chrystal, A.M. to the parish church of Auchinleck, vacant by the translation of the Rev. James Boyd to Ochiltree.—Rev. John Paton to be minister of the Scotch Presbyterian congregation at Carlisle.—Rev. Mr Knox to the parish church of Tarves.—Rev. Mr Pitcairn ordained as assistant and successor to the Rev. Dr Grierson of Cockpen.—Rev. Andrew Russell, A.M. set apart to the pastoral office in the Congregational Church in Haddington.—Rev. J. R. Swan ordained to the pastoral charge of the Relief congregation of Bonhill.—Rev. J. A. Wallace inducted to the pastoral charge of the parish of Hawick.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

1. History of the Scotch Church at Rotterdam. By the Rev. W. Steven.
2. Life and Travels of the Apostle Paul.
3. Thomson's Republished Atlases.
4. Letter on the Sheriff Courts of Scotland.

1. A WELL-DIGESTED account of a very interesting branch of the Church of Scotland. The Scotch congregation at Rotterdam was formed in 1642, the first clergyman being the Reverend Alexander Petrie, of whom a good portrait is prefixed to this volume. During the persecuting times which soon after ensued, the little association at Rotterdam was a refuge and a rallying-point to the unfortunate individuals who were compelled to leave their native country. Thus, a considerable historical interest is attached to the subject of the present work. Mr Steven, who is at present junior minister of the congregation, inquires with accuracy, and writes with much judgment and feeling. We earnestly recommend his work to the attention of the public.

2. This is a very pleasing, and will, no doubt, become a useful book. It embodies, along with the Scriptural notices of Paul and his labours, the widely scattered information which is to be gathered about him among the tomes of the early Christian writers, as also geographical and historical illustrations respecting the persons and places connected with the story of the Apostle. We have read the volume from beginning to end with much satisfaction, and are convinced, that, if introduced, as it ought to be extensively, among young people, it may give them an interest they never had before in Scriptural narrative.

3. These are a large and small General Atlas, a large and small Classical Atlas, and a large Atlas of Scotland; all of them works produced at a great expense, and which have already been well received by the public. It is Mr Thomson's intention, in accordance with the spirit and necessities of the present age, to republish the whole in numbers, and at such a reduction of terms, that each atlas will, in the end, cost only about one-half of its former price. We sincerely hope that so liberal a design will meet with the success which it deserves, and thus remunerate a worthy man, who has done much to serve the public, without as yet reaping a reciprocal benefit.

4. An excellent, plain, matter-of-fact pamphlet, on a subject of the very highest importance to the population—especially the middling and poorer classes of Scotland. The complexities and defects in the mode of procedure before the inferior courts, and especially those for the decision of small debt causes, are truly deplorable; and that not more in an economical than a moral point of view, encouraging, as they do, a spirit of litigiousness, from the opportunities afforded to unprincipled practitioners for obstructing, protracting, and evading the ends of justice, by sheer dint of trickery in matters of form. The author of the present pamphlet (R. Threshie, Esq., jun., Dumfries) points out, in plain and simple language, the present defects in the "form of process" before our Sheriff courts, as well as the remedies which ought to be applied; and his statements obtain an intrinsic importance from himself being an extensive practitioner in these courts.

SCOTTISH BANKRUPTS.

April 23. James Glen, general merchant and grocer, Alloa.—May 3. John Burns and Co. chemists and traders, Inverkeithing, Fifehire, and John Burns, the sole partner of that Company.—James Strachan, grocer, and wine and spirit merchant, Inverkeithing.—6. Hector Munro, ship-agent, and lately distiller, Stromness; Jean Black, or Paton, cloth-merchant, Paisley.—7. James Gardner, apothecary, Edinburgh.—8. John Boyd, merchant, Leith.—10. Alexander Ross and Co. grocers and spirit-dealers, 106, Cowgate, Edinburgh.

Postscript.

It is said that the tendency of all the evidence hitherto given before the committee, now sitting to inquire into the alleged commercial distress, is completely against those by whom the inquiry was so loudly called for.

The Examiner of Sunday the 26th May expresses its belief that the Tories will soon have "another trial;" but that "it will be sharp and short—and their last."

Friday (24th May) was the birth-day of the Princess Victoria, when she attained her fifteenth year.

The irritation of the London populace against the civil authorities, in consequence of what took place at the Coldbathfields meeting, seems to be hourly increasing, and is occasioning great anxiety in all classes.

On Wednesday, Mee, the chairman of the Spafields meeting, surrendered himself at the Home Office, on Lord Melbourne's warrant. He had eluded the search of the police ever since the meeting. He was conveyed in a coach to Bow Street, and privately examined by Sir F. Roe, who required him to put in sureties, himself in L.200, and two sufficient housekeepers in L.100 each. He was sent to the House of Correction until they should be provided.

It is stated in a London morning paper, that Captain Napier is about to sail for Portugal, to replace Admiral Sartorius in the command of the "Constitutional fleet," the latter having declined any longer holding that post.

It is confidently asserted that peace has not been concluded between the Sultan and the Pacha, and that the settlement of their contest is to be left to the Allied Powers.

A GUIDE TO THE MINOR ANTIQUITIES OF EDINBURGH.

By the Author of the "Traditions of Edinburgh," to which work the present is intended as a Supplement.

Messrs CHAMBERS act as Publishing Agents (in Scotland) for the following Works:—

THE BRITISH LIBRARY.—This publication is intended to comprise the works of all the classic authors of Great Britain. It appears in a series of handsome monthly volumes, correctly and elegantly printed, at a price hitherto unprecedented. Each work will be carefully edited; notes, when necessary, are given; and the life of the author, either selected or written expressly for the purpose, is prefixed.

The British Library rests its claims to public patronage, chiefly on its correctness and unequalled cheapness; but in beauty of typography and elegance of outward appearance, it will yield to no other publication of the day; and although the proprietors do not hold out the inducement of illustrations, these, of first-rate quality, will not be spared in works such as White's Selborne, Walter Angler, &c., where they will be useful as well as ornamental.

The first volume of the British Library contains White's Natural History of Selborne, with Observations on Nature, and the Naturalist's Calendar. The second forms the first volume of Charles Smith's Miscellaneous Works. To be completed in four volumes. Price of each volume, only 3s.; or in morocco cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

THE BRITISH CYCLOPEDIA of Arts, Sciences, Manufactures, Commerce, Literature, History, Geography, Politics, Biography, Natural History, &c. Conducted by Charles F. Partington, Esq. Published in weekly numbers, in a large octavo size, price 2d. each, or in monthly parts. The British Cyclopaedia is a work calculated in a great measure, to supersede the necessity of purchasing expensive Encyclopaedias, and will prove, when completed, a useful digest, not only for occasional reference, but regular, instructive and entertaining reading. Already, the weekly circulation amounts to 18,000 copies.

THE FIELD NATURALIST'S MAGAZINE and REVIEW of Animals, Plants, Minerals, the Structure of the Earth, and Appearances of the Sky. By James Rennie, M.A. Professor of Zoology. Published monthly, price 1s.

THE DIAMOND BIBLE, with Notes explanatory and practical. By the Rev. H. Stebbing. With engravings from the old manuscripts. This is an exceedingly beautiful edition of the Bible, of the smallest pocket size; publishing in weekly numbers, at 6d. each. The part containing the New Testament is in course of being issued, and will be completed in six numbers.

All the preceding publications are sold by every Bookseller in the United Kingdom.

WHY.

THIS little word, as little almost as word may be, and pronouncable in a breath, may be termed the motto of the present age. People formerly used it very rarely, and never unless they happened to be unusually astonished or indignant about something. They now say why to every thing; and, in fact, this monosyllable makes all the difference that is between former ages and the present. There may still be found, in remote corners of the country, a few quiet innocent people, who never say why; but that is a very different thing from what was the case fifty or a hundred years ago. All people, of whatsoever denomination, then lived in a state of perfect unconsciousness as to the use or meaning of the phrase; every thing was taken for granted; and it was looked upon as the most pestilent and ridiculous thing in the world to inquire any farther than one's neighbours. Those good old times, whatever was was right. Authority of all kinds, if it only had existed longer than any one could recollect, was implicitly obeyed, and the most of men lived—we really must own the truth—in a state of shameful contentedness, as if they had not been aware that they had a will of their own. Taxes were then paid and spent, and no one thought more about it: in being spent, the great end of taxes seemed to be attained, and—what more could be said? Persons in authority, being never contradicted, had a sweetness of temper which they have not now; and persons, not in authority, had no wish to find fault with those who were, there was no chance of bad blood being generated between the parties. In fact, people were all horribly stupid and happy in those days—the blessing of unchallenging and unchallenged ignorance. No man knew when or where he was wronged; and you might have struck one, perhaps, a very severe blow on any part of his body, without his manifesting the least alteration of countenance. Those good times are now entirely gone. Men have become exceedingly jealous, irritable, and enlightened. Nothing is now occurring—nothing can now be—but they cry why to it; and till you satisfy them as to all its properties, causes, and effects, they have no peace. Every man who professes to have any authority over another, must show his charter for it; and even that sometimes will not be held as sufficient. Taxes are paid with a dreadful grudge; and if any one supposes that the thousandth part of what he pays goes the wrong way, or a way that he does not wish it to go, here is such an outcry about it that you would think the world was going to wreck. All men must now have what they call their rights, to the last tenth of an inch, and the last fraction of a farthing; and it does not matter how any thing may show, let it be never so gloriously, if it be not correct in a pecuniary point of view. They have become a shockingly arithmetical people now-a-days. That shabby thing, the rule of three, has taken away the feeling and pomp of all fine things, and left nothing but dry bones behind. In short, you need now make no attempt upon the purse, or conscience, or reason of any man, unless you be prepared to tell him why.

To be serious—this disposition to investigate every thing, whether it be connected with politics or science, is a feature of the age, of which we have great reason to be proud. It has arisen entirely since the conclusion of the late war, and considering what it has already done, we are justified in supposing, that, by the time our children are men, it will have achieved such alterations upon the surface of things, and so far improved the comforts of the people, as will appear like the effects of a miracle.

HEREDITARY LEGISLATURE.

THE nation will perhaps find that it has not done itself credit by the way in which it has acted, and is acting, in reference to the House of Lords. The object of the reform bill was to remove from the House of Commons the vestiges of aristocratic influence which in time had crept into it. What, however, was the use of doing so, if full power and effectual control were still to be left in the more proper seat of such influence? Of what use were the more liberal measures of a more liberal House of Commons to be, if every one of them could be checked and destroyed by another house, in which any attempt at a corresponding liberalization was out of the question? Perhaps a few reflecting men did not disguise from themselves that the paramountcy of the representative body over all other branches of the legislature, or the abolition of all others, was the grand object in view. The bulk of the nation, however, must have either been heedless of the effect thus contemplated, or must have wilfully blinked it. All this is not creditable, either to the sense or honour of the people. It seems hypocritical, and nothing of that kind can be either right or safe.

To make this the more explicit, let us see exactly how the House of Lords stands. A majority are anti-Ministerial, and indisposed to the innovatory measures which the people in general seem anxious to have effected. Let this arise from blindness, from interested feelings, or from a sincere desire of promoting the public good, it does not matter:—it is so, and that is enough for the present. Again, the King is understood to have great objections to any creation of new peers for the purpose of turning the balance in another way. Thus, the House of Peers must remain opposed in sentiment to the Ministers and to the bulk of the people; while, if ever there was a time when it might be expected that they would act according to the freedom of their own will, it is the present, just immediately after having been deprived of their wonted influence in another branch of the legislature. Now, it is evident, from the dispositions of the people, that, in their overwhelming strength, they would not be balked in their desires by any thing like a hereditary legislature: every obstacle that may now be presented to their will, as expressed by their representatives, must sink beneath it. Of course, if they tacitly sanction the meetings of an assembly, whose decisions they would not submit to, if in the least discrepant with their own desires, it is obvious that they are not acting in that candid manner which is to be desired alike in individuals and in the public.

Should the Upper House, as is most likely, find it necessary to give way regularly to every popular measure against their deliberate inclination, there will be a hardship in their situation from which the same degree of property, unaccompanied by rank, is exempt; and we should not wonder in that case to see peers petitioning to be divested of their titles, so as to be enabled, as commoners, to have at least the chance of a real voice in the legislature. Such an event as this bears too much of a revolutionary appearance to be an agreeable subject of contemplation in this country; and yet, if the people will compel the nobles of the land, or rather the ennobled property of the land, to sit where it is, in a state of only apparent legislation, we do not see how it is to be avoided. The public is certainly called upon to see—first, that the present injustice is not continued, and, second, that some better and fairer system is substituted. The general feeling is perhaps not favourable, at present, towards hereditary legislation, or those who may have lately been possession of it; but the nation will never deny, that, in seeking a good for itself, or an exemption from evil, it is bound to see that harm be not done in the process to others. Either they must abide by the house, as what it formerly was, and appears to be, a hereditary and aristocratic check upon all the over-free impulses of the representative part of the system, or they must permit the property which stands in that predicament to have its say somewhere else, or in some other way. To a complete irresponsibility and independence of all other branches of the legislature, it is not the interest of the nation that the House of Lords should attain; nor, we believe, do the peers aspire to such a situation. But, on the other hand, if they are not to retain their nominal or apparent power, they should have some lesser degree of authority, which they may exercise on fixed and certain principles.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS.

1. IRISH CHURCH REFORM BILL.—On Monday (May 20), upon the motion that the house go into committee on this bill, Mr Gillon moved as an amendment, "that it be an instruction to the committee that the revenues of the church in Ireland be applied to purposes of general utility, after the demise of the present incumbents."—Mr C. Rippon seconded the amendment. The property of the church was national property, and any law that deprived the nation of its use was a fraud upon the people. It was in vain to think that the people of Ireland would be contented, so long as this impertinent interference with their rights existed.—Mr Sinclair (Caithness), without pledging himself to vote for all the clauses of the bill, would support its principle as decidedly as he would oppose the present amendment.—After a few words from Colonel Evans, Mr Robinson, and Mr Roebuck, the house divided, when there appeared—For the motion, 126; for the amendment, 16. Majority, 110.—The house then went into committee, and the nineteen first clauses were, after some trifling verbal amendments, agreed to.—On Monday (June 17), the discussion was resumed, when the several clauses, from the 19th to the 39th, were agreed to.—On Tuesday (June 18), the discussion was resumed in a committee of the whole house. Clauses 39, 40, and 41, were agreed to without opposition. On the 42d clause, which relates to the rotation of the Irish bishops in Parliament, being read, Mr Pryme moved as an amendment, that no Irish bishop not a bishop at the passing of the present bill, should "hereafter sit in the House of Lords of the United Kingdom."—Mr Stanley said this involved a great constitutional principle. Upon the ground adduced by Mr Pryme, the English bishops ought also to be excluded.—Mr Hume expressed himself quite ready to exclude the English as well as the Irish bishops from a seat in the legislature.—Lord Althorp hoped that no feeling of hostility to seeing the church represented in the House of Lords existed in the country.—Mr Hume asked if Lord Althorp meant to deny that there existed a feeling against the bishops sitting in the House of Lords?—Lord Althorp did not mean to deny it; but his impression was that the feeling was not general.—Mr Hume said, "ere long the noble lord will find himself deceived."—Mr Pryme then withdrew his amendment, and the clause was agreed to, as were also the other clauses down to the 90th.—On Thursday (June 20), the several clauses from the 90th to the 118th were agreed to, without discussion.—On Friday (June 21), the discussion was resumed. The several clauses from the 119th to the 132d were agreed to. On the 132d clause, which provides for the mode of valuing land under bishops' leases, in order to sell it, Lord Oxmantown moved an amendment, the object of which was to prevent improvements made on the land, such as buildings, planting, &c., being included in the valuation.—On this amendment, a long and desultory conversation took place. Almost all the members for Ireland, including both Mr Shaw and Mr O'Connell, supported the amendment.—Mr Stanley, the Solicitor-General, and Dr Lushington, opposed it.—The committee divided, and the amendment was carried by 85 to 49.—The clauses of the bill from the 132d to the 147th were then agreed to, with the exception of the 136th and 138th, which were struck out.—Mr Stanley rose to move an amendment to the clause (the 147th), which provided that the money arising from the conversion of bishops' leases into perpetuities, should be applied to such purposes as Parliament might hereafter appoint and direct. He stated that many persons were strongly opposed to the principle which they conceived to be maintained by this clause, viz. that it established the right of Parliament to appropriate church property to secular purposes. He proposed, therefore, to strike out the words, "to such purposes as Parliament may appoint," &c. to the end of the clause, and then add the words, "vestry cess." [The clause, as amended, will authorise the application of the funds so raised to the extinguishment of vestry cess, but not to any other purposes.] Mr Stanley then intimated, that, without this concession, the bill would not be allowed to pass the Lords. He maintained that the principle of the measure remained inviolate, notwithstanding this alteration.—Mr O'Connell, in very indignant terms, reproached the Ministers for giving up the only good principle of the measure, which they were solemnly pledged to carry, or to resign their places. So help him God, so base an act of treachery as Ministers had been guilty of he had never known.—Mr Stanley defended Ministers, and again warned the house of the serious consequences of a rejection of the measure.—Mr Hume asked what security the house or the country could have that the government would carry any other bill if they abandoned the great principle of this? He reminded Ministers of Lord Althorp's statement, that the measure would place three millions at the disposal of the government. Their conduct was a disgraceful breach of public faith. Ministers deserted their duty to keep their places.—Mr Macaulay thoroughly approved of the alteration in the clause.—Mr O'Connell reproached some members with violating their pledges on the hustings. (Cries of "You pledged yourself to repeal the Union.") He denied it indignantly. ("Yes, you did, and shrunk from it.") Mr O'Connell again denied the imputation with warmth. He was called to order by the chairman, and a scene of much confusion ensued.—Sir Robert Peel, Lord Sandon, and Lord Ebrington, approved of the alteration. Sir Robert, however, did not much rejoice at it, as he was able to prove that there never could or would be any surplus to appropriate.—Colonel Davies, in very strong language, reproached Ministers for their conduct on this occasion, and expressed his willingness to give in his devoted adhesion to Sir R. Peel, who had more in his head than all the Ministry put together.—Lord John Russell said, if that house was to enter into a contest with the House of Lords, he hoped they would not wantonly and on trivial grounds provoke a collision. He felt himself bound to do all in his power for the security of property, and to promote tranquillity. The country could not stand a revolution once a year. Others might be for convulsion, he was for peace.—After some remarks from Mr Stanley, the committee divided.—For the amendment, 280; against it, 148. Ministerial majority, 132.

2. METROPOLITAN POLICE BILL.—On Monday (May 20), this bill was read a third time and passed, with the addition of a clause, inserted on the motion of Mr Pease (Quaker), prohibiting bear-baiting, cock-fighting, and other cruel amusements, within five miles of London.

3. CIVIL LIST PENSIONS.—On Tuesday (May 21), Mr D. W. Harvey submitted a motion on the subject of pensions paid out of the civil list. His object was to put this question distinctly to the house, whether any portion of the public money was to be received by any person of either sex, for which some known and adequate service had not been rendered? He held in his hand a statement of the annual expenditure of the United Kingdom, in salaries, pensions, sinecures, half-pay, superannuations, compensations, and allowances; and he believed that the only reason why it has been allowed to go on was, that the country was totally ignorant of its amount. The annual sum paid under those various and confused heads exceeds £9,000,000 sterling. Besides this, he held in his hand a classification of 956 placemen and pensioners, whose salaries, profits, pay, fees, and emoluments, exceeded £2,000,000. Here was an ample field for the operations of a judicious economy. The number of pensioners amounted to 1303, 1022 of whom belonged to the fair sex. (Hear, and laughter.) There were 208 persons with titles of distinction on the list, of whom 124 were ladies. The hon. member concluded with moving for a return of all persons on the English, Irish, and Scotch pension lists, heretofore paid out of the civil list; specifying with each name the sum received by each individual, the period of the grant, the public grounds, or other consideration, as far as practicable, on account of which they had been granted; distinguishing those who are widows or orphans of deceased public servants, and such as are in the receipt of any emoluments from any public source.—Mr Hume seconded the motion.—Lord Althorp objected to extend the return to pensions on the civil list, because over them Parliament had no control during the life-time of the monarch, to whom they had appropriated a certain sum which must be left to his disposal; but he would not oppose the motion so far as it related to pensions on the consolidated fund which were heretofore paid out of the civil list.—Mr D. W. Harvey agreed that his motion should be so modified.—On the suggestion of Mr Hume, the pensions on the four and a half per cent. Barbadoes duties were included in the return.—The motion was then agreed to.

4. FARMING STOCK, &c.—STAMP DUTIES.—On the above day Mr S. Rice brought in a bill "to reduce the stamp duties on advertisements and on certain sea insurances; to repeal the stamp duties on receipts for sums under five pounds; and to exempt insurances on farming stock and implements of husbandry from stamp duties," which was read a first time.—On Friday (24), it was read a second time.

5. REFORM BILL.—On Wednesday (May 22), Mr Tooke moved the appointment of a select committee, to consider the provisions of the reform act, with the view to make such amendments as may contribute to the better, cheaper, and more convenient working of the act.—Lord John Russell opposed the motion, on the ground of the inexpediency of making alterations until further experience had been obtained as to the working of the act.—Mr Warburton considered the proposed inquiry too unlimited, and, proposed an amendment to the effect, that the consideration of the committee should be limited to an inquiry into the contradictory decisions that had been come to by the revising barristers, returning officers, and election committees.—The motion and the amendment were opposed by the Solicitor-General, Mr Robinson, Mr S. Rice, Mr B. Carter, Mr C. Wynn, Mr Abercromby, Mr Pease, Mr C. Grant, Mr Sandford, and Mr Ellice.—Mr O'Connell, Mr Jarvis, Mr Haliburton, Mr Wason, Mr Hume, Mr Halcomb, Mr Lloyd, Mr Wallace, and Mr Buller, spoke in favour of an inquiry.—In the course of the debate the Solicitor-General stated, in reply to a question from Mr Sandford, that government had deliberated upon the alterations suggested to be introduced in the act, and would bring forward some measure upon the subject early next session.—The motion being withdrawn, Mr Warburton brought forward his amendment, as a distinct motion; upon which the house divided.—For the motion, 68; against it, 94. Majority against the appointment of a committee, 26.—On Tuesday (June 18), Colonel Evans moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend so much of the reform act as related to the payment of rates and taxes as a qualification for exercising the elective franchise. The effect of this clause had been to disfranchise 300,000 voters all over the country. In Westminster it was expected that there would have been 18,000 electors, whereas there were only 6000.—Lord Althorp was adverse to making any alteration in the reform bill during the present session. He intended next session to propose some alteration in the reform act, but this was not one.

6. EMANCIPATION OF THE JEWS.—On the same day, upon Mr R. Grant moving the second reading of the bill for removing the civil disabilities of the Jews, Sir R. Inglis said, he would oppose this measure as one pregnant with the most disastrous consequences. If a measure like this was carried, the house might soon become a medley of men of all faiths—Jews, Turks, and Heathens. He maintained, too, that the higher classes of the Jews themselves were averse to this bill. He had received a letter from the Rabbi Jacobs, professor at Cambridge (which the writer desired the hon. baronet to communicate to the house), declaring that the cry for emancipation had been raised by a few, who, disregarding their religion, thirsted for place and honour; but no Jew, consistent with his faith, could be a freeman but in the land of Canaan. The hon. member, after some farther observations, called upon the house to resist the present attempt to unchristianise the character of the nation by introducing men who styled our God an impostor, and spoke of him as the "hanged one." The hon. baronet concluded with moving that the bill be read a second time that day six months.—Mr Sinclair, in seconding the motion, said, that this was a Christian country and a Christian legislature, and that it was inconsistent with their duty and allegiance towards God to admit those persons to occupy the highest station, or to become members of this house, by whom God was denounced as a crucified impostor. He knew that in these days of religious barbarism he should be denounced as a fanatic for such sentiments, but for this he was prepared.—Mr Fenton supported the amendment. The Jews had all the privileges and protection of Englishmen in their persons and property; but in every country there were preserved certain points that could not be ceded to individual scruples.—Dr Lushington thought those who opposed the bill were violating the tenets of that religion they professed; and he would recommend them to return to their Bible and read it to better purpose. If he had his way, he would expunge from the statute-book every oath, and every disqualification.—Lord John Russell supported the present bill. There would not be, he believed, in consequence of the present measure, more than three or four Jews at the bar; four or five probably occupying inferior offices in the state; and not more than two or three having seats in that house.—The house then divided, when there appeared—For the second reading: Ayes, 158; Noes, 52. Majority, 107.

7. NEGRO EMANCIPATION.—In the House of Lords on Thursday (May 30), amongst many other petitions on the subject of colonial slavery, the Duke of Wellington presented several from Bristol, and other places, against the proposed Ministerial plan. He contended that repeated acts of the legislature gave the proprietor a legal right to his slave, and, therefore, a right to compensation upon depriving him of that slave.—Lord Suffield said, no act of Parliament could deprive a man of his natural rights.—On the same day, in the House of Commons, the debate on the government measure, which had been adjourned from the 13th of May (vide our last publication), was resumed. A great number of immanently signed petitions against the measure were presented, amongst which was one signed by 1800, the most influential bankers, merchants, shipowners, and manufacturers of the city of London.—Upon the motion that the house resolve into committee, Sir R. Vyvyan rose to give the measure his decided opposition. The principle of interference which the plan of Ministers acknowledged, was any thing but calculated to accomplish the desired object. The right of interference of this country was denied, and justly, if legislation were to be founded on representation. He alluded to Lord North's proceeding against the American colonies, and the subsequent efforts to retrace steps of interference, but when it was too late. This showed the consequences of acting on the principle now enforced. Do not let them pursue the tyrannizing system too far. Do not teach large bodies of men to look to foreign powers for assistance when violences were threatened. He proceeded at great length to vindicate the planters from charges which had been brought against them. With respect to the plan proposed by the right hon. gentleman, it was enough to know that every one conversant with the West Indies had declared it to be one which could not practically work.—The house having gone into committee, Mr Stanley rose and at great length replied to the observations of the hon. baronet (Vyvyan). He was astonished to hear the doctrine, that Parliament had no right to interfere now, when that right was admitted in abolishing the traffic. He then went into a detail of the arrangements attempted to be made with the West India body. He admitted those gentlemen made well-grounded objection to paying interest to government on the £15,000,000 proposed to be given in compensation to the slave owners. To obviate this difficulty, government would recommend to Parliament as an equivalent, the impost of an additional duty on sugar, viz. to increase it from 24s. to 27s. per cwt. and as a reduction to that extent had formerly been made without increasing the consumption, he thought he was entitled to assume that no decrease of consumption would result from the imposition, and the revenue might be so increased as to compensate for the sum advanced to the colonists. But supposing that the price of sugar did rise, still the colonists had not to complain, as the increase would fall not on them, but on the people of this country, who were the consumers, and by whom, he had no doubt, it would be cheerfully borne, in order to secure an object which they felt so warm an interest.—Col. Hay at Mr Maxwell Stewart spoke at great length against the measure, as pregnant with disaster to all parties. The latter gentleman quoted the sentiments of Mr Canning and Mr Huskisson in support of his own, that any plan of emancipation, without the concurrence of the slave owners, would bring ruin to the colonies.—Mr Buxton said it was most satisfactory that no one opposed avowedly the emancipation of the negro. He felt bound to resist the clause compelling the negro to work three-fourths of his time without reward. Still, as he saw no alternative, in case of the rejection of this measure, but the precipitation of emancipation by bloodshed and violence, therefore, though he should be sorry to vote against an amendment embracing his own principles, yet he was bound to consult, in the first place, the welfare of the negro, and a regard for his interest compelled him to support the proposition of the right hon. gentleman (Cheers).—Mr Ward supported the plan, which he trusted would have the co-operation of the planters, without which he declared that it could not be successful.—The debate was adjourned to next day (Friday, May 31), when it was opened by Mr Godson, who, after a long defence of the rights and interests of the planters, proposed that twenty millions should be divided amongst the planters, according to the number of their slaves, and ten millions besides be given, by way of loan, to the local legislatures of the colonies.—After a few words from Mr Buckingham, proposing emancipation without farther delay than was necessary for organising a police for the colonies, the debate was again adjourned.—On Monday (June 3), it was resumed by Mr O'Connell, who made a long and powerful speech in favour of immediate emancipation. The negro's liberation, he said, should first be secured, and let the planters' case be considered afterwards. He declared the contemplated scheme of government to be impracticable.—Lord Dalmeny considered that immediate emancipation in the present mental condition of the negro would be highly dangerous.—Admiral Fleming was decidedly averse to any compensation to the West India inters; he could state, on his own authority, that the negroes were perfectly willing to work. However, he did not think twelve years too long a period for the planters making arrangements with their slaves.—Sir Robert Peel said, that, when he considered the great interests involved in this question, at of the West India proprietor, and the amount of compensation to be given him, sunk into insignificance. He considered that Parliament had an undoubted right to decide on the question in the last resort; but he saw the necessity, at the same time, of giving the assistance of the colonial legislatures. He noted the opinions of Burke, Canning, and Mr Buxton himself, against immediate emancipation. They could be careful to avoid the example of the eastern states of America, where the free negroes were in a miserable condition. This measure was totally unseemly the plan put in practice by Bolivar in Venezuela, in the Caracas; yet this latter system had proved most successful. He concluded by stating, that if Ministers carried into effect this most crude, precipitate, and hazardous scheme, they would incur the most awful responsibility.—Lord Althorp said, that he was aware of the great responsibility which Ministers incurred by bringing forward their measure, but they would incur a greater by letting things remain as they were.—Mr Stanley concurred with Sir Robert Peel in thinking, that, although the government of this country should have the initiative of the measure, the details should be filled up by the colonial legislatures. He also agreed that there would not be time to go into all the details this session. In conclusion, and now that the principal resolution was about to be adopted, he could not but congratulate the house and the country, and the friends of humanity in general, that the fiat of emancipation was gone forth from the British House of Commons, and that all that now remained to be settled was a question of pounds, shillings, and pence. (Loud cheers.)—Mr Stanley's first resolution was then carried, as follows:—"That it is the opinion of this committee, that immediate and effectual measures be taken for the entire abolition of slavery throughout the colonies, under such provisions or regulating the condition of the negroes as may combine their welfare with the interests of the proprietors."—On Friday (June 7), the debate was again resumed, when, upon the second resolution being read, "That all children born after the passing of the intended act, or who, at the time of its passing, shall be under the age of six years, be free, and be maintained by their respective parents," Mr Hume proposed an amendment, to the effect that more information was wanted, and that the committee of last session should be re-appointed to make farther inquiries. He blamed the conduct of government on this great matter. He did not think that one sentence uttered by Mr Stanley was founded on any thing like accurate data. He quoted the evidence given before the council of Trinidad, to prove that free negroes were addicted to thieving, drinking, and quarrelling, and were lazy in the extreme. The colonial legislatures had acted very properly in disobeying the orders in council. In fact, the house was legislating in the dark upon this subject, and he was strongly opposed to the headlong course of Ministers.—Dr Lushington said, Mr Hume pretended to be an abolitionist, "but his whole Parliamentary life gave the lie to his professions."—After a few remarks from Mr Stanley, Sir Robert Peel, and others, Mr Hume withdrew his amendment, and the resolution was carried without a division.—The debate was farther adjourned to Monday (June 10), when the third resolution, "That all persons now slaves be entitled to be registered as apprenticed labourers, and to acquire thereby all the rights and privileges of freemen, subject to the restriction of labouring under conditions, and for a time to be fixed by Parliament, for their present owners," was, after much discussion, and the proposing and negating of several amendments, ultimately carried.—Mr Stanley, on moving the fourth resolution, providing compensation to those whose property would be injured by the measure, observed, that as every one connected with West India property had without any exception whatever stated that the sum of £15,000,000 would be inadequate to the loss they must suffer, and that if no more was granted, they would refuse their concurrence or assistance in carrying on those mercantile transactions on which the very existence of the West India colonies depended, government proposed to extend the sum granted as compensation to £20,000,000; and he moved that his Majesty be empowered to grant that sum accordingly.—A warm discussion ensued on this proposition, which was adjourned, and renewed the following evening (Tuesday, June 11).—The increased compensation was resisted by Mr Buller, Mr Pryme, Major Beauchamp, Mr Buxton, and others; and was supported by Lord Sandon, Lord Howick, Sir R. Inglis, &c. Various amendments were put and negated, and the resolution was at last carried by a majority of 219.—For, 296; against, 77.—Mr Stanley stated, that as the packet had been detained in order to carry out to the colonies the decision of Parliament on the government proposition, he would press the next resolution, "That his Majesty be enabled to defray any such expense as he may incur in establishing an efficient stipendiary magistracy in the colonies, and in aiding the local legislatures in providing for the religious and moral education of the negro population to be emancipated."—At the suggestion of Mr Buxton, the words, "on liberal and comprehensive principles," were added, and the resolution was agreed to. The whole of the resolutions were reported, and the house resumed.—Mr Bernal, on Wednesday (June 12), brought up the report of the committee. The resolutions were read and agreed to, and a bill in pursuance of them was ordered to be brought in.

8. BANK OF ENGLAND CHARTER.—On Friday (May 31), Lord Althorp introduced this important question to the house. The principles, he said, to be kept in view were the convertibility of the paper issued into money; the security of the solvency of the bank which issued the circulating medium, and the security to be taken against undue fluctuations in the amount of the currency. The question for decision was, whether it was more desirable that the management of the circulating medium should be managed by a single bank, or by a competition of different banks. He admitted that there were advantages in the competition of banks, but thought that the advantages preponderated in favour of a single bank acting under proper checks. He thought that to place a bank under the management of the government would be to offer considerable temptations to abuse. He then stated the terms of the proposed renewal of the bank charter for 21 years, the chief points of which are as follow:—

1. The charter is to be renewed for twenty-one years, subject to this condition, that at the expiration of ten years the then existing government may put an end to it by giving twelve months' notice.
2. No banking company consisting of more than six partners is to issue notes payable on demand within the metropolis, or sixty-five miles of it. Banking companies, however, consisting of any number of partners established at a greater distance from London than sixty-five miles, may draw bills on London without restriction as to the amount, and issue notes payable in London.
3. Bank of England notes are to be a legal tender, except at the bank itself or its branches.
4. Bills of no longer date than three months are not to be subject to the usury laws.
5. An account of the state of bank issues, and of the quantity of coin and bullion on hand, is to be delivered weekly to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and an average to be published quarterly in the Gazette.
6. A bill is to be introduced into Parliament for the regulation of country banks; and its provisions are to be such as shall induce joint-stock banking companies to circulate Bank of England notes.
7. The allowance to the bank for transacting the public business is to be reduced by the sum of £120,000; and the bank agrees to receive from the government 25 per cent. of the debt of £14,500,000 now due.

His lordship observed, that he did not think the making bank notes a legal tender would have the effect of driving gold out of the country. After adverting to the advantages anticipated from the exemption of bills not exceeding three months' date from the operation of the usury laws, he stated, that, with respect to joint-stock banks, he proposed as the conditions on which charters should be granted to them, that one-quarter of their subscribed capital, instead of one-half, as required in the instance of joint-stock banks issuing notes, should be paid up and deposited as before; that their shares should not be less than £100 each; and that the partners in such banks should be only liable to a responsibility to the amount of their shares. He also proposed that the corporations of those banks should not, as such, hold any shares in those banks. In a case where a charter was to be granted, it must be at the discretion of the government to decide whether the amount of capital subscribed was a sufficient amount for the locality in which the bank was situated, and whether the charter asked for should be granted. He hoped, however, that every proper facility would be given to the establishment of such banks. By means of a stamp duty, the government would at all times be enabled to know the exact amount of country bankers' notes in circulation; but he thought it desirable that it should also have the means of knowing the exact amount of the whole available assets to meet the demand upon them. He proposed that a statement of the accounts of each individual bank should be sent up to London as a strictly confidential paper, which was not to be published in a separate form; but the accounts being added together, the total result would be given to the public periodically. He concluded by moving resolutions expressive of the sanction of the house to the plan proposed.—Mr Baring said, that forcing the paper of the Bank of England on the country in the way proposed, would to a certainty reduce the circulation of specie. There was part of the noble lord's arrangement he had the greatest objection to, and it was the publicity of the affairs of the Bank of England. In times of difficulty their means might be straitened, and the publicity of them would create alarm, and produce a panic where no cause of alarm existed. The bank would consequently be obliged to restrict its confidence in the public for its self-preservation. In the year 1825, the year of the panic, if the public had been then aware of the state of the affairs of the bank, it would have been obliged to have stopped payment.—Mr Grote thought the publication of the bank's affairs ought to be weekly, instead of monthly.—Mr J. Smythe gave the noble lord great credit for his statement, but he thought greater confidence ought to be reposed in the bank directors.—In answer to a question from Mr O'Connell, Lord Althorp said, that the notes of the bank were only to be a legal tender in England and Wales.—Colonel Torrens contended that the operations of the bank had produced ruinous fluctuations, and that the only security for the public would be in the establishment of a bank under the direct control of government.—After a few more observations, the discussion was adjourned till Monday se'nnight.

9. CONTEST IN PORTUGAL.—In the House of Lords on Monday (June 3), the Duke of Wellington, pursuant to notice, brought forward his motion for an address to the King, praying that strict neutrality be preserved between the belligerents in Portugal. He complained that Ministers had refused to prevent the sailing of expeditions, and the fitting out of armaments from this country. Amongst other expeditions, there was one, consisting of the Asia, the Fury, the Juno, and another, that were detained by the commissioners of customs, but were afterwards released. Was this neutrality? He wished to see the affidavits of this proceeding. But what had been the result? Men, arms, ammunition, stores, provisions, had been sent from this country to keep up the war with Portugal. This was known to every man in the country but his Majesty's government. All this, he maintained, was a violation of treaties, and an abandonment of the spirit of neutrality upon which they professed to act. The meaning of neutrality was to withhold succour from both parties, not to allow assistance to both. If the government were really determined to assist Don Pedro, he contended it would be more honourable in them to say so at once, than to make professions which were contradicted by their conduct, making what he called an underhand war against the de facto ruler of Portugal. He warned the house, that, if Don Pedro should succeed with the aid of British adventurers, the consequence would be a civil war, not only in Portugal, but in Spain. After recommending that his Majesty should at once recall his subjects who were engaged on both sides of the contest, the noble duke concluded by moving the address.—Earl Grey vindicated, at great length, the conduct of Ministers since coming into power, in reference to Portuguese affairs. With respect to the arms, provisions, &c., said to have been sent out to Don Pedro, he considered it clear and indisputable in the law of nations, that merchants, as traders in a neutral country, may furnish either or both of two belligerent parties with shipping, arms, provisions, and other material of war, without thereby committing a breach of neutrality. The noble lord took credit to Ministers for dismissing Admiral Sartorius from the British service; and if Captain Napier also entered the service of a foreign state, he would be liable to be similarly dismissed. He said that it was evident all the noble duke meant by making this motion was to pass a censure upon his Majesty's government.—The Earl of Aberdeen said, that any force raised in this country for the service of Don Pedro, under any circumstances, was an infringement of that neutrality which was professed, and contrary to the law of nations. It was impossible for any man, having the feelings of an Englishman, to contemplate the measures adopted respecting both Spain and Portugal without the deepest regret.—The Marquis of Lansdowne considered that there was no ground for the noble duke's motion; let him call for the production of papers connected with the subject; and after all the facts of the case were before the house, he was certain that the Ministers of the crown would be vindicated in the course they had taken in respect of Portugal.—The Earl of Eldon considered it an insult to the King to have allowed men to enlist in the service of a foreign power in the manner they had done recently. It was a maxim of the common law, that no subject could engage in a war, to aid any sovereign with whom his Majesty had declared his intention to occupy a neutral ground.—The Lord Chancellor, notwithstanding the high authority just given, would maintain that it was perfectly consistent with international faith to allow shipments of arms and military stores, and even men, to aid foreign powers with which we were not at war. It was strict neutrality if no favour was shown to one party more than to another. The noble and learned lord observed, that he had seen enough of their lordships that night to convince him that the motion was a vote of censure, and had for its object the turning out of the Ministers. He did not mean to say it was intended to turn out Ministers by this measure; but that it would have the effect of doing so if the majority said "content," there could not be a doubt.—Lord Wynford deprecated the conduct of Ministers as respected the course adopted towards Portugal, and should vote for the motion. England was bound to maintain the strictest neutrality as regarded Portugal. He denied being actuated by party feeling, and thought that Lord Brougham's concluding argument was used much too frequently, unless it was intended to shut up the House of Lords.—The Duke of Wellington briefly replied, and disclaimed the most distant wish to pass a vote of censure by his motion on his Majesty's Ministers.—Their lordships then divided. There appeared—For the motion, 80; against the motion, 68. Majority against Ministers, 12.—Lord Kenyon then moved that a deputation of their lordships, with white staves, do carry the address to his Majesty.—Agreed to.—In the Commons on the same evening, Lord Palmerston stated, in reply to a question from Colonel Evans, that as soon as Donna Maria was rendered by the actual possession of her dominions a sovereign de facto as well as de jure, her recognition by this country would at once take place, but that the possession of Oporto and the Azores did not entitle her to be recognised as the reigning Queen of Portugal.—At a later hour (and, as was understood, after learning the division in the House of Lords), Colonel Davies gave notice, that on Thursday he would submit a motion to the house, expressive of its confidence in the Ministry relative to their conduct in the affairs of Portugal.—On Tuesday (June 4), Lord Ebrington said he wished to receive an assurance from Lord Palmerston that no change should take place in the foreign policy of Ministers until the house had had an opportunity of expressing its opinion respecting it.—Lord Palmerston replied, that so long as Ministers performed the task of advising the crown, they would not swerve in the slightest degree from those principles they had always acted upon.—Thursday (June 6), Colonel Davies, according to notice, moved “that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, regretting the continuance of hostilities in Portugal, and expressive of the grateful acknowledgments of that house for the conduct pursued by his Majesty’s Ministers with respect to the affairs of that country.” It would be affectation were he to attempt to conceal the motives under the influence of which he then rose in that house. He brought forward the motion in the view and hope of doing away the prejudicial effects of the decision come to by the other house of Parliament. He certainly could have no wish to be instrumental in bringing the two houses into collision; but at the same time he could not forego the opportunity of asserting the undoubted right which belonged to that house of expressing its own opinion upon the course which this country was pursuing towards Portugal.—Lord Morpeth seconded the motion. He took a retrospect of the conduct of Don Miguel, whom he characterised as a rebel, a usurper, a tyrant, and a murderer, and as being the representative of the Conservative interests in Spain. His lordship then animadverted in bitter terms upon the vote of the spiritual peers on the previous evening, who, he said, while they testified the most extreme anxiety to have a measure for the sacred observance of the Sabbath, scrupled not to take under their pious care a cause grounded on the breach of every obligation, and stained with the commission of every crime.—Sir Henry Hardinge said it had been long notorious that arms, ammunition, vessels, and men, were supplied to Don Pedro from this country. He did not rise to defend Don Miguel, but he might be permitted to ask who and what Don Pedro was? He asserted that his career had been begun for purposes of ambition, and was continued for purposes of pillage. He had used undue means to inveigle soldiers into his service, and afterwards treated them excessively ill. All sorts of vile and desperate characters had flocked to him. If such a system were tolerated, they would shortly have the ports and harbours of this country converted into nests of pirates, from whence expeditions might be sent forth to annoy all the peaceable states of Europe.—Mr Robinson said the House of Lords had only exercised its undoubted and constitutional privilege in the vote it had given, and the present motion was equally unnecessary and inexpedient. He deprecated it on the ground that it went not only to bring the Commons in collision with the Lords, but because its effect must be to create a feeling in the minds of peers, that there existed in that House of Parliament a disposition to interfere unnecessarily with the privileges of the other.—Lord John Russell denied that the vote would have any such tendency. Ministers had pursued that course of policy with regard to Portugal which they thought conducive to the best interests of the empire; and they fearlessly appealed to the vote of the house to prove that they had been right.—Mr O’Connell supported the motion; and as the voting for it ostensibly implied confidence in Ministers, nobody would suspect him of interested motives. But as the House of Lords by their vote had given protection to Don Miguel, it was time that the House of Commons made a declaration in favour of Don Pedro.—Sir R. Peel said he could perfectly easily understand Mr O’Connell’s motive for supporting the motion. He would go any length to involve the country in a war for the sake of his principles, or to put down an individual to whom he was opposed. He would ask the house if it were a safe principle to refuse to acknowledge a sovereign on account of his personal misconduct? He quoted the opinion of Mr Fox relative to making peace with Bonaparte in 1800. Mr Fox said that it was quite enough to justify the British government in considering Bonaparte as the ruler of France, that the French people actually did obey him. Now, he contended, that as the Portuguese people acknowledged and obeyed Don Miguel as their sovereign, his character was of no consequence to other nations, who ought also to recognise him. He contended that the neutrality had been violated in the most unjustifiable and open manner, and concluded by declaring, that, upon the whole, he considered the policy of the government as dangerous, unjust, and prejudicial to the best interests of the country.—After a few observations from Lord Palmerston, Colonel Evans, and Sir S. Whalley, in support of the motion, the house divided—For the motion, 361; against it, 98. Ministerial majority, 263.—On the same evening, in the House of Lords, the Marquis Wellesley, as Lord High Steward of the Household, delivered his Majesty’s answer to the address of their lordships, voted on the preceding Tuesday. It was in the following laconic terms:—“I have already taken all such measures as appeared to me necessary for maintaining the neutrality which I had determined to observe in the contest now carrying on in Portugal.”—On Monday (June 10), Lord Althorp brought up and read his Majesty’s reply to the address of the House of Commons, which was as follows:—“I have received with great satisfaction the expression of your concurrence in the policy which I have pursued with reference to the affairs of Portugal; and you may be assured that I shall use all my influence to put an end to the differences now existing in that unhappy country.”

10. DUTIES ON WHISKY.—On Wednesday (June 5), Sir John Dalrymple presented a petition from the magistrates of Edinburgh, praying that an additional duty might be put upon ardent spirits.—Mr Gillon hoped that if any alteration took place in the duties on ardent spirits, it would be by lowering them, instead of putting on any advance. He argued that low duties did not tend to increase, but to decrease immorality.

11. IRISH EDUCATION.—On Monday (June 10), Mr A. Johnstone presented a petition from the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, against the system of government national education in Ireland. The hon. member deprecated any plan of education that did not admit persons of all persuasions to the enjoyment of its benefits.—Mr Hume hoped the house would pay no attention to this petition, the sole object of which was to stop a system whose operations were going on well in Ireland.—Mr Johnstone denied the petitioners had any such objects in view as were attributed to them.—Mr McLeod deplored the sentiments which the General Assembly had on the present occasion expressed. The majority of Presbyterian ministers in Scotland, especially of the dissenters, who were inferior in respectability and numbers to nobody—not even to the General Assembly—he knew was decidedly in favour of the system.—Colonel L. Hay vindicated the conduct and sentiments of the General Assembly, and stated, in proof of their liberality of feeling towards Roman Catholics, that they were the first public ecclesiastical body in Scotland which had petitioned in favour of the removal of their civil disabilities.

12. SCOTCH LAW REFORMS.—On Tuesday (June 11), Mr R. Wallace obtained leave to bring in a bill for improving the forms of process, shortening the delays, and lessening the expenses of litigation in the Court of Session in Scotland; also for regulating the forms of procedure, and diminishing the expenses in appeals from the said court to the House of Peers, and also in appeals in civil causes at the circuit courts in Scotland; and, on the same evening, leave was also given to bring in a bill for the better regulating the forms of process in sheriff and burgh courts in Scotland, and for adding to the powers and jurisdiction thereof, with a view to shorten the delay and lessen the expense of litigation in said sheriff and burgh courts in Scotland.

13. IRISH TITHES COMMUTATION.—On Wednesday (June 12), upon the motion for the house resolving itself into a committee on the Irish tithes act, Mr Lambert moved an amendment, to the effect that the pledges given by Ministers, that the bill for the suppression of disturbances in Ireland should not be applied to the collection of tithes, had not been fulfilled, and that the employment of the military and police forces, in the collection of tithes, is highly unconstitutional, and ought to be discontinued.—Lord Althorp admitted that in some cases the coercion act had been illegally converted into an engine for the collection of tithes, but observed, that, as soon as the circumstances had been communicated to government, orders had been sent, not only to prevent the recurrence of such proceedings, but to suspend the collection of arrears of tithes altogether.—The amendment was supported by Mr O’Ferrall, Mr H. Grattan, Mr F. O’Connor, Mr O’Connell, Mr Fitzgerald, and others.—Mr Stanley defended the conduct of the Irish government, and contended, that, with the exception of one instance, the coercion act had not been applied to enforce the payment of tithes, and that in the case alluded to, the Irish government had taken prompt measures to punish the offenders, and to prevent such practices in future.—After several other members had spoken against the amendment, the house divided—For the amendment, 45; against it, 197. Majority for the original motion, 152.—Lord Althorp then proposed a resolution, to the effect that an advance should be made to the clergy of Ireland, in lieu of arrears of tithes of 1831, 1832, and 1833, and that the money should be repaid by a land tax on those lands for which the tithes were in arrear.—A long and desultory conversation ensued on this proposition, and the further consideration of it was postponed till Friday (June 14).—It was then commenced by Mr O’Connell expressing his approbation of the resolution, which he took to be a virtual extinction of tithes in Ireland. He was happy to think that the new secretary for Ireland—perhaps he would permit him to say his “friend”—(Mr Littleton took off his hat and bowed, in token of assent, amidst the laughter and cheers of the house)—had begun his career in a way that was likely to satisfy that country.—Mr Fian wished to know how the tax in lieu of tithe-arrears was to be levied. Was it to be levied on the tenants? If so, he wished to know, in cases where the present tenants had refused to pay tithe if the incoming tenant should be liable? Was an incoming tenant to be liable, or the landlord?—Lord Althorp admitted that in that case some injustice would be done. The tenant who had refused to pay tithes would escape the payment, and the charge must be paid by the landlord.—Mr Gisborne said it was then clear that the person who owed the money was not to pay it. The crown had made the people its debtors, but the arrears were not paid; now, the landlord is to be made the tithe-proctor, to collect what the crown cannot collect.—Mr Littleton said the amount of arrears of tithe due for 1831, after deductions, was £1,104,285. Of this, proceedings had been instituted to recover £83,354. The amount of arrears for which no proclamations were issued, or issued, subsequently suspended, was £20,931. Of this £83,354, for which proceedings were taken, £12,100 only had been recovered. Such had been the result of the act of last year. After this successful opposition to the law, he knew no course to adopt, unless it were some measure of adjustment similar to that proposed by Lord Althorp.—After various observations from other members, the resolution was put, and carried by a majority of 270 to 4.

—In the House of Lords, on the same day, Earl Wicklow moved for a return of the sums collected by the government under the act of last year, for the recovery of tithes and relief of the clergy. He severely blamed government for their measures, which, he said, had been most injurious to the country.—Lord Melbourne replied to the noble earl in a strain of ridicule, which caused much laughter. He said he loved to hear himself talk was like Narcissus contemplating his own beauty in the fountain.—The Duke of Wellington said, the plain state of the question was this: Here was one description of property, for the loss of which the owners were to be compensated—how? By a land-tax levied on another species of property. That was the proposition. And how it was to be worked—what were the details, they were entirely in the dark about. They were not only in ignorance, but Ministers had shown that they were not able to give any information upon the subject. He reproached government for promoting the great agitator to the dignity of King’s counsel, at a time when he should have been punished for breaking the laws.—Earl Grey defended the conduct of government in a speech of great length.—Lord Brougham maintained, that, at the time Mr O’Connell was made a King’s counsel, he was not acting illegally; and that the honour was no more than that learned an eminent individual was entitled to.

14. EAST INDIA COMPANY’S CHARTER.—On Thursday (June 13), Mr Charles Grant laid before the house the proposed arrangements by government respecting the renewal of the East India Company’s charter. The hon. gentleman, in a speech of four hours’ length, went into a minute detail of the history of the company—their sources of revenue—the extent of their territories—their expenditure—their local system of government—the relation in which they stood to the mother country—their monopolies &c. &c. Our limits prevent us from attempting even an outline of the speech; but this is the less necessary as we gave, in our number for May, a succinct view of all the matters touched upon. The following are the resolutions which he concluded by moving:—

1. That it is expedient that all his Majesty’s subjects should be at liberty to repair to the ports of the empire of China, and to trade in tea, and in all other productions of the said empire, subject to such regulations as Parliament shall enact, for the protection of the commercial and political interests of this country.

2. That it is expedient, that, in case the East India Company shall transfer to the crown, on behalf of the Indian territory, all assets and claims of every description belonging to the said company, the crown, on behalf of the Indian territory, shall take on itself all the obligations of the said company, of whatever description, and that the said company shall receive from the revenues of the said territory such a sum, and paid in such a manner, and under such regulations, as Parliament shall enact.

3. That it is expedient that the government of the British possessions in India be entrusted to the said company, under such conditions and regulations as Parliament shall enact, for the purpose of extending the commerce of this country, and of securing the good government, and promoting the moral and religious improvement of the people of India.

Mr Grant explained in his speech, that the company were to retain the government of India for a fixed term of twenty years; that an additional presidency was to be established in the north-western districts, now included in the jurisdiction of the Bengal presidency; that the control of the governor-general over the subordinate governments should be rendered more definite, and efficient; and that a body of commissioners should be sent to Canton, to watch over and protect British interests in the place of the company’s factory. Mr Grant laid much stress on the proposed abolition in India of all distinctions between Europeans and natives, and the subjection of both to precisely the same laws. The settlement also of Englishmen in India is to be promoted in future. The guarantee fund of £1,200,000 is to be increased to £2,000,000, and is to be considered as security for the payment of the dividend, as well as for the capital of the company. The proprietors may claim to be paid off at the rate of £100 for every £5, 5s. and y, when the political government of India shall be taken out of their hands. Mr Grant stated, his was ready to be brought in as soon as the resolutions had been regularly adopted by the house. Several members spoke, all in approbation of the resolutions, with the exception of Mr Buckingham; and they were ultimately (with that exception) unanimously agreed to.—On Monday (June 17), Mr C. Grant, and other members of the House of Commons, appeared at the bar of the House of Lords, and requested a conference, with the view of obtaining their Lordships' concurrence to the resolutions adopted by the Lower House, when Friday (June 28) was appointed for the discussion.—(As the East India Company have agreed to the terms proposed by government, the question may be considered as nearly settled.)

5. IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—On Thursday (June 13), the Solicitor-General brought in a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, which was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Wednesday (June 26). The learned gentleman stated briefly the chief features of the bill, which enables creditors to lay hands on all the property of their debtors, without much trouble or expense, while it saves the latter from the demoralising and destructive consequences of incarceration. It gives immediate execution on bonds and bills, as soon as they become due, without making the creditor have recourse to an expensive process of an action; it compels debtors to make a full disclosure of their property, as is now partially done under the lords' act; and it gives the creditor remedy against property of all kinds, whether freehold, freehold, or money in the funds.

16. INQUEST ON CULLEY—NATIONAL CONVENTION.—On the same day, Mr Roebuck presented a petition from the jury on the inquest which sat on the body of Culley the policeman, complaining of the verdict having been set aside by the Court of King's Bench. The hon. member charged his Majesty's government with a gross dereliction of duty on the occasion of the Coldbathfields meeting. In the first place, he charged them with creating a riot, and not suppressing it; secondly, with bringing into contempt most useful and efficient body, the police; and, thirdly, by their subsequent proceedings, bringing to disrespect and discredit the administration of public justice.—Mr George Lamb defended the conduct of the government, and said that Ministers were perfectly justified in employing the police to disperse an assemblage called for the purpose of establishing a national convention, and to upset the constitutional legislature of the country. A more illegal meeting never was convened; and if former governments had allowed such meetings, that was no reason why the present should forget its duty. There could be no doubt but that the object of that meeting was to call delegates from all parts of the country, to take the legislature into their own hands. The notice from the Home Office was not a proclamation—it was a caution to all well-disposed persons to abstain from attending the meeting.—A long and violent discussion ensued, which was ultimately adjourned to next day, in which Mr O'Connell, Mr Hume, Sir S. Walley, Colonel Evans, and Mr Cobbett, supported the petition, and censured, in the bitterest terms, the conduct of government.—The petition was laid on the table.

17. POLITICAL UNIONS.—In the House of Lords on Monday (June 17), Earl Winchelsea asked Earl Grey if government yet intended to bring in any measure for suppressing the political unions.—Earl Grey replied, that, at present, he did not think any steps necessary for that purpose.—Lord Eldon said, the common law was perfectly sufficient, if the government was only inclined to enforce it.

18. LOCAL JURISDICTION BILL.—On the same day, Lord Brougham moved the second reading of this bill (for the establishment of local courts to decide in small debt causes), which, he said, was intended to put an end to a system of law so tedious, uncertain, and expensive, as to be nearly tantamount to a denial of justice to the trading and poorer classes in England. The people of Scotland had long enjoyed the benefit of local courts. In those courts, exclusively of the small debt jurisdictions, on an average of three years not less than 22,000 cases were tried annually, and, on an average, only 117 were appealed, of which not one-half were prosecuted. These courts, in the time stated, had under their decision property of the value of L.500,000. A man might sue there for L.12; and if the action were undefended, which was often the case, the costs did not exceed 10s. If the case were defended, it might come to L.5, which was a great deal too much; and in this respect the courts ought to be improved. In Scotland, a man would find that he obtained the sum for which he sued, within 5s., while the plaintiff in Westminster Hall very frequently found himself out of pocket in consequence of his costs in recovering a verdict for L.15 or L.20. Now, in Scotland, a man who sued and recovered a verdict for L.100 would not find himself out of pocket more than 20s. The present bill, he said, was merely an experimental one, which might be modified and altered afterwards, as was found necessary. He had contemplated, at first, that the jurisdiction of the courts should extend to sums of L.100 and under; but, in compliance with the suggestion of the common law commissioners, he had limited it to L.20 for the present. He hoped that the result of this experiment would be to afford the people of this country cheap, effectual, and universal justice.—Lord Lyndhurst had studied this bill with the deepest attention, and had likewise consulted with the most eminent of the legal faculty about it, and their common opinion was, that it would be productive of incalculable evil. It was not surprising that this should be a popular measure, as it promised cheap and expeditious law. But their Lordships must keep in mind, that cheap law did not always mean cheap justice, nor expeditious law expeditious justice. The present central system of administration was ex facie expensive in individual cases, but it was, at the same time, the powerful means of checking useless litigation, as it necessarily constituted an intelligent and honourable bar; so that, when a man unfortunately engaged in a wrong contest, his legal advisers at once told him he had no chance of success, and advised him to abandon his intention. If the proposed system was adopted, he feared these local courts would swarm with low, needy, and unprincipled men, whose sole object would be to propagate a spirit of litigiousness amongst the labouring classes, equally demoralising and destructive. In support of these views, he alluded to the case of America, and quoted the testimony of Captain Basil Hall, who says—"The principles of bringing justice home to every man's door, and of making the administration of it cheap, have had a full experiment in America, and greater practical curses, I will venture to say, were never inflicted on any country. Lawyers abound in every village, and no person, be his situation or conduct in life what it may, is free from the never-ending pest of law-suits. Servants, labourers, every one, in short, on the least occasion, flies off to the neighbouring lawyer, or justice of the peace, to commence an action. No compromise or accommodation is ever dreamt of, and 'law must decide every thing.'" The noble lord concluded a long and able speech, by observing that this was no party question, and he was sure the house would not treat it as such. He moved that the bill be read that day three months.—Lord Brougham replied at great length, and the gallery was cleared for a division, but none took place, and the bill was pro forma committed.—(The Ministerial journals allege that the attendance of opposition lords at the above debate, which was unusually large, was in consequence of a preconcerted plan to throw out the bill, but that the Lord Chancellor's arguments were so convincing, they could find no excuse for doing so. This supposition, however, seems to have originated solely in the suspicious minds of the journalists themselves, who regard their party as standing on very insecure ground at the present moment.)

19. QUAKERS' AND MORAVIANS' AFFIRMATION BILL.—In the House of Lords, on Thursday (June 20), this bill was read a second time.—The Bishop of London made some observations on the demoralising consequences of the frequency of custom-house and other oaths, called for on all occasions in this country; which Lord Brougham warmly seconded, and begged the reverend prelate to take up the question, as no one was so capable of doing it justice.

20. SABBATH OBSERVANCE BILL FOR SCOTLAND.—Sir Andrew Agnew obtained leave, on Monday (June 17), to bring in a bill to secure the better observance of the Sabbath in Scotland.

21. CORN LAWS.—On Tuesday (June 18), Mr Fryer moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the existing corn laws. His object was not to pull down the aristocracy, but to procure employment for the poor. The hon. member argued at some length against the policy of the corn laws, and said their repeal would benefit all classes.—Lord Althorp thought, that as the question had been already thoroughly discussed this session, it was not necessary to go over the ground again.—Mr Hume, Mr O'Connell, Colonel Evans, Mr Mark Phillips, Mr W. Whitmore, and Mr Aglionby, supported, and Major Handley, Mr Bennett, Mr Pease, and the Earl of Darlington, opposed it.—The motion was finally rejected, the numbers on the division being—For it, 47; against it, 72.

22. STAMP-DUTIES ON ADVERTISEMENTS BILL.—This bill was read a second time in the House of Lords on the above day.—(The change of duty will, it is believed, come into operation on the 6th July.)

23. CHURCH PATRONAGE.—On the same day, Mr Sinclair intimated in the House of Commons the postponement of his resolutions in regard to church patronage to the 4th of July, in consequence of a renewed application for delay on the part of the government.—In the course of the evening, Mr Johnstone asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject, and expressed a hope that the sentiments of the government would be communicated before the close of the session.—Lord Althorp stated that he was fully aware of the deep interest felt by the people of Scotland on the question, and also of the great importance of the subject; that it would obtain the most serious consideration on the part of his Majesty's Ministers; and that, although he had hoped the matter might have been settled in the General Assembly on a late occasion, he felt confident that the determination of the government would be satisfactory to the people of Scotland.

Foreign News.

UNITED STATES.

THE most important intelligence lately received from America, is an account of an outrage perpetrated on the person of the President, by a Lieutenant Randolph, who, it appears, had lately been dismissed from the naval service of the republic—for what reason is not stated. President Jackson was about to proceed from Washington, with a numerous party, on board of a steam-boat, to Fredericksburg, Alexandria, for the purpose of there laying the foundation stone of a monument to the mother of General Washington, when Lieutenant Randolph followed him on board, and down to the cabin, which was crowded with officers and others of the official cortege, and, walking up to him, accused him of having wantonly and unrelentingly persecuted him (Lieut. Randolph) for four years past. The President, in surprise, said he had never heard of him before; but ere he could demand an explanation, his accuser laid hold of his nose, which he tweaked until it bled. The assailant was instantly knocked down by some of the bystanders, and forced ashore; and his friends forthwith took the most expeditious means of removing him out of the district. It would appear that this outrage on the President had excited the most lively indignation throughout the states, and public meetings were holding to testify the general abhorrence of the action.

President Jackson had arranged to set out on a tour through the northern and eastern states, and preparations were every where making to receive him with due honours, but the latest accounts represent his health to be so infirm as to render the contemplated expedition exceedingly doubtful.

It is said that the cholera has again broken out at New Orleans.

TURKEY.

It seems beyond a doubt that the treaty, mentioned in our last, between the Porte and Mehemet Ali, by which Adana, and the other provinces claimed by the latter in addition to the Egyptian territories, are ceded to him, has been ratified; but we are not so certain that hostilities will cease either with the objects which occasioned them, or the parties with whom they originated. From the numbers of Russian troops which continued to be poured into Constantinople, even after the treaty was on foot, the most lively jealousy appears to have been displayed by the French plenipotentiary respecting the designs of the Czar—so much so, indeed, as at one time to threaten a complete rupture between the mediatory powers. By the latest accounts, however, these misunderstandings appear to have been got over. It is confidently stated that the Russian troops are preparing to retire from Constantinople, and that a treaty has been signed between Count Orloff and the Reis Effendi, stipulating for this, and for the payment of an indemnity to Russia on account of the expenses incurred by the march of her troops to Constantinople.

GERMANY.

ACCOUNTS have been received of some serious disturbances in Rhenish Bavaria. All over Germany the revolutionary spirit appears to be rapidly spreading, and on almost every point the constituted authorities and the people are at issue. At the celebration of the festival of Hambach, an immense crowd was collected, when they began to sing patriotic songs, and to exhibit the tricolor flag, and other revolutionary emblems. A large body of troops had been assembled to maintain order, and, after a series of reciprocal insults, a desperate conflict at last took place between them and the people. It is mentioned in one of the journals that they fought on both sides with great fury; the number of killed and wounded is supposed to amount to more than 100, and one of the cavalry regiments refused to fire. This commotion has, it is said, excited a very great alarm throughout Germany, and the princes and rulers have begun to adopt rigid precautions against all revolutionary partisans and disturbers of the public peace.

The King of Prussia has adopted strict measures against foreign German universities. No Prussian subject who has studied in a foreign university can practise medicine in Prussia, or fill any public office. In particular cases an exception may be made, but in no case to the universities of Erlangen, Heidelberg, and Wurtzburg.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

THE result of the late Belgian elections gives the Ministry a majority of about thirty. They have gained fifteen from the Opposition by the dissolution of the Chambers. The probability of an ultimate peaceable arrangement with Holland is greatly augmented by this success of the moderate party.

The King of Belgium opened the new session of the Chambers on the 7th ultimo, with a speech from the throne. He stated, that, in consequence of the late convention with Holland, a partial disarming would take place; that the revenue was improving; and that a surplus over the expenditure might be expected. He called the attention of the Chambers to the state of commerce and agriculture, and recommended the forming of a water communication from the Scheldt to the Meuse and the Rhine. This speech was well received, and delivered with much spirit.

The ratification of the preliminary treaty by the Dutch King, detailed in our last, and the removal of the obnoxious embargo, has already had a most cheering effect on the commercial world, and hopes are entertained that Holland and Belgium will now amicably settle their difference, without the interposition of foreign mediation.

FRANCE.

THE French Ministry appear to be by no means on a good understanding with the Chamber of Deputies, where they have twice suffered a defeat by considerable majorities within the last three weeks, but upon questions not reckoned of sufficient importance to induce a resignation. Louis Philip, however, is said to be deeply mortified at one of the votes, being a refusal to grant the sum of 48 millions of francs to complete the gallery of the Louvre, according to a plan of Napoleon.

A disclosure of a somewhat important nature was made in the Chamber at the sitting of June 18. Marshal Soult, in answer to several queries put to him by Marshal Clausel, declared it to be the purpose of government, not only to retain possession of Algiers, but to encourage its colonization from France, and to extend their occupation of the country, as might be found necessary or convenient. This announcement was hailed with much applause by the Chamber, and will doubtless be equally well received by the kingdom in general. The substitution of a civilized community for a horde of pirates is a change, no doubt, to be universally desired; but it remains to be seen whether the other European powers will consent to the exclusive appropriation by France of that important position in Northern Africa, with the prospective conquest of the immense adjacent territory, so openly declared. One thing is clear, that, as the government of Louis Philip undertook to make good all the diplomatic engagements of the Bourbons, and as the Bourbons had solemnly assured the Duke of Wellington that they had no views whatever of conquest in their African expedition, the above declaration of the French Prime Minister does not speak very well for the good faith of his master, or for his own. The predatory and dangerous habits of the Bedouin Arabians, however, who are nothing else than wandering banditti, together with the unenterprising character of Frenchmen themselves, would render the colonization of the Algerine territories by the latter the work of centuries.

The session of the Chambers is virtually at an end, and they were to be closed in due form by Louis Philip in person about the 26th or 28th of June.

The Duchess de Berri has been put on board a French frigate, and sent off, with her baby, to Palermo. Some members of the French Opposition in the Chambers, and a portion of the press, are very angry at her escape; but the Ministry justify the measure, on the ground of expediency. The French journals contain an account of a most affecting interview between Charles the Tenth and M. Chateaubriand, who went to intercede for the Duchess de Berri. The old king is reported to have said—

"The conduct of the Duchess has been very improper; it is an unfortunate affair both for herself and for me; but I, who have not forgotten my own youth, should be the last to be severe with the weaknesses of a poor woman. When one has been guilty of as many errors as I have, he should make allowances for other people. I will not receive her here without her husband; but she may come if accompanied by him, and the wrongs which she has done her children and ourselves shall be forgotten."

When the viscount thanked Charles for his indulgence, and congratulated himself on the success of his mission, and paid his Majesty some courteous compliments, he replied—"Let not that surprise you; I have forgotten all; I have no longer any feeling against any body. I am now nothing but an unhappy old man, who has finished his part in the drama of this world."

The Duchess D'Angouleme is said to be very much incensed against the Duchess de Berri.

On learning the intended release of the Duchess, Charles took the opportunity of soliciting the release of his former Ministers; which application was warmly seconded by most of the diplomatic corps at Paris, backed by M. Talleyrand himself. Louis Philip, however, would not listen to the proposal.

PORTUGAL.

The Marquis de Palmella has again agreed to return to the councils of Don Pedro. He arrived at Oporto, on the 1st June, in company with Captain Napier, and about 600 troops, principally Poles. Great reliance appears to be placed on the efforts of the Marquis by the friends of Pedro; equally from his talents, and the great influence he is said to possess throughout Portugal. The number of "constitutional" troops, however, do not as yet amount to 9000, whilst those of Miguel are 40,000; and as the feeling of the population seems still to be with him, any attempt by Pedro to take the open field—as was lately threatened—would appear to be foolish in the extreme. In fact, it is strongly suspected, notwithstanding all the assertions of the advocates of the ex-monarch, that the various supplies of men, money, and arms, which he has from time to time been receiving, have not advanced his chances of success one jot, and that their only effect will be a protraction of the hour of defeat. Oporto is still closely blockaded by Miguel, and his troops are said to be animated with the greatest enthusiasm for his cause. Pedro's coadjutors, on the other hand, are divided by quarrels and paltry jealousies, such as are almost inevitable in a promiscuous camp, composed of hirelings of every nation, rank, and character. To have kept them so long together, and under any thing like subordination and discipline, argues no little energy of character in their leader. It seems quite clear that Pedro's only hope lies in the chance of an insurrection in the interior in his favour, of which, as we have said above, there appears not the most distant likelihood.

Provisions are stated to be plentiful in Oporto at present, but we learn from private letters that typhus and cholera, particularly the latter, are making dreadful ravages in that city. The number of British troops who have fallen victims has been disproportionately large to the rest of the army. The mortality amongst the troops of Miguel is also reported to be appalling, no less than 150 dying daily between Villa Franca and Lisbon. The present hostile position of parties must add tenfold virulence to the fatality of the malady.

Since the preceding was put in types, letters from Lisbon of a late date have arrived, which contain information of considerable importance. Marshal Solignac has retired from the command of the army, and been succeeded by General Saldanha. Conflicting statements are in circulation concerning this change. By some it is stated that Solignac was dismissed; by others, that Saldanha had proposed a new general plan of military operations entirely different from that of Solignac, but which being approved and adopted by Don Pedro and council, the Marshal's resignation became a matter of necessity. Solignac had also embarked in order to come to England; but was struck, while on board the vessel, with a spent ball from one of Miguel's batteries, which caused so great a contusion that he was obliged to go on shore again.

In addition to this intelligence, we learn, that, on the morning of June 20, a fleet, consisting of the Don Pedro, a two-decker with a vice-admiral's flag, two frigates, two corvettes, an armed brig, with five steam-boats—the latter having between 3000 and 4000 troops on board, had sailed from Oporto for the Tagus. The troops were under the command of the Count de Villa Flor, who was accompanied by the Marquis de Palmella; and the fleet under that of Captain Napier, who has assumed the Portuguese cognomen of Chevalier Don Carlos de Ponce. The number of vessels lying off the mouth of the Douro with provisions were 110. It is also stated that upwards of 3000 had died at Lisbon of cholera.

We also learn from the London journals that the Talavera, line of battle ship, has sailed within the last few days from the Channel for Oporto, for the purpose, it is thought, of resenting some insult alleged to have been offered to the Nautilus by the Miguelite squadron. The present strength of the latter in the Tagus is three two-deckers, one frigate, five corvettes, and two brigs—all under sailing orders.

EAST INDIES.

By recently-received Calcutta papers, we learn that the alarm to the ruinous results from the late extensive commercial failures there, had greatly subsided. At a meeting of the creditors of the Messrs Mackintosh, on the 9th February, the creditors agreed to give the members of the firm a letter of licence for three years; the business to be conducted under the management of five inspectors named in the report. Dividends will be declared and paid as soon, as often, and to such extent, as the inspectors may decide. The inspectors are also empowered, as far as convenient, to pay all demands under five hundred rupees. An allowance of four hundred rupees per month has been made to all the partners of the firm.

A considerable degree of distress prevails among the native population at Madras, occasioned by the failure of the crops in the interior. About 1400 persons are fed at the expense of government, besides those supported by opulent natives, whose liberality is mentioned in terms of high commendation.

It appears that cholera, which has of late been very prevalent in Ceylon, had broken out with considerable virulence in the four companies of the 78th regiment, stationed at Trincomalee, about the middle of October, and that, in the space of three weeks, fifty-six men had died of it. A great many non-commissioned officers had fallen victims.

WEST INDIES.

The Jamaica papers to the 13th May state that it was expected that the new House of Assembly would meet for the dispatch of business on Tuesday the 18th of June. The elections were every where drawing to a close, and the opposition journals were congratulating the colonists on the defeat of the government party. Nothing, of course, was then known of the nature of the intended government measure.

The present season is likely to prove a most ruinous one to the Jamaica colonists, in consequence of a drought, the most continued and severe which has afflicted the island for the last fifteen years. Upon many estates cattle are dying for want of water, and water for the use of the negroes is fetched four or five miles. The crops, in consequence, have completely failed; one estate, usually shipping 160 to 200 hhds. of sugar, can now ship but 36 hhds., and others fall off from one-half to two-thirds. The estimated failure of the sugar crop in Jamaica is from 45,000 to 50,000 hhds., and from the whole British West India colonies the deficiency amounts to nearly 80,000 hhds., being from one-quarter to one-third of the whole quantity usually imported into this country.

The following statement, compiled from official documents, shows at a glance the total amount of the population, produce, imports, and exports of the British West Indies:—

Whites in eighteen islands,	77,460
Coloured (free),	113,890
Slaves,	692,700
Sugar,	3,816,000 cwt.
Coffee,	19,769,500 lb.
Rum,	7,808,000 gal.
Value of exports to Great Britain,	L.8,603,000
Value of imports from Great Britain,	L.4,035,000
Tonnage employed,	263,700 tons.

IRELAND.

INSTRUCTIONS from government have been received by the military and police authorities in Ireland, to the effect that neither of these forces are in future to be employed in the enforcement of tithes, nor in serving legal processes for their recovery; so that tithes may be considered as fairly abolished in Ireland, and it now remains to be seen whether the removal of this popular grievance, which has so long been generally reckoned the prime cause of the insubordinate conduct of the peasantry, will be the means of restoring, or rather creating, peace to that distracted country.

Disturbances still continue partially to agitate several districts; but since the passing of the coercion bill, they have been comparatively few in number. In Kilkenny county, for example, there were but 15 outrages during the month of May. The outrages in the same county during the month of March, which immediately preceded the application of the coercion bill, were no less than 121.

We regret to observe that cholera has again broken out at Kilkenny with much severity, the number of cases averaging between 20 and 30 daily, and many of the fatal.

Mr Thomas Steel, the popular orator, has been arrested and held to bail for publishing a scandalous libel against government.

ENGLAND.

A Windsor paper communicates the melancholy intelligence, that Prince George of Cumberland, who completed his 14th year on the 27th May, has, within a very short period, become wholly deprived of sight.

The Ministerial papers state that his Majesty has addressed a letter to the bench of bishops, through the Archbishop of Canterbury, strongly remonstrating on the impropriety of that right reverend body taking so active a part on a question so purely laical and political, as to contest now going on in Portugal.

The Marquis of Queensberry has been created a Baron of the United Kingdom, by the title of Baron Solway Kinmount, in Dumfriesshire.

From the quantity and magnitude of the public business which it is necessary to settle during the present year, it is expected that Parliament will not be prorogued till about the 12th of August.

Mr Littleton has been returned for Staffordshire without opposition, Lord Ingestrie having declined to come to the poll.

Mr Rankin has been appointed Chief Justice of Sierra Leone. It is supposed the immediate recall of Sir John Jeffcott will be the result of this appointment.

On Tuesday, June 18, being the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo, the Duke of Wellington, as usual gave a splendid entertainment at Apsley House, to his brethren in arms who were present with him at that memorable engagement. On account of the recent political fracas in the House of Lords, respecting the policy of Ministers towards Portugal, his Grace punctiliously refrained, to obviate any misconstructions, from sending the usual invitation to the King. His Majesty, however, sent notice to the Duke of his intention to be present and came accordingly. The Duke received his Majesty on entering, on his knee; but his royal master hastily raised him up, and shook his Grace's hand heartily in both of his. At dinner, when the Duke's old servant and particular attendant (who had in some action saved his life, came for some purpose immediately behind him, the King turned round, spoke most cordially to him, and shook him by the hand.

The anniversary of the birth-day of William Pitt was held, as usual, on the 31st May, in the City of London Tavern. The meeting was most numerous, including many of the most distinguished public characters of the day, and throughout composed of English gentlemen. W. R. Cartwright, Esq., M.P. for Northamptonshire presided; and among the company were—the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Newcastle, the Marquis of Salisbury, the Earl of Eldon, the Earl Bathurst, the Earl Brownlow, the Earl of Harewood, the Earl of Longford, Lord Combermere, Lord Sheffield, Lord Kenyon, Lord Mahon, Lord Encombe, Hon. G. R. Trevor, M.P., Sir R. Vaughan, Bart. M.P., Sir John Chetwode, Bart., Sir R. Gunning, Bart., Sir Charles Knightley, Bart., Sir Brook W. Bridges, Bart., Sir J. Gibbons, Bart., Sir John Forbes, Bart., Sir Geo. Henry Rose, General Peachy, Sir Charles Wetherell, Colonel Sibthorp, Colonel Conyers, Joseph Neild, Esq. M.P., John Round, Esq., Edward Goulburn, Esq., R. W. Vaughan, Esq., R. A. Dundas, Esq. William Ward, Esq., &c. &c. The Duke of Wellington did not arrive until after dinner had commenced; but the moment his name was announced, the whole of the company rose, and received him with much applause. The usual toasts were given, and the evening passed off with much hilarity.

It appears, by the expenditure last year for civil contingencies, that the Earl of Durham received the sum of L.5000 for his special mission to St Petersburg, with the further sum of L.183 for his expenses on board his Majesty's ship Talavera from England to Cronstadt. The whole sum expended in the last year for special missions amounted to L.15,800.

Government has commenced a prosecution against the True Sun evening paper, for counselling resistance to the assessed taxes, and for attempting to bring the House of Commons into contempt.

The produce of the duty on silver plate has averaged out L.70,000 per annum since 1816, on gold plate £6000 per annum, for the last ten years. It is curious at in the year 1825, so notable for fictitious prosperity, e quantity of gold and silver plate stamped was about half greater than usual. The duty on silver plate is . 6d. per ounce, from which it appears that about 300,000 ounces, or 770,000 pounds Troy of silver, are annually converted into plate in this country. The antity of gold consumed in the same way is about 6000 nees annually.

SCOTLAND.

THE CHURCH OF EDINBURGH.

he chief subject of discussion in Edinburgh continues be the annuity tax, for the support of the clergy. The l attempted to be carried through Parliament by the ord Advocate, for the purpose of continuing this tax in modified form, has met with general disapprobation. ith the difference that it provides for the taxing of the embers of the College of Justice, it leaves all the abuses the system untouched. It is a matter of astonishment all that the framer of the bill has not made the small- t provision at least for the reduction of the double t single charges, which is absolutely imperative. Se- ral public bodies met during last month to oppose the ssing of the bill in its present form; among the rest, e Writers to the Signet, who decline abandoning their ivileges. The Faculty of Advocates have resolved to ve their privileges, provided certain terms are granted. n Friday the 21st, a public meeting of the inhabitants as held in the Waterloo Rooms, at which resolutions ere passed, to the effect that a petition should be re- nt to Parliament, praying for the total abolition of e annuity tax; that the seat-rents in the churches ould be made the sole means of support to the clergy; ad that the double charges ought to be reduced to single, incumbents died out. The petition has since been in e course of signature by all classes of citizens. Look- g at all sides of this most vexatious subject of discus- on, it appears that nothing short of a complete renova- of the whole ecclesiastical polity of the city will be f service either to the church or the community. Let ur readers mark the anomalous condition of the church tablishment in Edinburgh. Not reckoning the Canon- e nor Leith, the population of Edinburgh amounts to out 130,000 souls, who are thus divided:—All the Old nd New Town, composing what is called the ancient nd extended royalty, and comprising thirteen parishes, as a population of 55,232. The parish of St Cuthbert's, hich, though once a country district, is now covered a great part with houses, and is in almost every respect s much a piece of Edinburgh as the preceding—(it is s much a piece of Edinburgh as the Tower Hamlets are a piece of London)—has a population of 70,887. These o divisions are under quite different systems of ecclesi- astical management: the portion with the 55,000 souls as thirteen established churches, with eighteen clergy- en, now or lately drawing an aggregate sum yearly of .8000 by means of the annuity tax; while the portion ith the 70,000 souls has but one established church and o clergymen, whose stipends are paid by heritors or ertain landholders; so that the tenants of houses and ops in this quarter do not pay a farthing for the sup- ort of the church. In order to accommodate the abun- ant population of this parish, there are chapels of ease, ut these are supported purely by their seat rental. They evertheless answer the purposes of parish churches, ough it is proper to mention that many of the inhabi- ants of St Cuthbert's attend the ministrations of the city lergy, for whose sustenance they do not in any shape ontribute. By this simple view of affairs, it appears that nearly the whole burden of the established church falls n little more than a third part of the population; in hort, the religion of 130,000 souls is paid for by 55,000. It is thus obvious that there must necessarily be a tho- ough reform in the whole system of ecclesiastical ma- nagement. Until this be done, we feel convinced that e inhabitants will continue their passive resistance to e payment of the annuity tax, whether attempted to be evied under an old and ambiguous, or a new and clearly expressed, act of Parliament.

BANKRUPTCY OF EDINBURGH.

THE newspapers of the past month contain a draft of a bill to be carried through Parliament, placing the receipt and expenditure of the city of Edinburgh hence- forth under a body of commissioners, and which will have much the same effect as a bankrupt sequestration. The commissioners which the bill proposes are, the Right Hon. Robert Lord Viscount Melville; the Right Hon. Sir William Rae of Eskgrove, Baronet; Sir James Gib- son-Graig of Riccarton, Baronet; John Bonar of Ratho, Esq. banker; Richard Mackenzie of Dolphinston, Esq. deputy-keeper of the signet; William M'Hutcheon, Esq. merchant; and John Learmonth, Esq. merchant, present Lord Provost of the city of Edinburgh. To the appoint- ment of this commission, which is to have certain powers over Leith, an opposition, apparently on good grounds, has been made by the Leith Dock Commission, who dread an injury being done to the trade of the port.

ABOLITION OF IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

It will be seen by our Parliamentary summary that the Solicitor-General for England has brought a bill into Parliament for the abolition of imprisonment for debt, with certain provisions for rendering property more avail- able to the diligence of creditors.

We conceive there has scarcely any measure been mooted in Parliament for many years, of more public importance than this; and we are somewhat surprised to observe that it has been projected solely for the benefit of our southern neighbours. It is to be hoped that our Scottish legislators will yet exert themselves to get Scot- land included in the provisions of the act, and rid us of one of the most obnoxious of those still lingering reman- nants of feudalism in our jurisprudence, which are so unsuited to the condition and feelings of modern society.

Imprisonment for debt—that is, where no palpable act of fraudulency is alleged or made out—we have always regarded as a system equally oppressive, pernicious, and absurd. Waiving the legal merits of the question, let us look at it for a moment by the light of com- mon sense. Imprisonment can affect debtors of two de- scriptions only—the knave and the honest man; and it is intended to operate in two ways, namely, as a security and a punishment. Now, as regards the rogue, it is ut- terly inefficacious as either. He is prepared for the cir- cumstance, and takes care to secure as much of his prop- erty as he can for his own use beforehand, without the slightest regard to the just claims of his creditors; and his short term in jail is only a step towards his commene- ing the world anew as a clear man. What does the creditor gain by it? A loss. For he not only recovers not a farthing of his debt, but is obliged to maintain the man who has cheated him while in jail!

It is only upon the honest debtor, therefore, that the severity of the law of imprisonment operates—and op- erates, too, only in one way, namely, as a punishment—that is to say, he is punished for what he cannot possi- bly help. But this is not the worst of it. He is pre- vented during his confinement from making any effort whatever either for liquidating his debts or maintaining his family, if he has one; for what can a tradesman, a merchant, or a public practitioner of any sort, do to re- trieve his affairs whilst immured within the walls of a prison?

There is also another, and, in a philanthropic point of view, certainly not the least matter for considera- tion—we allude to the disheartening and demoralising consequences that ensue from the present system of promiscuous imprisonment. The honest man feels the incarceration of his person as a moral stigma; it degrades him in his own estimation, even more than in that of his fellow-men; and the brand of captivity cleaves to him through life. And when an honest debtor, who has done his utmost, and surrendered his last penny to satisfy the claims of his creditors, finds himself no better treated than the rogue who has done his utmost to defraud his creditors, a strong temptation is held out to him to adopt a less upright course in any future dilemma of the same nature.

It may be a consolation to an ill-used creditor, no doubt, to have the power of punishing the man who has defrauded him, by the ignominious incarceration of his person for a time. But it will be seen that if the present law thus provides the means of punishing the rogue, it may also be converted (as it is, we believe, frequently) into a terrible engine of wanton vindictiveness against the poor but honest man.

We would say, therefore, let every means be adopted to make a man's property and effects available for his debts; enact laws of the severest penalties, whether by imprisonment or otherwise, against fraudulent debtors; but let the present barbarous system of indiscriminate personal degradation be extinguished without delay.

DESTRUCTION OF COAL-PITS.

A VERY remarkable occurrence, namely, the breaking in of a river to a series of coal-pits, has just taken place in the west of Scotland, and is thus described in the Ayr Observer:—On Thursday, the 20th ult., about eleven o'clock forenoon, while Mr Montgomerie, banker in Ir- vine, and another gentleman, were engaged in fishing on the river Garnock, nearly opposite to where they were standing a slight eruption took place in the current of the river, which they at first supposed to be occasioned by the leap of a salmon; but the gurgling motion which succeeded led them to suppose that something serious had occurred, and that the river had broken into the coal mines which surround the place on which they stood. They immediately hastened forward to the nearest pit-mouth, and stated their suspicions, which the pit-head man was at first slow to believe, and it was only after Mr Montgomerie had strongly remonstrated with him that he at length prepared to avert the danger. By this time, however, the men below had heard the rush- ing forward of the water, and were making the best of their way to the bottom of the shaft, but before they reached it several of them were up to their necks in water, and in two minutes more, every one of them would have been drowned. Immediately on the whole of the men being out of the pits, Mr Dodds, the active manager of the works, assembled all his men at the cavity in the bed of the river, over which they placed a coal- lighter laden with such things as they thought calculated to stop the rush of water, such as straw, whins, clay, &c. All their efforts, however, proved unavailing, for the water continued to pour into the mines without ob- struction, producing comparatively very little agitation on the surface of the river, until the following day about three o'clock, when a tremendously large space broke down, which in a short time engulfed the whole body of the stream, leaving the bed of the river quite dry for more than a mile on each side of the aperture, where there had previously been a depth of fully six feet. At this time the fishes on the channel were seen leaping about in all directions. On the flowing of the tide the depth of the water betwixt the chasm and the sea in- creased to about nine feet; then the desolation was awful! The long sweep and prodigious quantity of water rushing into the chasm at this time, made the sight impressive beyond description. Three men, who were in a boat near the spot, had a very narrow escape from being sucked into the vortex, for no sooner had the men got out, than the boat was drawn down with fearful rapidity. The great body of water continued to pour down the chasm until the whole workings of the pits, which ex- tend for many miles, were completely filled; after which the river gradually assumed its natural appearance, and the water attained its ordinary level. At this time the pressure in the pits became so great, from the immense weight of water impelled into them, that the confined air, which had been forced back into the high workings, burst through the surface of the earth in a thousand places, and many acres of ground were to be seen all at once bubbling up, like the boiling of a cauldron. In some places the current was so impetuous as to form ca- vities four or five feet in diameter, and produced a roar- ing noise like the escape of steam from an overcharged boiler. Immense quantities of sand and water were thrown up like showers of rain during five hours, and in the course of a short time the whole of Bartonholm, Longford, Snodgrass, and Nethermains, were laid under water, by which calamity, from five to six hundred per- sons, men, women, and children, have been deprived of employment. We are deeply grieved to learn, that by this unfortunate occurrence these extensive works have been injured to an extent which almost precludes the hope of their ever being restored to their former state.

May 24. A most barbarous murder was committed near West Craigs Inn, on the Glasgow road; the victim was a boy of eight years of age, the son of a decent labourer of the name of Arthur. The body was found lying naked in a ditch at the side of the road, stabbed in various places. A wandering beggar of weak intellect, who called himself William Hall, a tanner by trade, and a native of Yorkshire, was apprehended and lodged in Linlithgow jail, on suspicion, and subsequent investigations almost placed his guilt beyond a doubt; but during the night of the 28th he found means to strangle himself in his cell.

27. A number of gentlemen who had acted with Mr Fergusson of Woodhill as Directors of the Highland Society of Scotland, en- tertained that gentleman to dinner in the British Hotel, previous to his leaving this country for Canada—the Marquis of Tweed- dale in the chair, Sir John Hope, Bart. croupier.

June 1. It may be proper to remind our readers that the reduc- tion of one-half of the soap duty commenced this day.

8. The Benlomond steam-boat, when about two miles on her passage from Newhaven chain pier to Stirling, with upwards of one hundred and twenty passengers, was discovered to be on fire. Signals of distress being observed by the Lion and Stirling Castle steam-boats, they immediately bore down, and rescued the greater part of the passengers, and the remainder, with the crew of the unfortunate vessel, were relieved from their perilous situa- tion by the active exertions of the Newhaven fishermen, so that we have great pleasure in saying no lives were lost. By 11 o'clock the vessel was burnt down to the water's edge and sunk. She has since been raised, however, and taken into Leith harbour.

6. The annual fashionable promenade in the Horticultural Society's experimental gardens, Inverleith, Edinburgh, took place this day. Not less than 2000 individuals, many of them of the first rank and fashion, were present.

28. Pitt Monument.—A stone, of the enormous weight of twenty tons, was this day brought from Craigleith quarry, to form the base of the monument about to be erected in George Street, in honour of the late Mr Pitt. The wagon was drawn by a team of twenty-two horses, and attracted an immense crowd of spec- tators.

Important Mechanical Discovery.—It is stated that a Mr Stein of this town has just discovered the means of applying steam so as directly to produce a rotatory motion in machinery without the intervention of a beam and piston. This invention, which baffled the genius of Watt, who applied the wondrous powers of his original mind to the subject, as well as every other scientific man since his time—for although many patents have been taken out for various ingenious plans, all have proved nearly failures—will create an en- tirely new era in the history of the steam-engine. Its mechanism is said to be beautifully simple. It stands upon a metal plate 27 inches square, and is 16 inches high; but the power could be tre- pled without enlarging the space occupied. The Messrs Nasmyths, the skilful mechanics who constructed it, are confident that they could build an engine of fifty horse power, which would not ex- ceed a cubic yard in bulk—exclusive, of course, of the boiler. This may give some idea of the immense saving of space and weight which the new engine will effect, and of the prodigious advantages which it holds out to steamships and locomotive engines.

We hear that John Jardine, Esq. advocate, has been appointed sheriff-depute of Ros and Croninarty shires, in room of Mr Macleod of Geanies, who has resigned, after filling that important office for the last fifty-nine years. It is also understood that James Ivory, Esq. advocate, is to succeed Mr Traill in the sheriffship of Caith- ness, which is about to become vacant by resignation.

The following are the names of the recently appointed law com- mission for Scotland, for inquiring into the forms of proceedings and fees exigible in the Court of Session, and the forms and juris- diction of sheriff courts in Scotland; and also into the expense of criminal proceedings, the means of enforcing judicial decrees, and the forms of conveyancing in that part of the United Kingdom:—Professor Bell—Mr James Reddie, city clerk of Glasgow—Mr An- drew Skene, advocate—Mr John Cunningham, ditto—Mr Robert Jameson, ditto—Mr Andrew Rutherford, ditto—Mr Adam Ander- son, ditto—Mr William Bell, W.S.—Mr John Dundas, W.S.—Mr William Waddell, W.S. clerk and secretary.

The patronage of the Church of Scotland stands at present thus:— Number of livings, 944; of which, in the patronage of individuals, 583—of the crown, 274—of town councils, 62—of the heritors, 13—of universities and societies, 6—of kirk sessions, 2—of heads of fam- ilies, 2—congregation, 1—disputed, 1.

The four Scots universities receive L 56 6 annually from govern- ment, which is thus divided:—St Andrew's, L 1010—Aberdeen, L 137—Glasgow, L 139—Edinburgh, L 192. This was formerly defrayed from the hereditary revenues of the crown, but now comes into the miscellaneous estimates.

Our readers ought to be aware that, according to the act of Par- liament for regulating the Scotch elections, all persons intending to claim to be registered as voters, or intending to object to the title of any voter already on the register, must lodge their claims, &c. with the town-clerk, on or before the 20th July, after which date they cannot be received. It may be as well that persons who have changed their residence should know, that that circumstance requires that they should re-register their votes.

Important to Tenants.—In a case lately decided in the Circuit Court, Glasgow, it was found that a tenant is not bound to give more than forty days' notice of quitting his premises.

PROGRESS OF EMIGRATION.

The number of emigrants to the United States and the Canadas seems to be daily increasing. During May, the following vessels with emigrants sailed from Greenock:—The Susannah for New York, with 119; the Sovereign for Quebec, with 50; the Agnes for Montreal, with 28; and the Romulus for New York, with 153. Since then, the Corsair has sailed from the same port with 164 passengers; the Tamerlane with 300—both for Quebec; and the Francis for New York, with 121. On June 16, the Zephyr sailed from Cromarty with nearly 200 emigrants for Pictou and Quebec. These individuals are in general of a much superior class to those who have preceded them in the career of adventure. Most of them are in comfortable circumstances, and many of them possessed of very considerable property. The passengers in the Corsair, for instance, it was estimated, possessed amongst them about £40,000; and a detachment of them from the parishes of Lanark and Lesmahagoe carried out about £6,000 in gold with them. Within the last few days, too, three other vessels have left Leith for Australia and America, with emigrants—namely, the Margery, for Quebec and Montreal, with 30; the Economist, for Pictou and Quebec, with 70; and the Scotia, for Van Diemen's Land, with 40. But the spirit of emigration is not confined to Scotland. Daily shipments are going off both from England and Ireland; and we observe, that only within the last fortnight nearly 300 emigrants have sailed from the ports of Maryport and Whitehaven, on the Solway. A great proportion of the latter, however, are, we believe, from the border districts of Scotland. In the course of the present season twenty vessels have sailed from Derry for the United States, having on board 2774 passengers; and twenty for British America, with 3730 passengers. Almost the whole of these are said to be Protestants—a fact well worthy the attention of legislators. But this peculiarity is still more strikingly placed before us, by a statement which we find in a late number of the Dublin University Magazine, of the progressive increase in the number of Protestant emigrants for the last four years. It is as follows:—In 1829, 12,000; in 1830, 21,000; in 1831, 29,500; in 1832, 31,500; making a total of 94,000 during the short space of four years! To sum up for the present—we learn from the trans-Atlantic journals that the number of emigrants who landed at Quebec and Montreal in 1832, in despite of cholera and other discouragements, were no less than 51,746. Of these, 17,481 were from England, 28,204 from Ireland, 5500 from Scotland, and 546 went to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. It is computed that about 4000 emigrants arrived by the way of New York, making the whole number 55,000. Mr Buchanan, the government agent, states, that among the emigrants last year were many wealthy and respectable families; and he estimates the value of the property and money brought with the collective body at £600,000 or £700,000. Employment still continues abundant, and wages good, and most of the emigrants were doing well.

SPINNING OF WOOLLEN YARN IN SCOTLAND.

In a recent number of the Information for the People, giving an historical and descriptive account of the cotton, silk, woollen, and linen manufactures of the United Kingdom, it was stated, in reference to the extensive manufacture of broad and narrow cloths now carrying on at Galashiels and Aberdeen, that "almost all the yarn used in this, as well as the other branches of the manufacture, is procured either from England or abroad;" and it was added, that "our inferiority in the making of yarn may be accounted for by the fact, that the business of wool-stapling is as yet little practised or understood amongst us."

It would appear that we have been led into a mistake in this matter. Since the publication of the foregoing statement, we have received several communications from Galashiels complaining of it. One correspondent says, "It is consistent with my knowledge that not a single ounce of yarn for the purpose of woollen manufacture was ever either procured from England or abroad; and at this moment I can state, without the fear of contradiction, that the woollen yarn spun in Scotland for the fabrication of cloth, flannels, hosiery, &c., are not to be surpassed in any quarter of the globe." And he adds, "that the English manufacturers of hosiery, when they wait upon their customers in Scotland, assure them, as an inducement to purchase, that they manufacture solely from Scotch-made yarns."

We most willingly make public this communication, and reckon it, at the same time, due to ourselves to state, that we relied for our information upon a practical woollen manufacturer, whose eminence and experience fully warranted our confiding in his statement. It strikes us, however, that our Galashiels friends have not clearly construed the meaning of the original passage, which alluded solely to the yarn used in the manufacture of the finer sorts of broad and narrow cloths. As to the yarn used for hosiery, it was distinctly stated in the Information, that "Scotch worsted yarn was in great request abroad," and that "a great proportion of the yarn is sold to the manufacturers in Leicestershire, Derbyshire, and Glasgow."

Postscript.

London, Saturday, June 29.

Letters from Odessa state that the Russian government has ordered the farther embarkation of troops from Odessa to Constantinople to be suspended, in consequence of the retreat of Ibrahim Pacha. The Russian fleet was expected to leave the Bosphorus immediately.

The Spanish Cortes assembled at Madrid on June 18, solely, however, for the purpose of swearing allegiance to their future queen, the young Princess of the Asturias. Every thing passed off quietly; but, three days afterwards, seditious cries were heard, and the population became turbulent; and when the last courier left Madrid, serious commotions were apprehended.

The promoters of the bill for emancipating the Jews have received notice that the House of Lords mean to throw it out. In consequence of this intimation, Ministers have been asked to use their influence in favour of the bill; but they have refused to make it a cabinet question, although they promise their individual support of it.

In the House of Commons on Wednesday (June 26), the bill for the reform of the Scotch burghs was considered in committee, and various amendments were proposed, which were all rejected. Of these, one proposed by Mr Wallace, that magistrates, treasurers, and town-clerks, should be elected by open poll, as well as the town council, was negatived by a majority of 13. Another suggested by Sir J. Hay, that the right of voting for town councillors should be extended to £5 in place of £10 householders, was lost only by a majority of 1, the numbers being 54 to 53. Mr Gillon proposed to extend the right of voting to all burghs, which was negatived by a majority of 44. The report is to be brought up on Monday (July 1), and the amended bill will then be printed.

Money market, four o'clock—Consols for account 90½.

BIRTHS.

- May 26. At Belton, the lady of Captain Hay, R.N.; a son.
27. At 25, Heriot Row, Edinburgh, Mrs Douglas Sandford; a daughter.
June 11. At 8, Moray Place, Edinburgh, Mrs George Wanchope; a daughter.
12. At Albany Place, Edinburgh, Mrs Charles Gordon; a son.
13. At East Manse, Greenock, Mrs McVies; a son.—At Edinburgh, the Hon. Mrs F. Hamilton; a daughter.
17. At Stanley Grove, the lady of the Hon. Colonel Grant, of Grant, M.P.; a son.—At 15, Chester Terrace, Regent's Park, the lady of Adam Duff, Esq.; a daughter.
18. In Weymouth Street, London, the lady of Dr George Gregory; a son.
27. At 22, Royal Terrace, the lady of Colonel Turner, of the 1st regiment Bombay light cavalry; a son.

MARRIAGES.

- May 9. At Florence, at the residence of the English Minister, Lady Augusta Coventry, daughter of the Earl and Countess of Coventry, to the Hon. Henry Fox, eldest son of Lord Holland.
28. At St George's, Hanover Square, the Rev. Henry Walpole Nevill, son of the Hon. George Nevill, and nephew to the Earl of Abergavenny, to Frances, youngest daughter of Sir Edmund Bacon, Premier Baronet, of Raseingham Hall, Norfolk.—At Shennstone Church, Major Wyndham, of the Royal Scots Greys, to Eliza Maria, eldest daughter of the late Henry Case, Esq. of Shennstone Moss, Staffordshire.
June 1. In Castlemead parish church, William Villiers Stuart, Esq. second son of the late Lord Henry Stuart, and brother of Henry Villiers Stuart of Dromana, in the county of Waterford, Esq. to Catherine, only daughter of Michael Cox, of Castletown, county of Kilkenny, Esq., and niece to the Lord Dunally.
4. At St Mary's Church, Lambeth, William Chambers, Esq. of Dorling Place, London.—At Leith Mount, North Leith, William Gavin, Esq. merchant, Leith, to Ann, eldest daughter of John Glover, Esq.—Same day and place, J. Merrieks, Esq. gunpowder manufacturer, Roslin, to Isabella, second daughter of John Glover, Esq.
10. At Carnock, William Maxwell, Esq. eldest son of Sir William Maxwell of Monreith, Bart. to Helenora, daughter of the late Sir Michael Shaw Stewart of Greenock and Blackhall, Bart.—At London, George Aitchison, Esq. merchant, Leith, to Camilla Windus, daughter of Alexander Mundell, Esq. of Great George Street, Westminster.

DEATHS.

- April 3. At Odessa, Nicholas Ipsilanti. This gentleman was the younger brother of Alexander Ipsilanti, who began the Greek revolution, by a movement in Moldavia and Wallachia, in 1820. Nicholas served under his brother, and commanded the celebrated corps called the "Sacred Regiment," which contained in its ranks a number of Greek youths belonging to the first families, many of whom had studied in foreign universities.
May 15. At Rothsay, Mrs Mary Anne Colquhoun, widow of the late Right Hon. Archibald Colquhoun of Killermont, Lord Clerk Register.
16. At Rothsay, the Rev. John Belfrage, M.D. minister of the United Associated congregation, Slateford.
21. At Edinburgh, Miss Jane Suttie, daughter of the late Sir George Suttie, Bart. of Balgonie.
23. Duke Charles, son of the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Schwerin, of an apoplectic fit. He was the third son of the grand duke, and in his 51st year.
24. At Philadelphia, Mr John Randolph, a distinguished American orator and statesman, at 61 years of age, 40 years of which had been passed in active public life.
25. At 24, Sussex Place, Regent's Park, London, Anne Scott, second daughter of the late Sir Walter Scott of Abbotsford, Bart. Miss Scott was carried off by brain fever, after an illness of only ten days; but she had never, it is understood, entirely rallied after her father's death.
30. In Prince's Street, Hanover Square, London, Major-General Sir John Malcolm, G.C.B. K.L.S. It is in contemplation to place a statue of Sir John in St Paul's Cathedral. His merits as a general, a governor, historian, &c. (and, we take leave to add, as a poet), together with the generous qualities of his nature, are well known, and entitle his statue to stand as companion to that of Sir William Jones.—Athenaeum.
June 1. At 9, Sandwick Place, Edinburgh, Mrs Cecilia Murray, wife of John Russell, Esq. clerk to the signet.
4. At his house in Dover Street, London, Peter Lord King. His lordship was baron of Ockham, and succeeded to the title on the death of his father in 1793; and married, in 1804, Hester, daughter of Hugh Earl Fortescue, by Hester, sister to George Marquis of Buckingham. His lordship was in the 58th year of his age, and is succeeded in his title and estates by his eldest son Peter (now Lord King), who attained his majority in January last. His lordship has also left several daughters. The founder of the family, Peter, the first lord, was son of Jerome King, a gentleman of good family in the county of Somerset, by a sister of the great John Locke.
8. At Richmond, aged 15, the Hon. George Murray, brother of the present Lord Elibank.
14. At 21, Conduit Street, London, Maria Lady Anstruther, widow of the Right Hon. Sir John Anstruther, Chief Justice of Bengal.
15. Suddenly, at London, of apoplexy, in his 43d year, the Hon. Captain Thomas Roper Curzon, R.N., second son of the Right Hon. Lord Teynham.
17. The Hon. Lady Halford, wife of Sir Henry Halford, Bart. Death of the King of the Gipsies.—We have to record the death, at an advanced age, a few days since, of Lawrence Boswell, said to be king of the gipsies. He had been declining in health a considerable time, and during the last two or three months was, with part of his family, lying encamped in Draycot Lane, between this town and Nottingham. As a proof that he was of some consequence among the fraternity, many tribes of gipsies from distant quarters assembled to bid him a last farewell. A coffin of the best Norway oak was made to receive his remains, which are expected to be interred in the parish church of Wilne.—Derby Reporter.

CHURCH PREFERMENTS.

- May 21. Mr Charles Milne, of Montrose, to the United Secession church at Edinhead, Fifehire.
23. Mr James Robertson ordained to the pastoral charge of the United Associate congregation of Portsburgh.
30. The Rev. Mr Smith, one of the ministers of Kilmarnock, inducted to the pastoral charge of the parish of Penpont.—Mr James MacGill called to the United Associate congregation of Cupar.—The Rev. Robert Hill inducted into the pastoral charge of the Scotch church, South Shields.
June 6. The Rev. John Sym ordained to the church and parish of Sprouton.—Mr Alexander Laird from Portmonk, called to the church and parish of Coleslie.
10. Rev. Mr Jackson chosen assistant to the Rev. Joseph Finlayson, of the chapel of ease, Airdrie.
11. Rev. Alexander Turner ordained minister of the chapel of ease at Gartmore, Presbytery of Dunblane.
12. Mr Adam Thomson ordained colleague and successor to the Rev. James Henderson, in the Second United Associate congregation, Hawick.
19. The Rev. Mr Wilson, late of Kendal, inducted to the charge of the United Associate congregation at Greenock.

SCOTTISH BANKRUPTS.

- May 25. Alexander Thomson, gunmaker, Edinburgh.—29. Robert Law, vintner, potato-dealer, and road-contractor, residing in Newton of Mearns.—30. John Hannay, writer to the signet, and manufacturer of glass, Edinburgh.—Andrew Webster, merchant, Leven.—June 4. David Smith, merchant and acid-maker, Glasgow.—6. James Reid, baker, grain and spirit-dealer, Rutherglen, near Glasgow.—7. Robert Wingate, merchant, Glasgow.—8. The Verreville Pottery Company, Glasgow.—11. Hamilton Watson, earthenware manufacturer, Prestonsvans.—22. James Haig, brewer, Barrowfield, Glasgow.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The first thirty-six numbers of CHAMBERS'S EDINBURGH JOURNAL, originally published in a folio shape, are now reprinted in the present small size, by which means sets of the work from the commencement may now be had, in every respect fitted for binding. A title-page and index are likewise prepared for the volume, and may be purchased at the price of a number. Those who have not preserved their numbers as published, may have the first volume, done up in boards, from the publishers or agents.

Besides the Journal and the present monthly Newspaper, Mr Chambers publish a sheet once every fortnight, similar in appearance and price to these works, under the title of "CHAMBER'S INFORMATION FOR THE PEOPLE," of which the following ten numbers have already appeared:—

1. EMIGRATION TO CANADA, being a complete body of information on that country for the use of Emigrants, precluding, in a great measure, the necessity of consulting other works.
2. HISTORY OF THE ISLAND OF GREAT BRITAIN, down to the commencement of the Civil War—to be continued. The object of this sheet is to afford such a view of British History as may be suitable to the tastes and opportunities of the people at large.
3. HISTORY OF MANKIND—a view of the progress of Human Race, and of the peculiarities of the various divisions of Mankind.
4. EMIGRATION TO NOVA SCOTIA, NEW BRUNSWICK, CAPE BRETON, &c.
5. EMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES.
6. ACCOUNT OF THE GLOBE—a complete view of the internal and external structure of the Globe, comprising the discoveries of modern geologists.
7. THE COTTON, WOOLLEN, SILK, AND LINEN MANUFACTURES—a condensed account of the progress and present state of those essential branches of our national industry.
8. AN ACCOUNT OF THE HUMAN BODY, being a popular sketch of the Physiological Structure of Man.
9. STORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.
10. EMIGRATION TO NEW SOUTH WALES.

Articles are also in preparation on a variety of subjects generally interesting to the people, and will in due course appear. Each article is a careful original composition, generally the product of the Editors themselves, or of some other literary gentleman established character in the departments respectively assigned them. In Edinburgh, as in the case of the Journal, it is regulated every alternate Wednesday at the house of subscribers, and may be had of every bookseller and newsman throughout United Kingdom.

Nearly ready for publication, in one volume, foolscap 8vo, illustrated with Woodcuts, and a reprint of Edgar's Map of the taken in 1742,

REEKIANA,

A GUIDE TO THE MINOR ANTIQUITIES OF EDINBURGH. By the Author of the "Traditions of Edinburgh," to which the present is intended as a Supplement.

Messrs CHAMBERS act as Publishing Agents (in Scotland) of the following Works:—

THE BRITISH LIBRARY.—This publication is intended to comprise the works of all the classic authors of Great Britain, and appears in a series of handsome monthly volumes, corrected, elegantly printed, at a price hitherto unprecedented. Each volume will be carefully edited; notes, when necessary, are given; a life of the author, either selected or written expressly for the purpose, is prefixed.

The British Library rests its claims to public patronage chiefly on its correctness and unequalled cheapness; but in beauty of typography and elegance of outward appearance, it will yield to no other publication of the day; and although the proprietors do hold out the inducement of illustrations, these, of first-rate quality, will not be spared in works such as White's Selborne, Waller's Angler, &c., where they will be useful as well as ornamental.

The first volume of the British Library contains White's Natural History of Selborne, with Observations on Nature, and the Naturalist's Calendar. The second forms the first volume of Smith's Miscellaneous Works. To be completed in four volumes. Price of each volume, only 3s.; or in morocco cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

THE BRITISH CYCLOPEDIA of Arts, Sciences, Manufactures, Commerce, Literature, History, Geography, Politics, Biography, Natural History, &c. Conducted by Charles F. Partridge. Published in weekly numbers, in a large octavo size, price 2d. each, or in monthly parts. The British Cyclopaedia is a work calculated in a great measure, to supersede the necessity of purchasing expensive Encyclopaedias, and will prove, when completed, a useful digest, not only for occasional reference, but regular constructive and entertaining reading. Already, the weekly circulation amounts to 18,000 copies.

THE FIELD NATURALIST'S MAGAZINE AND REVIEW of Mammals, Plants, Minerals, the Structure of the Earth, and Appearances of the Sky. By James Rennie, M.A. Professor of Zoology. Published monthly, price 1s.

All the preceding publications are sold by every Bookseller in United Kingdom.

PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT.*

Two writers, of very different powers,† concur in tracing the origin of civil government to paternal authority. Had mankind sprung out of the earth mature and independent, they would, perhaps, with greater difficulty have been brought into a state of subordination; but the dependence of infancy presses man for the restraint of society, by combining individuals into primary communities, and by placing them, from the beginning, under direction and control. A family is the model of a political association; its chief is represented by the father, and the people by his children. A federative union of families, having a common head, constitutes a state or empire; and the disposition to govern and be governed, in domestic life, are the rudiments of social order coeval with the nature and first existence of the human species.

The most simple, and, perhaps, original form of political administration, is that in which each adult head of a family, without representation or other contrivance, directly participates, and in which the sovereign power, or power to make laws, is vested in the will of the majority. A democracy of this kind practicable in a small community, but is attended with inconveniences in a large one. First, it is ill adapted to the purposes of deliberation; secondly, the division of power among so many persons renders it slow and inefficient in its operations; thirdly, it causes a loss of time, as on every public occasion each individual has to leave his occupation to discuss the affairs of the community. These disadvantages would doubtless speedily originate improvements for abridging the trouble of government. A form of rule in which every one takes a direct part is as ill adapted to political society, as the labour of individuals to the production of commodities, unaided by machinery or division of employments.

As knowledge is power, and as knowledge in the early ages is derived from personal experience, it is only public authority would devolve into the hands of the elders, who would form a council, or senate, for the regulation of the community.

This second form of government might not be of long duration. Disputes might arise among the people as to the choice of elders; or, secondly, the elders themselves, from mutual jealousy or conflicting interests, might disagree, and, in either case, the necessity arise for a new disposition of political power. To obviate the first cause of dissension, the elders might come hereditarily in their functions, or be privileged to step up, by election, vacancies in their own body: this would be an aristocracy. The second cause of dissension might be obviated by vesting all power in a single person, and thus establish an absolute monarchy, or despotism.

These several forms of power have each their advantages and disadvantages.

The separate advantages of MONARCHY, are unity of council, secrecy, dispatch; a vigilant and energetic system of police; exclusion of popular and aristocratic pretensions; preventing (if hereditary), by a known mode of succession, all competition for the supreme power, and thereby depressing the hopes, intrigues, and ambition of aspiring citizens. Its disadvantages are tyranny, expense, military domination; unnecessary wars, waged to gratify the passions of an individual; ignorance of ministers and governors, selected from personal favour, of the interests of the people, and consequent deficiency of salutary regulations; want of constancy and uniformity in public councils, measures, and laws, fluctuating as these do with the character of the reigning prince, and thence insecurity of persons, property, and industry.

The chief, and indeed almost only advantage of an ARISTOCRACY, consists in its forming a permanent legislature, which grows up, as it were, for its office, without the trouble and interference of the people, and the members of which may be supposed to be trained and educated for the stations they are destined by birth, tenure of land, or other condition, to occupy. Its disadvantages are divisions among themselves, which, from want of a common superior, may (as formerly in the Polish diet) proceed to desperate extremities; partial laws, made for the exclusive benefit and conservation of their own power and privileges; impolitic measures, resulting from prejudice, ignorance, or disregard of the public weal; impoverishment and degradation of all the non-aristocratic classes, by disqualifying enactments, and partial fiscal regulations.

The advantages of a REPUBLIC, or democracy, where the people collectively, or by representation, constitute the legislature, are equal laws; exemption from needless restrictions; regulations adapted to the wants of the people; public spirit, economy, averseness to war; opportunities, by popular appeal, to enforce the adoption of measures most conducive to the general interests; facilities to each citizen for displaying his abilities, and to the commonwealth for obtaining the advice and services of its best-qualified members. Its disadvantages for the purpose of legislation have been already indicated; its other evils are dissension, tumults, faction; loss of time and interruptions to industry consequent on popular elections; oppression of distant colonies not represented; delay in public measures from difficulty of obtaining concurrence of numerous bodies; lastly, danger of ascendancy of unprincipled writers and agitators, by the practice of artifices adapted to the prejudices, folly, and ignorance of the multitude.

A MIXED government may be established, composed of two or more of the simple forms above described, and in whatever proportion these several elements enter into the constitution, in the same degree will the evils or advantages of that system of rule predominate. Thus, if monarchy is the prevailing power, then secrecy, dispatch, internal peace, will be the excellences, and profusion, caprice, military parade, and incapacity, the defects of government. A similar equation of good and bad will result from the preponderance of aristocracy or democracy in the constitution. The general rule for the construction and improvement of governments, therefore, is to proportion the ingredients to the wants of society; strengthening or weakening the regal, aristocratic, and popular branches, according as the qualities of each may become essential to the general welfare. It is important, however, to observe, that a quality sometimes results from the union of two forms of government which belong to neither in its separate state of existence. Thus corruption, which has no place in absolute monarchy, and little in pure democracy, is sure to gain admission into a constitution which divides authority between an executive and legislative; unless either one or both are under the control of a popular and incorruptible constituency.

The best form of government for a country to adopt is not a speculative question: it can only be determined by reference to the character and circumstances of the people for whom it is intended. Russia and the United States of America offer the striking illustrations of the truth of this proposition. We have here instances of the working of the two extreme forms of government—one a despotism, the other a democracy—and each form of rule has operated, perhaps, more favourably than any other system that could have been adopted for the benefit of its respective community. Had the institutions of Russia been more free, they would have been less favourable to her prosperity and happiness. Civilization was received from without through the instrumentality of her sovereigns, who, for their own power and glory, were anxious to raise her nearer to a level with the European states by which she is surrounded. But had the barbarism and ignorance of the empire been represented in the government, as they would have been by more popular establishments, the prejudices of the people would have been a stumbling-block to national improvement. As it was, the prince was every thing, and the people nothing: if he were enlightened and benevolent, his impress was stamped on his courtiers and the aristocracy, and through them on their followers and dependents. In America, the case is reversed, and the intelligence and independent circumstances of the people have enabled them to exercise a salutary control over the government. Had the chief magistrate of the United States been an absolute and hereditary chief, he must have been corrupted by the possession of uncontrolled and irresponsible authority; his government would have been marked by the vices inseparable from absolute monarchy—war, costliness, and neglect of the general welfare. But the people, by the retention of political power in their own hands—by holding the reins, as it were, have kept their presidents steadily in the highway of public happiness—have protected themselves from the caprice of individual character—and afforded to the world a splendid example of a constitution administered not for the benefit of one person, or a class of persons, but for the general benefit of the governed.

In all countries popular liberty must necessarily extend with popular intelligence. It is as much in the nature of political power to devolve into the hands of those who have the most right and capacity to exercise it, as it is in bodies to descend to the earth by the force of gravity, or water to spread itself over a plain. In England, power was formerly wielded by the king, nobility, and clergy, and for this simple reason, that in them was concentrated the entire property and intelligence of the community; and it was doubtless most advantageous, in the existing state of society, that in these classes should be vested the exclusive government of the country. The rise of new interests into importance—the acquisition of wealth and knowledge by the productive orders, rendered necessary a new disposition of political power; and it is well known that during the last two centuries the circle of aristocratic domination has been undergoing gradual contraction by the external pressure of the popular party. Similar causes are producing similar effects on the Continent, where the ill-suppressed struggles for constitutional governments arise solely from the development of new social interests; these interests must ultimately triumph, because claims, just and expedient, must gather strength by conflict and discussion, while those by which they are opposed, having no such basis, must become weaker; and the final issue will probably [we would say, certainly] be the general substitution in Europe, of representative in place of hereditary authority.

The limit which utility prescribes to the diffusion of political power among a people, is competency to exercise it. The legitimate purpose of government is the promotion of the general interest, but the general interest will not be promoted unless it be incorporated in the general government. Whatever interest is excluded will be neglected or sacrificed. These are truisms which require no metaphysical analysis to establish; they result from the most obvious principles of human nature—namely, the proneness of men to advance their own interests in preference to those of strangers, and this they will do as much from the bias of the understanding as the impulse of selfishness: for it is the tendency of our minds, in spite of, and even unknown to ourselves, constantly to see right and justice in the same direction that we see profit. Such being the frailty of humanity, and the misleading tendency of power, the conclusion is irresistible that any interest or class of persons excluded from a share in the government must be sacrificed or neglected in its administration. The only valid plea, therefore, for the political disfranchisement of individuals, is a manifest incompetency in them to exercise power for their own advantage. That cases of this kind may be established, is unquestionable. Power in the hands of a person debased by ignorance and superstition, might be as mischievous to himself and others as power in the hands of a child or insane person. The boors and nobles of Russia were the chief obstacles to the plans of improvement of Peter the Great. In Spain and Portugal, projects for the establishment of constitutional government have been supported by the middle classes, but frustrated by the fanaticism of the peasantry. Not only is a certain degree of intelligence necessary to the reception and exercise of political power, but personal independence. By giving power to a slave, we only confer a boon on his master.

* We are indebted for this clear and judicious view of different forms of government to a work which we are exceedingly anxious to bring under the respectful notice of our readers—Dr Wale's "History of the Middle and Working Classes," just published, Longman & Wilson, Royal Exchange, London.

In England, during the last fifty years, the extent to which the elective suffrage ought to be carried, so as to secure the advantages of good government, has formed a constant subject of political disquisition. The object of representation is, that it should be a transcript of the intelligence, probity, wealth, and industry of the community. For this purpose, some external sign or elective qualification must be adopted in the constituent body. In England the interests of agriculture are represented by a constituency of freeholders, copyholders, and leaseholders; those of commerce, manufactures, and industry, by a constituency renting houses of ten pounds yearly value. These qualifications may not be the best indications of elective fitness, but they at least show that the elector is of some standing in society, that he is not a pauper nor a vagrant. They are not meant to denote, as I conceive, merely a proprietary interest in the state, but also, by a visible symbol, the personal circumstances of the elector as to age, discretion, and settlement in life. Neither are they meant to imply that the non-electors have no interest in the state; because every one has an interest in the making of laws he is bound to obey: but they are adopted for the purpose of reducing the constituency to such a number as may not be greater than needs for the general protection of all. That they are not exclusively property-qualifications may be instanced in this: there are thousands of persons disfranchised though in possession of millions of income—income derived from the funds, from colonial property, from copyrights of books, from professions and trades; being affluent, it might have been thought government would have been desirous to attach these classes to its interests by granting them the suffrage: yet many of them, not being occupiers of houses, from dislike to the trouble of housekeeping or other motive, are without political power in the state; have no share in making militia laws, or laws of any other description, though bound to obey them. If the elective qualification be unjust, it is impartially so; it does not strike one class and leave another unscathed; it does not exclude all the poor and incorporate all the rich; and no interest is left wholly without legislative protection.

There is only one point more, connected with representation, I shall notice: it is the duration of the representative body. As at an early period of our history the simple business of Parliament was quickly dispatched, prorogation was unfrequent, and Parliament was mostly elected as often as it assembled. Later, the term of duration was irregular. Charles the Second protracted his second Parliament to seventeen years—a term long enough to obliterate all connection with the electoral body. In the 461 years preceding the reign of George the Third, there were 202 Parliaments, whose average duration was two years and a half. In the sixty-nine years of the reigns of George the Third and Fourth, there were only thirteen Parliaments, averaging five years and one-third each. A three years' term, as fixed at the Revolution, appears a just medium. A lease of seven years, as Junius expresses it, gives a corrupt member six years to commit sins, and one year to atone for them. Effective legislation lies between the extremes of annual and septennial Parliaments. The short Parliament has the inconvenience of frequent elections, and does not afford time to perfect sound measures of national improvement, or even to acquire the information which the responsibility of legislation needs; while the long Parliament deprives the elector of the means of repairing the error of his choice within any reasonable period of recovery, and gives to the representative the means of trading at will upon a trust, which should always be considered as held under constantly renewable liabilities to his constituents. The more the principles of representative government are considered, the stronger will be the conviction, that the elected legislature is as much entitled to have a sufficient period of trial, as the people are to possess a reasonable power of redemption and renewal in their own right.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS.

(From 24th June to 22d July, inclusive.)

1. EDINBURGH COMMUNITY ESTATES BILL.—In the House of Commons on Monday (June 24), this bill was, upon the motion of Mr Abercromby, read a second time; it being at the same time agreed that the committee should not proceed with the consideration of it until the inhabitants of Edinburgh had full time to consider its provisions, and memorialise the legislature.

2. LOCAL COURTS' BILL.—In the House of Lords, on the same day, upon the motion that the house go into committee on this bill, the Earl of Eldon, after urging various objections to the measure, moved that it be committed that day six months.—The Lord Chancellor defended the bill at considerable length, and, upon a division, there appeared.—For the amendment, 38; against it, 52. Ministerial majority, 14.—The house then went into committee, and the first 24 clauses were agreed to.—The discussion was renewed on Friday (June 28), when the rest of the clauses were, after various amendments, agreed to.—During the evening, the Lord Chancellor incidentally expressed it to be his opinion, that imprisonment for debt should be entirely abolished, except in three cases of debtor and creditor—first, in order to enforce the delivery of property in payment of debt when such property existed; secondly, to enforce the due attention to process; and thirdly, to punish persons for fraudulently cheating their creditors out of their property.—On Tuesday (July 9), the Lord Chancellor moved the third reading of the bill, when a long and warm debate ensued, upon Lord Wharnccliffe moving as an amendment, that it be read again that day six months.—The Earl of Wicklow, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Wynford, and others, supported the amendment, and were replied to at great length by Lord Plunkett and the Lord Chancellor. The latter characterised the measure as the poor man's bill, which enabled him to obtain justice at a cheap rate—to obtain it in the next street, instead of having to travel 100 miles for it; which would enable him, without anxiety—without taking him from his daily labour, which was his daily bread—without carrying away his substance from his family—without any diversion from his labour, would enable him to meet his judge, to go into court, and to obtain redress if he had suffered injustice. There had been whispers as to what would be the fate of this bill. He would not believe them; he would not believe, till they convinced him by their votes, that they would refuse to pass this bill.—The house then divided, when the amendment of Lord Wharnccliffe was carried by a majority of five; the numbers being—For the motion, 68; for the amendment, 73.—The bill was therefore thrown out.

3. NEGRO EMANCIPATION.—On Tuesday (June 25), the Earl of Ripon (late Lord Goderich) introduced into the House of Lords the resolutions passed by the House of Commons, decreeing the extinction of slavery in the West India colonies. His lordship was so extremely unwell that he with difficulty proceeded with his speech. He went over the several topics touched on by Mr Stanley in the House of Commons, and urged his various reasons for supporting the measure, which he concluded by saying would be one of the greatest triumphs of justice and humanity ever achieved within the walls of Parliament. He said he was perfectly at a loss to account, even to himself, for the imperfect manner in which he had addressed the house.—The Duke of Wellington objected to the manner in which Ministers were proceeding with this subject. They had not duly considered the plan. There was no fixed principle in it. If Parliament were to force the plan on the colonies, by at once making it a law, or if they were to adopt any other mode of proceeding but one of conciliation and persuasion, it was manifest that they would degrade the colonial legislatures in the eyes of those whom they were called upon to govern. The best course would be to send these resolutions to the colonies, but in the shape of resolutions only; to urge the colonies to carry them into effect; to use every means of persuasion and conciliation, but not to make the resolutions a matter of law or force, except as a last resource. Indeed, what he would most earnestly recommend to his Majesty's government would be, to send out a commissioner to the colonies, armed with full authority to settle the whole question. Let them give that commissioner instructions, if they pleased, but let him also have leave to depart from those instructions if in any particular instance he should find such a departure advisable or necessary. He declared the present plan had his best wishes for its success, but he entertained the most serious doubts on the subject.—Lord Suffield supported the measure. He asserted that the negroes were universally willing to maintain themselves by free labour.—The Earl of Harewood defied the noble lord to put out one single proof of that fact.—Earl Grey begged to say that his Majesty's Ministers had endeavoured, as well as they were able, to provide for the necessity which they could not avoid; and in proposing the plan of emancipation, their object had been to make it equitable and just to those whose property would be affected by it, and to carry it into execution in such a manner as in the words of the resolution, "might combine the welfare of the negroes with the interests of the proprietors." The noble earl then reviewed, seriatim the various heads of the bill, and concluded by observing, that it was the only one which Ministers thought they could adopt under all the difficulties of the case.—Lord Ellenborough would go along with the noble duke (Wellington) in giving his assent to the resolutions, but he wished the noble earl had gone a little more largely into the question of compensation; that he desired to know how it was intended to pay interest and principal of the money. In the present measure he saw certain loss, little hope of future tranquillity, and still less of benefit to our manufactures, our commerce, and our navigation.—The Lord Chancellor defended the measure at much length after which the resolutions were agreed to seriatim and unanimously.—On the following Friday (June 28), a conference of certain delegated members of both houses was held, when the acquiescence of their lordships to the resolutions of the House of Commons was communicated to the latter.—Mr Stanley has since introduced his bill, founded on the above resolution which was read a first time without opposition.

4. IRISH CHURCH REFORM BILL.—On Monday (June 24), the house again sat in committee on this measure, when various clauses, the consideration of which had been postponed, were, after great deal of desultory discussion, but without any essential alterations, agreed to; as were also the remaining clauses.—Next day (Tuesday 25), the schedules were discussed.—Sir R. Peel moved an amendment, exempting all livings under £300 a-year from the proposed tax, in lieu of first-fruits.—Mr Stanley said he should not oppose the amendment; the committee approved of it; and, after a few observations from Mr O'Connell and Mr Hume, in favour of Sir R. Peel's proposition, it was agreed to.—The other schedules were then agreed to, and the house resumed.—On Monday (July 6), the bill, on the motion of Lord Althorp, was read a third time.—Upon the question being put that it "do pass," Mr Leigh and Mr T. Gladstone opposed the motion, as did also Colonel Evans, Mr Hume, Mr O'Connell, and Mr W. Harvey.—The house then divided.—For the bill, 274; against it, 94. Ministerial majority, 180.—The bill passed.—On Tuesday, it was taken up to the House of Peers, by a deputation from the Commons, when it was read a first time.—The Duke of Buckingham asked Earl Grey whether this measure had been introduced upon the authority of his Majesty, who was the head of the church; to which Earl Grey replied, he did not think himself called upon to give any explanation on the subject.—In the course of the same evening, the Archbishop of Dublin presented a petition from certain clergymen in his diocese, praying for some alterations in the bill. The right reverend prelate took the opportunity of making some remarks in reference to the assertion, that the King would be restrained by his coronation oath from assenting to the bill, and entered into a long disquisition on the nature of that oath, to prove the idea fallacious.—The Earl of Eldon thought, if the right reverend prelate was correct in his doctrine, there never was an oath which any man took that he might not escape from.—Earl Grey felt he was supported by the very authorities that existed, when he asserted that the coronation oath applied to the executive, and not to the legislative capacity of the King.—The Bishop of Exeter entirely dissented from Earl Grey, as did also the Duke of Cumberland.—On Thursday (July 11), the subject of the coronation oath was again brought under discussion upon the presenting of various petitions against the bill.—The Archbishop of Canterbury reckoned the King's sanction of it would be a violation of the coronation oath; and the Duke of Wellington, Duke of Buckingham, Lord Kenyon, and others, followed on the same side.—Earl Grey said, if such were the case, the noble duke's (Wellington) advising the King to sanction the measure of Catholic emancipation was a much grosser violation of the constitution.—On Wednesday (July 17), Earl Grey moved the second reading of the bill, and contended, in a speech of great length, for the policy and justice of the measure.—Earl Roden moved as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six months.—He was convinced that a conspiracy was going on to the subversion of the Protestant religion. He charged Earl Grey with acting in conformity with the demands of Dr M'Hale, Catholic archbishop of Maronia, who, in a published letter had required the suppression of the Kildare Street Society, and the extinction of its both of which had been done. He had also said, "from a reformed Parliament we must demand the extinction of the established church;" and this he now proposed to be read a second time, was in accordance with the demands of this right reverend Catholic archbishop.—The Earl of Wicklow supported the bill.—The Bishop of Durham disapproved of the bill, especially that part of it which related to the extinction of the bishoprics, and expressed his intention of voting against it.—The Earl of Limerick briefly opposed, and the Marquis of Conyngham reported, the measure.—The Earl of Winchelsea vehemently denounced the bill as a measure of the greatest spoliation. The King could not consent to it without an open violation of his coronation oath.

House of Lords, he deeply regretted it, had lost its independence; but it still possessed the brightest gem—its moral character; and if their lordships meant to discharge their duty that night—if they wished to retain any of the public respect, and not sink themselves to the lowest pitch of degradation, they would reject the bill before them.—The Marquis of Clanricarde and the Earl of Gosford spoke in defence of the measure, and the Marquis of Londonderry against it.—The Marquis of Westmeath and the Bishop of Rochester also opposed the measure.—The debate being adjourned, it was renewed the next day (Thursday, July 18), by Lord Carberry, who spoke to considerable length against the bill. The whole affair, he said, was an atrocious conspiracy against the church establishment; but he would nevertheless vote for the second reading, from motives of policy.—The Bishop of Exeter spoke at great length against the measure, and went into a minute analysis of all its parts, which occupied about four hours in the delivery. He contended that Earl Grey had completely failed in making good his assertions relative to the coronation oath, and asserted there was no distinction recognised by the constitution between the executive and legislative functions of the King.—Lord Plunkett replied to the reverend prelate, and argued that Parliament could absolve his Majesty from observing the contract into which he entered when he took the coronation oath, as was, in fact, done at the time of the reformation.—The Earl of Mansfield opposed, and the Marquis of Lansdowne supported, the measure.—Another adjournment took place; and, previous to the debate next day (Friday, July 19) being renewed, the Earl of Winchelsea demanded to know whether any communication had been received by the bishops from the King relating to the Irish church bill. If such a letter had been sent, whoever advised it had been guilty of a dereliction of constitutional duty, so gross as to render it impossible for him to use language sufficiently strong in reprobation of his conduct.—The Bishop of London denied the right of the noble earl to ask such a question; but he would state on the present occasion, that he did not believe his Majesty had made any communication which could in the slightest degree infringe upon the privileges of that house.—The Earl of Eldon contended that the King could violate his coronation oath by sanctioning this measure. Had he now been Chancellor, so help him God he would have resigned his seals if the sovereign had not adopted his advice to reject such a measure as the present. He was aware there was a conspiracy going on against the House of Lords, but he advised them fearlessly to do their duty.—The Bishop of London objected to many parts of the measure, and he made in which it originated; but the dangers of rejecting, were far greater than the dangers of adopting, the whole measure.—The Archbishop of Dublin concurred in the sentiments of the Bishop of London.—The Archbishop of Canterbury must oppose the bill, however painful it might be to him to oppose any measure of the present government.—The Duke of Wellington asserted this bill to be entirely the result of that system of agitation which had been so long permitted, if not directly sanctioned, by Ministers in Ireland. He argued, that, in consequence of the abolition of tithes and church cess, and the measure proposed for the sale of perpetuities, the whole of the actual income of the church would not exceed £50,000 per annum. He had made this statement, which was not exaggerated, in order that his reasons might be understood for not opposing the committal of the bill. The church of Ireland could not exist for a day unless some measure of this description were passed. The Duke of Buckingham might stand upon principle, and say that upon principle he would not allow the revenues of the church to be touched; but the consequence would be that the church of Ireland must go.—Lord Melbourne defended the conduct of Ministers, and the provisions of the bill under discussion.—The Earl of Longford, Duke of Newcastle, Duke of Cumberland, and Lord Wynford, opposed the bill; which was supported by the Bishops of Bath and Wells, and Hereford, Earl De Grey, Lord Grantham, Lord Brougham, and the Duke of Sussex.—Earl Grey defended at great length the conduct of government from the charge of its having a revolutionary tendency. To comply with the reasonable demands of the people for reasonable reforms, was not surely the likely way to produce convulsion in the country. He would say, however, that the endeavour by their lordships to control public opinion was the likely way to produce it; and instead of setting their face against all reforms, their lordships would more surely prevent confusion in the country by advocating and supporting them.—The house then divided: Content—present, 104; proxies, 53—157. Non-contents—present, 68; proxies, 30—98. Majority for the second reading, 59.—The bill was then read a second time; to be committed on Monday, the 22d July.

5. SCOTCH BURGH REFORM BILL.—On Wednesday (June 26), the House of Commons sat in committee on this bill.—Mr Wallace moved that the provosts, bailies, treasurers, and town-clerks of the burghs, should be elected by open poll, as well as the town council. The honourable member stated, that the bill was, on the whole, a most useful and excellent measure. It put an end to the self-election and close system which had caused so much discontent in Scotland; at the same time, that discontent would, he was afraid, continue to a considerable extent.—Mr Gillon supported the amendment.—The Lord Advocate stated, that this proposal had been discussed by the select committee up stairs, who had declared against it. It was felt that it would be very injudicious to consign into the hands of the people the power of electing those whose office it was to keep wrong-doers in order. It would be hazardous in the extreme to run the risk of men being placed in the magistracy, by inflaming the popular passions. On this ground, he should resist the amendment.—Mr Hume thought that it was formerly an argument of the learned lord, that the best way to strengthen the power of the magistrates was to gain for them the support of the people, and he asked if any better were known for accomplishing that than the method of allowing the people to choose those who were to govern them?—Upon a division the amendment was rejected by a majority of 19; the numbers being—For, 27; against, 46.—Sir John Hay then moved an amendment, which had for its object the reduction of the franchise from L.10 to L.5 householders (as was understood) in burghs whose population was less than 20,000. He contended that in small burghs, unless this plan were adopted, there would be no constituency; or at least a constituency so small as to be open to serious objections.—Mr Maxwell seconded the amendment.—The Lord Advocate said, the consequence of agreeing to this amendment would be, that the L.5 householders would claim the same privilege in voting for members of Parliament, and their demand would be irresistible.—Mr Oswald and Mr A. Johnstone supported the motion.—Sir A. Hope could not agree to it.—Mr Abercromby considered L.10 to be a sufficiently low qualification, and should support the bill.—Mr Wallace said, he thought the L.5 qualification was sufficiently high for the smaller burghs. It was as high, all things considered, in these burghs as L.15 or L.20 would be in Glasgow or Edinburgh.—Mr J. A. Murray should vote against the amendment.—Lord Ernest Bruce would support the measure of the learned lord.—Mr Hume should vote for the L.5 qualification, because he thought that the broader the basis of election was, the more stable the system would be.—Mr Kennedy considered the L.10 franchise sufficiently low in all cases.—The gallery was then cleared for a division.—For the amendment, 53; against it, 54. Majority, 1.—Mr Gillon then moved “that all burgesses, admitted for the period of not less than twelve months, should have a right to vote in elections to municipal offices.”—Mr Hume seconded the motion.—The Lord Advocate opposed it, on the ground of the facility with which burgesses could be created for party or factious purposes, being nothing more than by the payment of a small fee.—Mr Gillon modified his motion so as to include only the burgesses now existing; but it was lost upon a division, by a majority of 44; the numbers being—For, 58; against, 102.—A second motion, of almost exactly the same tendency, by Mr Cumming Bruce, was next rejected by a majority of 114.—Clauses A and B were then agreed to.—Upon clause C being read, General Sharpe moved as an amendment, that all voters—L.10 voters as well as burgesses—be eligible to be magistrates.—The Lord Advocate opposed it.—The committee then divided.—For the amendment, 60; against it, 75. Majority, 15.—The other clauses and the preamble having been agreed to, the house resumed.—On Monday (July 8), this bill was, on the motion of the Lord Advocate, read a third time and passed, by a majority of 100 to 36.—On the same day, also, the Scotch burghs police bill, and Scotch burgh magistrates' bill, were read a third time and passed.

6. JEWISH DISABILITIES BILL.—On Wednesday (June 26), all the clauses of this bill were agreed to, after considerable opposition and discussion.—On Monday (July 22), this bill was read a third time, and passed.

7. POLITICAL UNIONS.—On Thursday (June 27), Mr Finch brought forward a motion for the suppression of political unions. The hon. member eulogised the Conservative societies, as being the only safe political bodies in the kingdom. The whole interpretation he could put on the proceedings of the unions was, that they would form a ministry out of their own body; and it was of course easy to say who would be Prime Minister. (Name, name!) He would name; he would say Mr T. Attwood would be the First Lord of the Treasury; Mr O'Connell, the Lord High Chancellor; Mr Parkes and Mr Edwards, of Birmingham, the Attorney and Solicitor-General; Mr Larkins, Secretary for the Home Department; and Mr T. Steele, Chief Secretary for Ireland. (These nominations were received with roars of laughter, and many members took off their hats and bowed to Mr T. Attwood, as if congratulating him on being named First Lord of the Treasury.) He desired, however, to see no political union except that of the Parliament. The hon. member concluded with moving certain resolutions, declaring the unions unconstitutional and illegal, and that they ought to be put down.—Lord Althorp denied that political unions were illegal, and would give the motion a decided negative.—Upon a division, there were—For, 8; against, 76.

8. THE BANK CHARTER.—On Friday (June 28), upon Lord Althorp's moving that the house resolve itself into a committee on this bill, Colonel Torrens, after complaining of the want of time and information for the elucidation of so important a question, moved that the consideration of it be postponed to another session.—Mr P. Scrope seconded the motion.—Lord Althorp said, the gentlemen opposed to the measure ought to have brought forward a specific motion on its introduction to the house. A delay of the subject now would prove far more dangerous and fatal than any evils which could flow from the adoption of the measure.—Mr M. Attecood, Sir Henry Parnell, Mr Hume, and others, supported the amendment, which was opposed by Sir Robert Peel and Mr Baring.—Upon a division there appeared—For the amendment, 83; against it, 316. Ministerial majority, 233.—The first resolution was then agreed to, and the house adjourned to Monday (July 1), when, after considerable opposition, the second and third resolutions were carried.—At the commencement of the adjourned debate on Wednesday (July 3), Lord Althorp, in answer to a question from Mr Herries, stated that, from the great opposition he had encountered from the country bankers, all that part of the measure which related to them would be postponed, excepting what required them to compound for the stamp duties, in order to ascertain the amount of their circulation.—The other resolutions were thereafter agreed to, and a bill ordered to be brought in founded on them.

9. EAST INDIA COMPANY.—In the House of Lords, on Friday (July 5), the resolutions for the renewal of the East India Company's charter, which had previously received the sanction of the House of Commons, were brought before the house by the Marquis of Lansdowne, in a speech of great length. His lordship went into numerous details in explanation of the government plan, which were for the most part repetitions of the statements of Mr Grant in the House of Commons.—The resolutions were agreed to without a division.—In the House of Commons, on Wednesday (July 10), this bill was read a second time, after the rejection of an amendment by Mr Buckingham.—During the evening, Mr Grant stated that the surplus of revenue, which he estimated would be realized in 1834, after meeting all engagements, would amount to between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000, instead of £1,980,000, as he had previously stated.—On Friday (12), the first forty clauses of the bill were agreed to in committee, after little or no discussion. The other clauses were discussed and adopted, without any material alteration, at several adjourned sittings, down to Friday (July 19), when the whole (113) were got through. Clause 89 provides that two bishops shall be appointed to preside over the Protestant church in India; one to be located at Madras, and the other at Calcutta, with a yearly salary of 24,000 sicca rupees (£2500 sterling) each. It was at the same time stated that the teachers of all religions in India were to be paid. The 75th clause fixes the salary of the governor-general at 240,000 sicca rupees (£25,000 sterling) per annum, and each member of his council 96,000 sicca rupees per annum; the governors of the subordinate councils 120,000, and the members of their councils 60,000 sicca rupees per annum.—Colonel Leith Hay moved the insertion of a clause, giving a legislative sanction to the branch of the Church of Scotland now established in India, which was carried, on a division, by 63 to 25.—The report of the bill was agreed to on Monday (July 22), and the third reading fixed for Friday (July 26).

10. NATIONAL DEBT.—In the House of Commons, on Tuesday (July 2), Mr Buckingham moved for the appointment of a select committee, “to consider the practicability of progressively reducing the national debt by its conversion into terminable annuities at gradually diminishing rates of interest, so as to lessen its burden every year; and to determine the best mode of assessing the property and income of the kingdom to meet the expense of such conversion; and to form at the same time a surplus revenue fund, which should enable the Parliament progressively to repeal those imposts which bear most heavily on the agricultural, manufacturing, and shipping interests of the country.” The hon. member contended, that, without the adoption of some such principle as that contemplated by his propositions, substantial and regular relief could not be obtained.—Lord Althorp said, that the hon. member's plan would add £18,000,000 a-year to the existing charge upon the country; while Mr Buckingham was understood to contend that it would only add £5,000,000. In either case, however, so extensive an inquiry could not lead to any practical benefit at this advanced period of the session.—The motion was negatived by a majority of 19—the numbers being 57 and 38.

11. NEW HOUSE OF COMMONS.—On the same day, Mr Hume moved a resolution to the effect that the present House of Commons did not afford adequate accommodation for its members, and that it was therefore necessary to erect a new building. The resolution was opposed by Mr Peter, Sir M. W. Ridley, Lord Althorp, and Sir R. Peel, on the ground that the house was adequate to the accommodation of the members on all ordinary occasions, and that if more space were required, the present building might be enlarged.—Colonel Davies, Mr Warburton, Mr Midway, and Sir G. Phillips, supported the motion; and on a division there appeared—For the resolution, 70; against it, 154. Majority against the resolution, 84.

12. SCOTCH BANKRUPT BILL.—In consequence of August, 1833.

the universal dissatisfaction expressed regarding the provisions of the Lord Advocate's recently introduced bankrupt act, his lordship, on Wednesday (July 3), moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months—in other words, that it be entirely departed from—which was agreed to.

13. FACTORY BILL.—In the House of Commons on Friday (July 5), Lord Ashley moved that the house sit in committee on this bill.—Lord Althorp opposed the motion. He thought sufficient time had not been allowed for considering the commissioners' report, and proposed that the bill should be referred to a select committee.—Lord Ashley warmly protested against this proposition; delay was mere delusion, and for the purpose of getting rid of the bill altogether.—An animated discussion ensued, in which Sir R. Inglis, Mr O'Connell, Mr M. Attwood, Lord Stormont, and others, opposed the amendment.—Upon a division, Ministers were left in a minority of 23; the numbers being—For, 141; against, 164. The announcement of the result of the division was received with tremendous cheering.—On Thursday (July 18), the house went into committee on the bill, when the first clause, upon the motion of Lord Althorp, was postponed. Upon the second being read, which prevents persons under 18 years working more than 10 hours a-day, Lord Ashley said, if this provision were altered, he would abandon the bill.—Lord Althorp then said, that it required the committee to decide whether persons aged 18 were children requiring legal protection. He thought it was quite clear, that, if they prevented all persons under 18 years of age from working longer than 10 hours a-day, the effect would be to prevent the manufacturers from working their mills longer than that period. Then, what would be the effect of diminishing the manufacturing labour of the country to 10 hours a-day, when all other nations who were rivalling us in manufactures were unfettered in their mode of conducting their business? He beseeched the committee to act with caution, and moved as an amendment, that the word "thirteen" should be inserted in the clause instead of "eighteen;" and expressed his intention of following it up by substituting "eight" instead of "ten" hours, according to the recommendation of the commissioners.—A very animated debate ensued; after which a division took place.—For Lord Althorp's amendment, 236; for the original clause, 93. Majority for Ministers, 145.—So that this measure, which has occasioned so much anxiety and agitation throughout the kingdom, as well as enormous expense, has been finally abandoned.

14. POLAND.—On Tuesday (July 9), Mr Cullar Fergusson brought the unhappy condition of Poland before the notice of the House of Commons, in a long and energetic speech, which made a powerful impression on the house. The hon. member detailed the various atrocities perpetrated on the Poles by the Duke Constantine. He asserted that Nicholas had violated the treaty of Vienna, by depriving Poland of her independence, and he thought her claims ought to be submitted to a European congress. He concluded by moving, "That a humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that he will be graciously pleased not to recognise, or in any way give the sanction of his government to the political state and condition of Poland, the same having been brought about in violation of the treaty of Vienna, to which Great Britain was a party."—Mr T. Attwood seconded the motion, and warmly urged the propriety of England taking up arms immediately against Russia, who, he said, had both deceived and insulted her. If England was to preserve her honour and independence, we must have war, and he trusted Ministers would not resist this resolution. We had given £20,000,000 to emancipate the negroes in the West Indies; but he (Mr A.) would sacrifice ten negroes to save one Pole.—Sir Harry Verney strongly condemned Mr Attwood's violent and most unreasonable desire for war.—Sir R. Inglis said, the cause of Poland was the cause of Europe, and of civilization. The conduct of Russia had been most unjustifiable, and he would recommend the recognition of the independence of Poland by England.—Lord Palmerston perfectly concurred in all that had fallen from the honourable mover. He had no hesitation in condemning the conduct of Russia towards Poland, but observed, that had England interfered by arms, in the hope and expectation of rescuing Poland from destruction, a general war must have ensued, because on one side there were Russia, Austria, and Prussia, entertaining one opinion, and, on the other, England and France were united in a different interpretation. Austria and Prussia were both in possession of Polish provinces, and both were interested in establishing the interpretation put by Russia on the treaty. He therefore thought that the British government had acted wisely and properly in reference to the interest of the Poles themselves, in contenting themselves with the expression of their sentiments on the subject. His hon. friend had said that the object of his motion was merely to prevent any formal acknowledgment by England inconsistent with the treaty of Vienna. He could assure him that nothing could induce the present Ministers to do so, and he trusted his hon. friend would, upon that assurance, withdraw his motion.—The motion was opposed on nearly similar grounds by Lord J. Russell, Lord Althorp, Sir R. Peel, Mr Warburton, Mr Stanley, and Lord Sandon.—Mr O'Connell, Mr Buckingham, Mr Hume, Lord Dudley Stuart, and Mr Sheil, supported it.—The house divided upon the question, when the numbers were—For the address, 95; against it, 177. Majority against the address, 82.

15. CALTHORPE STREET RIOT.—On Thursday (July 11), a select committee was, on the motion of Lord Althorp, appointed to inquire into the circumstances connected with this riot. His lordship stated his belief that it would be found that the police acted with no unnecessary violence until after the murder of one of their body.

16. ABOLITION OF SINECURES.—REDUCTION OF TAXATION.—In the House of Commons, on Tuesday (July 16), Mr Ruthven moved the following resolution:—"That it is the opinion of this house, that the reduction of taxation and the diminution of the public burdens, by every attention to economy, are objects of paramount importance; and that, in justice to the people who pay taxes, all sinecure places, not merited by public services, should be abolished throughout the British empire." He declared his belief of the absolute necessity of reducing taxation, and censured Ministers for having in this respect disappointed the just hopes of the country.—Mr Rice maintained, that Ministers had effected extraordinary reductions in the expenditure, to an extent, indeed, which would have appeared incredible if promised three or four years ago. The right hon. gentleman then went into a long figurative statement in support of his assertion.—Mr H. L. Bulwer and Sir H. Verney opposed the motion.—Mr Hume said the government had just left the expenditure where he found it in 1821. There had been a change in the mode, but not in the amount of taxation. The time was fast advancing, and even now was, when an inquiry into the circumstances under which every pension was granted must take place; and he would not be deterred by the rank of the parties from instituting such an inquiry; the higher their rank was, the stricter should be the investigation.—Lord Althorp contended that Mr Hume's assertions were entirely fallacious as respected the former and present amount of taxation and expenditure. With regard to pensions, he agreed, generally, that none should be granted where undeserved, but he questioned if it were justifiable to take away pensions, competently granted, from persons who had long been led to look to them as a sure means of future subsistence.—Mr Baring, Mr Robinson, and Sir Robert Peel, opposed the motion, when the house divided.—For the motion, 90; against it, 81. Majority against Ministers, 9.—[On this occasion the minority were directed by the Speaker to go out: six members, who had not intended to vote at all, went out, and were brought back by the tellers. This swelled the minority from 75 to 81, otherwise the majority against Ministers would have been 15.]

17. PATRONAGE OF THE SCOTTISH CHURCH.—Mr Sinclair moved, on Tuesday (July 16), for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act of the 10th Anne. His object was to emancipate the church of Scotland from the yoke of patronage, by which it had been so long enthralled.—Mr H. Ross seconded the motion, and supported it at some length.—It was also supported by Mr Colquhoun, Mr Gillon, Mr A. Johnstone, Mr Hallyburton, Mr Ewing, and Mr Pryme.—It was opposed by Mr Jeffrey, Mr Kennedy, Mr Abercromby, and by Lord Althorp—who asked the Speaker, whether, as the act of Parliament gave certain rights to the crown, it could be repealed without the consent of the crown?—The Speaker said, it could not. During the course of the debate, he had sent for the act; and having read it, he found the motion could not be entertained without the consent of the crown previously obtained.—Mr Sinclair then withdrew the motion.

18. CAPTAIN NAPIER.—Earl Grey, on Wednesday (July 17), in answer to a question by the Marquis of Londonderry, stated, that Captain Napier had been struck out of the Admiralty list on the previous Friday. His lordship referred to the triumph at Lisbon, and passed a high eulogium on the conduct of Captain Napier on that occasion, regretting the necessity for dismissing him from the service.

19. FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT.—In the House of Commons, on Wednesday (July 17), Mr J. A. Murray (member for Leith) gave notice of his intention to bring in a bill for the repeal of this act.

Foreign News.

PORTUGAL.

THE news from Portugal since our last are most important, and entirely alter the aspect of affairs in that kingdom. We then mentioned that a fleet under the command of Captain Napier (who had assumed the name of Don Carlos da Ponza) had sailed from Oporto with the view of proceeding against the Miguelite squadron off Lisbon. We also stated that there were on board between 3000 and 4000 troops, under the command of Count Villa Flor. These were expected to proceed direct in the fleet for Lisbon; but a different movement had been secretly determined on. When opposite Lagos, a sea-coast town in the province of Algarves, and nearly half-way between Lisbon and Oporto (about 140 miles from each), the vessels with the troops stood in to shore, and, after a trifling and harmless opposition from a few cannon on the beach, the soldiers were all safely debarked on the 24th of June. This point of descent appears to have been most judiciously chosen, as the province was without any Miguelite troops to resist those of the expedition, and the population in general well affected towards the cause of the young queen. The troops were immediately put in motion, and the forts and towns along the whole sea-coast of the province successively fell into their hands, at the expense of few lives and little trouble, being welcomed every where by the people, and the Miguelite soldiers who garrisoned the different positions, retiring before their opponents with scarcely a show of resistance. It is said that most of the towns and villages in the interior have since declared for Donna Maria, and that, in short, the whole province of Algarves, a considerable portion of Alentejo, may be considered unanimous in her favour. A provisional government in her name has been organised, and volunteers, deserters, are stated to be every day joining her standard. At Faro a large store of munition and arms together with about £6000 left behind by the governor, fell into the hands of the constitutionalists.

Whilst the above operations were going on, Captain Napier hovered about the coast with his fleet, with the view of assisting those on shore in the reduction of the various forts and towns, but finally sailed from the Bay of Lagos for Lisbon on July 1. Next morning he fell in with the enemy off Cape Vincent. Their squadron consisted of the following vessels—the Rainha, 80 guns; the Don John, 74; the Princesa Real, 56; the Freitas, or store-ship, 4; the Princesa, a corvette, 24; with three smaller vessels, carrying altogether 360 guns, and 3250 men. The queen's squadron consisted of three frigates, two of which are named the Don Pedro and the Don Maria (the name of the third, the admiral's flag-ship, is not given); one corvette, the Portuense; one brig, the Villa Flor; and a schooner; in all six vessels carrying 278 guns, and 2500 men. Owing to the weather being rough, Napier found it impossible to attack the enemy before the 5th, when it became calm, and he sent to Lagos for his steamers to come to his assistance. The commanders of these vessels, however, refused, unless £2000 each was promised them, alleging that it was no part of their contract to go into battle. In the meantime, a breeze sprung up which soon carried the three frigates into close quarters with the Miguelites; the smaller vessels, being dull sailers, lagged behind. The following particulars are extracted from a letter published in the Times:

"The admiral's intention was to board the Rainha on the starboard side, the Don Pedro to run up on her larboard side, to board, and carry her. Our vessels carrying a press of sail, soon ran down on the enemy. When about musket-shot off the Rainha, the store-ship and the frigate commenced a very heavy fire on the Rainha and the Don Pedro, and also the Don John commenced firing her stern guns, and whole broadsides from the corvettes and brigs to leeward. Our brave admiral took no notice of their firing, but ran close down, poured two well-aimed broadsides into the Rainha, and laid the ship alongside and boarded.—Admiral Napier being the first to mount sword in hand, supported by his officers, notwithstanding a brisk fire of musketry and the cutlasses of the enemy through which he made his way, after struggling for nearly seven minutes, suspended by the cordage, and having received a blow on the side with an iron bar when two or three of his officers jumped on board the Rainha, and he followed. The Don Pedro kept firing into the store-ship and Princesa Real, and carried away the store-ship's fore-top-mast, leaving her forecastle strewn with wreck. The Donna Maria fired several well-aimed broadsides into the Princesa Real frigate. 4. 30. the Don John hoisted sail, and made off; the corvettes and brigs followed their commodore's example. The Rainha de Portugal sheered off from the Rainha, gave chase to the Don John, the Don Pedro standing across the Rainha's stern, raking her, and then gave a broadside on the larboard quarter, when she surrendered, and the Don Pedro made after the Don John."

The Don John in about an hour and a half surrendered, and the Princesa Real soon hoisted the queen's colours. The Freitas, or store-ship, had, in the meanwhile, been engaged by two of Napier's smaller vessels, but surrendered upon their being joined by the flag-ship after the capture of the Don John. The five prizes were carried in triumph into Lagos, by Captain Napier, on the 6th ultimo. His loss is said to be 3 men killed, and 100 wounded. Among the killed are Captains Goblet and George, and Lieutenant Woolridge. About twenty officers are wounded. The ships were but little damaged.

The above decisive victory will in all probability speedily lead to a termination of the contest and the downfall of Miguel, not so much from the positive diminution of strength which his cause has thereby sustained, as from the impression it will in all probability make on the minds of the Portuguese peasantry, who, it is much to be suspected, have adhered to their present ruler less from affection than a sense of the predominance of his party. To add to the discomfort of the Miguelites—and what formed rather a curious coincidence—on the same day that Admiral Napier was performing the above gallant achievement, the besiegers of Oporto were repulsed, in an attack on that city, with a loss of 600 men in killed and wounded. Moreover, to all these causes of dismay, falls to be added the dreadful condition of Lisbon, where the cholera is said to be raging with fearful virulence. Although, however, the recent reverses in the fortunes of the Miguelites have been as gloom-den, it is highly improbable that Donna Maria allowed to ascend the throne of her ancestors at farther struggle. Marshal Bourmont, the hero of Algiers, and companion of the late ess de Berri, has arrived at Oporto, and taken command of Miguel's army. The powers with he has been invested are said to be almost sure, and he is expected to proceed to active operations immediately. It is also generally believed that has offered Miguel assistance, upon conditions there is little doubt of his complying with. In meantime, the vessels—four large steamers—re-engaged in this country for the service of Miguel and which were ready to leave the Thames, received orders to stay where they are. Had gone, they would have fallen into Napier's hands. Official notification of the blockade of Lisbon, the other Portuguese ports not under the authority of the young queen, has been transmitted from Foreign Office to Lloyd's.

FRANCE.

session of the French Chambers was closed on Tuesday, June 26th. The rumours respecting dissolution by the king seem to have died away. Arrests are still going on in Paris of persons suspected of being engaged in political conspiracies, though the capital is at present unusually tranquil. Only commotions with which it is disturbed are preparations for celebrating the anniversary of the three days.

General Bugeaud has returned from Palermo, after giving them into the hands of Count Lucchesi himself. The general took a formal receipt for whole consignment from the Prince Campo Forte Viceroy of Sicily, and the Count Lucchesi's son. The duchess is not to be received at present in court of Naples.

Louis Philip has returned from his journey through provinces, where it is mentioned that his reception the people has been highly satisfactory.

ITALY.

Italy appears to be, at the present moment, in a very disturbed state, and political disaffection is said to be daily spreading. Several executions on this score have lately taken place throughout the dominions of Duke of Sardinia, and a serious conspiracy against the life of the King of Naples was recently discovered. Brothers, officers of the royal guard, and sons of late General Rossarol, who was active in the Neapolitan revolution of 1820, were the principal agents. Of the brothers, upon the discovery of the plot, and with another conspirator, Romano, that each should kill the other. Romano was killed, but Rossarol was only wounded; and he together with his accomplices were secured.

TURKEY.

The affairs of the East seem at last to be fairly and calmly settled. The latest accounts state the retreat of Ibrahim Pacha with his army, having received a splendid sabre from the Sublime Porte, in token of reconciliation and friendship. The Russian army and fleet were also preparing to leave the Bosphorus. It is said that the Sultan has concluded a treaty of alliance with the Czar.

UNITED STATES.

New York papers to the 25th June contain melancholy details of the ravages of the cholera in different parts of the United States, but more particularly at New Orleans, which was revisited by the disease in the beginning of June. A considerable proportion of deaths, which are said to have averaged eighty a day, is composed of persons of the more respectable classes of society. A letter, dated Matanzas, June 25, says—"You can have no idea of the gloom that prevails here, in consequence of that most dreadful scourge, the cholera. In the cities it has nearly subsided, but in the country its path is marked witholation and ruin. On an estate having 100 slaves, every soul perished. Another with 60 lost 55. A vessel lately landed 400 miserable wretches, all of whom died but three. Eight negroes were taken down on an estate sixteen miles from this town a few days ago. The proprietor, Mr S., an Englishman, of old acquaintance of mine, immediately came to town to our house. His servant was taken down after he got in, and died in the yard under my window. The old gentleman returned to his estate the day before yesterday, where he found 38 out of 69 dead. He was immediately seized himself, when a black boy was dispatched to us with a note, stating that his master was dying. The boy had scarcely delivered the note when he staggered, fell on the floor, and in a few hours was a corpse. The old gentleman is dead, and the estate entirely deserted. This is a picture of many other estates." Another letter, dated June 3, states that a sudden abatement of the virulence of the scourge had taken place. The disease commenced temporarily with a breeze from the north-east, and the favourable turn was observed after a change of wind, which occurred on the night of the 7th. It is remarked that this mysterious epidemic appeared and disappeared in the same sudden manner at New Orleans in the preceding November.—President Jackson, on the 12th of May last, had a narrow escape from being crushed to death, by the falling of a temporary arch which had been erected in the neighbourhood of Castle Garden (a place of public entertainment in New York), and which fell the minute after he had passed from under it. Many persons who were stationed upon the arch were seriously hurt.—A commission was lately appointed by the New York Court of Chancery to inquire into the sanity of ex-Sheriff Parkins. The commissioners have reported that he is not mad; the president being of opinion that he was only a man of ungovernable temper.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

The Sydney Gazette, of the 31st of January, contains two documents of very considerable interest—the first a tabular statement of the imports and exports for the year ending the 5th of January 1833, and the other the balance-sheet of the savings' bank for the year ending the 31st of December. The commercial document, emanating from the Sydney customhouse, exhibits an amount of importations equal to L.602,032 of manufactures and produce of every description; whilst the exports reach the sum of L.384,344, 10s., making together a grand total of nearly L.1,000,000 sterling, as the movement of trade during the past year. With the exception of sperm and black whale oils, which enter the list of imported articles, although in reality for the purpose of re-exportation only, cotton manufactures figure for the largest value of importations; spirits rank next, after which woollens, apparel and slops, and sugar, in about equal proportions. We shall give a few of the items to show the nature and extent of the trade between the mother country and that important colony. First, of the exports from Great Britain to New South Wales:—Manufactured cottons, L.42,756; woollens, L.20,631; spirits, British produce, L.37,033; stationery and books, L.10,550; iron, steel, and hoop, L.13,701; hardware and ironmongery, L.26,720; haberdashery, &c., L.21,680; hats, caps, and bonnets, L.13,547; canvass and bagging, L.11,068; laths and staves, L.16,331; beer and ale, L.23,809; apparel and slops, L.28,112; manufactured leather, L.5012; earthenware, L.7106; cordage, L.5493; copper, L.7810; glass and glass ware, L.5167; linens, L.5170; machinery, L.2406; salt and salt provisions, L.5700; silks, L.3415; soap, L.2991. The following are the imports into Great Britain from New South Wales:—Wools, L.73,559; New Zealand flax, L.15,393; hides, L.6574; oils, black whale, L.20,165; ditto, sperm, L.122,756; seal skins, L.1391; timber, blue gum, L.1070; ditto, cedar, L.1660; whalebone, L.3075.

IRELAND.

IRELAND still continues unusually tranquil, and saving a few squabbles between the Orange and Ribbon men on the anniversary of the famous 12th of July, there has scarcely been any fatal affray heard of for many weeks. At Cork, on the 23d June, a soldier was killed by a street rabble, and two others seriously injured. Many of the chief constables are proceeding to London to solicit the patronage of their political friends, for promotion as stipendiary magistrates in the West India islands, where a strong staff of this description will be formed, under the new system proposed by government for regulating the colonies.

A curious enough scene occurred at Wexford on July 11. The mayor, a Mr. Christopher Harvey, had been served with a summons for tithes; the days of which having expired, he was apprehended, and committed to Wexford jail. He went in state, accompanied by his bailiffs and a number of police, conducted by the sub-sheriff and a posse of gentlemen. His worship stoutly declared, that nothing should induce him to pay the charge for tithes; but about five o'clock in the evening—his usual dinner time—his heart relented, and he paid the demand.

Captain Webber, aid-de-camp to the Lord Lieutenant, was killed lately by an accidental fall from his horse in Phoenix Park.

We are happy to observe that there is the promise of an abundant harvest generally throughout Ireland. In the south, especially, it is said the crops never presented a better appearance within the memory of man.

ENGLAND.

THE MINISTRY.

A GOOD deal of agitation has existed during the past month respecting the administration. It was generally anticipated that the House of Peers would throw out the Irish Church Bill, upon which the cabinet had staked its official existence; and such has been the effect of ministerial moderation upon many of the more stirring spirits in the liberal party, that few men spoke of their going out as an event to be dreaded. It is said, however, to have been found by the conservative party, that they were not yet in a condition to form a cabinet or undertake the reins of government; and hence, when the Irish Church Bill came forward for a second reading in the Upper House, a majority appeared in its favour.

"It appears certain," says a correspondent of the Spectator, "that an active correspondence has been kept up with the court by the Harrowby party, and that the King has been playing the part of a mediator. The result of his mediation, however, has been to place Lord Grey in a worse position than he was before. His lordship, convinced that he could no longer go on with the cabinet constituted as it now is, with the moderate Tory party in it continually opposing obstacles to him, and being urged by his brother-in-law, the Secretary at War, to resign at once, or insist upon the adoption of a more liberal system, had thrown out pretty intelligible hints to the King, that an infusion of liberality into the cabinet would be very useful. The King would not listen to any suggestion for liberalizing the government, but offered to use his own influence with the Peers, so as to get rid of the immediate obstacle before Lord Grey. This he did; but his lordship is said, by his immediate friends and relations, to be resolved on resigning or ruling with proper authority. His Majesty wishes him to remain in office, but will not listen to any proposal which would increase the liberal influence in the cabinet. Thus, it is reasonable to suppose that the court will attempt the formation of a government of moderate Tories, with Richmond, Grant, Stanley, and perhaps Palmerston, still in office. The friends of Lord Grey say, however, that he will triumph, and that there will be a very great change in the feeling of the cabinet towards liberalism."

The King has appointed Major-General Sir Benjamin D'Urban, K.C.B., to be governor and commander-in-chief of the Cape of Good Hope.

The Duke of Wellington has only of late repaired the damage done to his windows by the reform mobs.

Hopes are now entertained that the disorder threatening Prince George of Cumberland with the loss of eyesight, may be cured.

We understand that Sir Francis Burdett has yielded to the entreaties of the Ministers, and will immediately be elevated to the peerage.—Sun.

Sir Robert Peel is erecting a superb mansion at Tamworth, the expense of which, with the furniture, will be L.100,000.

By a return to the House of Commons, it appears that, since January 1824, thirteen London banking firms have become bankrupt; two were army agents, and one a navy agent.

A new coinage of silver groats or 4d. pieces is now executing at the Mint.

The quarterly accounts of the revenue, made up to the 5th ult., exhibit a trifling decrease, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, of L.5251; the July quarter of 1832 yielding L.10,852,993; and the present July quarter, L.10,847,742. There is an increase in the customs of L.147,432; in the stamps, L.42,557; in the post-office, L.41,000. The principal decrease is in the excise, amounting on the quarter to L.183,740.

The stamp-office returns of the number of stamps issued "for all the London newspapers, from the commencement of the year 1832 to the 31st March 1833," (five quarters), is 26,588,050. The number for the year 1831 was 22,097,539; for five quarters, supposing the ratio of the fifth quarter equal to that of the preceding four, the number would have been 27,671,923. In the period, therefore, which the new return embraces, the circulation of the London newspapers has fallen, off 1,083,873.

At the end of June and beginning of July, Dr Chalmers preached on several successive Sundays in the almost deserted church lately occupied by Mr Irving. Immense crowds, including the first-rate people in the metropolis, attended; and considerable sums (on one occasion L.270) were drawn in aid of the funds of the chapel, which are L.9000 in debt.

June 28. Mr Cobbett obtained a verdict, awarding L.100 damages, against the Times, for copying a paragraph, implying, that, as he was an uncertificated bankrupt, he could not sit in the House of Commons.

July 6. Fursey, the man accused of stabbing a policeman at the Coldbathfields meeting on the 13th of May, was tried and acquitted at the Old Bailey. The verdict was received with shouts of applause by the people within and without the court. The man was detained on a second indictment, which, however, has subsequently been departed from.

From an account printed by order of the House of Commons, it appears that the gross estimated amount of taxes repealed since the close of the war is L.42,345,529. The estimated gross produce of the taxes imposed in the same time is L.5,836,110, leaving a balance of taxes reduced above those imposed, of about L.36,500,000, not including the reduction of the soap tax and assessed taxes this year. The loss to the revenue has not of course been so great as the relief to the public, for the net produce of the taxes repealed was nearly L.2,500,000 less than the gross. Of the taxes so reduced, about L.9,000,000 have been customs duties, L.14,000,000 excise duties, and above L.18,500,000 the property and assessed taxes.

The railway between Newcastle and Carlisle is rapidly advancing. The government is to give L.100,000, in four sums, towards the undertaking.

A new town-hall is on the point of being finished at Birmingham, 140 feet long, and 65 in breadth and height, being thus one of the largest public rooms in the empire. An organ, 40 feet wide and 45 in height, is erecting.

A smart shock of an earthquake was felt at various places in Nottinghamshire on the 13th July.

The prisoners in Lancaster Castle have been for some time in the habit of receiving newspapers, which they introduce into the chapel, and read while on the treadmill.

Joseph Lancaster, the celebrated founder of the new system of education, is residing in poverty at Montreal, in Canada, labouring for his living and the maintenance of a wife and family. Some of the friends of general education in London are about to appeal to the public in order to raise an annuity for his life, and to procure for his children that education and establishment which he has been the instrument of providing for hundreds of thousands.

SOURCES OF BRITISH WEALTH AND POWER.

We begin with the subject of agriculture. The largest part of the capital of the British empire is embarked in agriculture, certainly the half of the capital is; that is to say, a sum equal to one thousand nine hundred and one million nine hundred thousand pounds. Taking the total annual value of the direct produce of agriculture, it will be found to amount to two hundred and forty-six millions six hundred pounds. The calculations on which these results are founded rest on records and information of the most authentic description. The items of this produce and their amount, respectively, are as follow:—

Grain of all sorts	L.86,700,000
Hay, grass, field turnips, vetches, &c.	113,000,000
Potatoes	19,000,000
Gardens, orchards, and nurseries	3,800,000
Timber cut down, hops, seeds, &c.	2,600,000
Cheese, butter, eggs, &c.	6,000,000
Manure, and labour in rearing cattle	3,500,000
Hemp and wool, labour included	12,000,000

Mines constitute the next source of greatest production. Under this head are included all those works carried on for the purpose of procuring gravel, sand, slate, granite, &c. The writer believes he does not exaggerate in fixing the amount produced by the mines and minerals generally of the United Kingdom at an annual average of L.21,400,000. The iron mines, he estimates, produce upwards of four millions of this amount; whilst the value of the coal is rated at eleven millions. The number of families of shopkeepers in Great Britain is taken, by the most experienced authorities, as about 350,000, which will give 2,100,000 of individuals. It cannot be far from a correct view of the subject to calculate the labour and profits of capital employed by this great community at L.60 a-year each family; and, assuming this to be accurate, we should then have under this head a sum of twenty-one millions. This estimate, however, does not take in Ireland, neither does it include the millers, butchers, and bakers; but, taking all together, and calculating the profits on a moderate scale, we may allow for this item, in the general account, the full sum of L.16,200,000. The coasting trade is computed to produce L.3,550,000; the fisheries, L.3,400,000; shipping and foreign trade, L.34,398,059; bankers and foreign income (the income from foreign loans, money contracts, &c.) L.9,000,000; under the latter head are included the whole of the chartered banks of the United Kingdom. Some idea of the transactions of these powerful merchants will be obtained from the statement, that the amount of the accounts balanced every day in London by these bankers is eight millions. In the same item is comprehended the income resulting from property abroad, possessed by British subjects. It has been usually calculated, that the remittances on account of the East Indies to this country, amount to two millions; the writer, however, is contented with fixing it at L.1,500,000.

Of our British manufactures, the cotton manufacture, or to speak more correctly, the cotton machinefacture, ranks first. The entire value of this manufacture, in 1760, did not amount to L.200,000; but since that time, by the aid of human skill and machinery, it has not only extended its produce over all Europe and America, but has undersold the Asiatics in their cheap and home markets, sending a larger quantity of its produce to the East Indies and China than to the United States. In 1824, Huskisson stated, in the House of Commons, that the annual produce of this manufacture was L.33,500,000; in 1827, it was stated to be L.36,000,000; and at present cannot be estimated under L.37,000,000. Deducting six millions for the cost of the raw material (though it certainly does not amount to that sum), leaves L.31,000,000. More than 850,000 weavers, spinners, bleachers, &c., are employed in this manufacture, the amount of whose wages, at L.24 per year, exceeds two millions; and the wages of 111,000 engineers, masons, smiths, joiners, machine makers, &c., at the rate of only L.30 a-year, would produce L.3,330,000, making altogether L.5,330,000, which, deducted from L.31,000,000, leaves L.25,670,000 for the profits of capital invested in looms, workshops, mills, machinery, &c. This capital was estimated, in the year above mentioned, at L.65,000,000, and at present exceeds L.75,000,000. The number of men altogether employed is 1,200,000.

Such is the prodigious annual amount raised by this single manufacture, exceeding, by one million, the whole gross revenue estimated to be raised in the whole stupendous and "celestial" empire of China. Such are the results of the combination of capital with the wonderful powers of machinery, perhaps equal to the work of eighty millions of men.

In speaking of the silk manufacture of this country, the writer does not despair, after witnessing its rapid progress since 1822, of seeing the British manufacture of silk supplant that of France, even in the French market, in the same way as the cotton manufactures have already done with the East Indian article. The annual produce on this branch of manufactures is estimated at eight millions. The woollen manufacture forms a subject of extensive illustration by the writer. Its gross produce cannot be less, at present, than L.22,300,000, from which six millions, as the cost of the raw material, is to be deducted. This manufacture gives employment to more than half a million of men, women, and children. The linen manufacture is estimated as producing eleven millions, the cost of the raw material not deducted. The declared value of the exports of this article is nearly two millions sterling; and the number of hands employed in it cannot be less than 300,000. The leather manufacture, which embraces a great variety of articles, is calculated at fifteen millions annually. The hardware manufactures, all those metallic articles made in Birmingham, Sheffield, &c. are calculated by the writer to be underrated at the sum of L.17,300,000. The cost of the raw material in this trade is comparatively insignificant. The expense of production consists chiefly of wages; it is, therefore, a trade depending on the industry of the nation. The number of persons to whom this trade gives employment is 370,000. Earthenware, china, porcelain, and glass manufactures, are sources of permanent and immense profit; for, with the exception of barilla and pearl ashes, the materials of the manufacture of each are to be found in this country. The yearly produce of glass is two millions and a half sterling, and that of the pottery and earthenware cannot be less than nearly six millions. The jewellery branch, after deducting the cost of the raw materials, may be fairly allowed to produce not less than L.3,400,000 sterling. There is a class of manufactures which, from the various nature of the articles produced, are considered usually under the general designation of "Miscellaneous." These consist of papers of all sorts, pasteboards, hangings, book and print machinery, mechanical apparatus connected with the fine arts, &c. The estimate of the writer, founded on all accessible sources of information, is, that the produce of such articles is not less than L.31,200,000 sterling. The calculations in this instance, as, indeed, those throughout, are not adopted at random, or based upon mere guess-work: they are founded on Parliamentary documents, investigated and compared with diligence and care. Thus, then, we arrive at the general result, that all the branches of manufacture of these kingdoms—that is, all that machinery, all these processes, whether they consist of vital or inanimate power, by which raw materials are converted into every variety of useful and ornamental articles, serving for the necessity and comfort of society—all these branches we find to be of a value unparalleled in the history of the world, being estimated to be of the value which is expressed by the enormous sum of one hundred and forty-eight millions and fifty thousand pounds.—Taking, then, the aggregate capital produced by labour and machinery, by produce of all sorts, and property, we have a total value produced every year in the United Kingdom to the prodigious amount of five hundred and fourteen millions eight hundred and twenty-three thousand and fifty-nine pounds sterling!*

A DOUBLE PASSENGER.

DR COLE, a personage of extraordinary obesity, whose mirthful recital of his grievances illustrated the truth of the adage "Laugh and grow fat," appeared before the Lord Mayor the other day, to complain of the conduct of the omnibus-drivers in refusing to admit him into their vehicles. It seems, from the doctor's statement, that no sooner does his portly form appear in view, than the omnibuses within hail immediately move off. "No room!" or "Quite full!" is the cry of the remorseless conductor. If by miracle the doctor should approach unperceived, and take them unawares, the passengers look aghast, and the cad shuts the door in his face. This should seem to be supererogatory, for the doctor can hardly be able to enter through the narrow doorway; but they doubtless contemplate the inconvenience of the delay and hindrance to other passengers by his sticking fast in the attempt. Indeed, the doctor seems in a fair way of reducing his weight by a perpetual foot-chase after coy omnibuses. The Lord Mayor hinted that walking might remove the inconvenience, by diminishing his bulk. The doctor was horror-struck at the thought. He has got fat by turning the diseases of others into commodity; but to make his own cure itself, seemed to the doctor an utter impossibility. What is the poor man to do? The cabmen are deaf to his call, and blind to his beckoning finger; and Jarveys tremble for their springs. To keep a gig, would be doubly expensive on the score of wear and tear; besides, one horse could never draw such a man-mountain for many days together. If he can get into an omnibus, the remedy is easy: let him pay double fare, and occupy two places. It is manifestly unjust that "two single gentlemen rolled into one" should travel as an individual. As well might the Siamese twins have called themselves one passenger, seeing they were indivisible. We put it to the good sense and fairness of the worthy doctor, whether he can rationally expect to be accommodated with the room of two persons at the price of one seat? He should consider himself a double man, and book his places accordingly, whether in omnibus or mail-coach, at the theatre or at church. There is an inconvenience, however, attendant upon this course; and as it actually occurred to a personage of similar dimensions, we mention it to put the doctor on his guard. This agglomeration of humanity, when he was compelled to be locomotive, always consulted his own comfort and that of his fellow-travellers, by booking two places for himself. On arriving at the mail on one occasion, he found, to his dismay, that though there were two places left for him, they were on opposite sides of the coach! Let Dr Cole avoid such a dilemma, by booking himself as a double passenger—a dual unit—a binary individual.

Handel, whose appetite was as far beyond that of ordinary mortals as is the person of Dr Cole, used always to order his dinner for two. Being one day unusually hungry, he extended his order to three; and coming into the tavern at the appointed time, inquired if all was ready? He was told that it was, and that the dinner would be brought up as soon as the company arrived. "Den bring it ub," said the great composer; "I am de gambony." So it may be said of Dr Cole: he is an impersonate co. He is not one man, but a party; or at least self and friend. He is never solus.—Spectator.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

A regular and permanent establishment for national education is comparatively a new idea in Europe. Scotch, by an accident connected with their church system, have had the advantage of it for nearly three hundred years, while the English have enjoyed hardly a vestige of the same blessing. About the year 1719, King of Prussia commenced a system of national education, which is about to be copied in France, and may be an excellent model for England also, if her resources would permit. Of this system a full account is given in the last number of the Edinburgh Review, thus abridged by the Scotsman newspaper:—

The Prussian system is characterised by three features—first, its universality; secondly, the comprehensiveness of the plan; thirdly, the liberal and popular spirit of the organization by which it is carried into effect. In Prussia (as in Germany generally) it is obligatory on all parents to send their children to school from the age of seven to fourteen, beginning earlier if it be chosen; and the duty is enforced by penalties. The Gemeinde, or parish, is bound to support an elementary school; each considerable town, a burgher school, the more advanced studies; each considerable district, a gymnasium for classical studies; and each province, its university. The parish school is supported by the parish, and for its management all the landholders and heads of families are formed into a union, which appoints a committee to inspect and watch over the school. We would expect such a liberal arrangement in an absolute monarchy? The system of instruction is prescribed by authority, and is nearly uniform for the whole monarch. It embraces in the elementary schools—1. Religion and morals. 2. The German tongue. 3. Elements of geometry and drawing. 4. Arithmetic, pure and applied. 5. The elements of physics, general history, and the history of Prussia. (By physics, we presume, is meant chemistry and natural philosophy.) 6. Singing. 7. Writing. 8. Gymnastic exercises. 9. "The more simple manual labours," by which, we presume, is meant the use of the tools used in the most common occupations, such as the spade, pick-axe, saw, plane, file, trowel, stone chisel, &c. The burgher school embraces the same branches, carried farther, with the addition of a little Latin, which is not, however, universally enforced. The instruction is not gratuitous, except to the poor. The provision to be made by the parish embraces: 1st, a salary to the schoolmaster, with a retired allowance for him in old age; 2d, a schoolhouse, well aired and heated; 3d, books, maps, models for drawing, collections in natural history, gymnastic apparatus, &c.; 4th, aid to poor scholars. The fund is raised by contributions levied on all inhabitants according to the amount of their property or the produce of their industry, and by moderate fees which are not paid to the schoolmaster, but to the parish managers. There are cantonal courts and inspectors who control and inspect all the schools in a canton; others for departments with a wider authority; others with still more extensive powers for the provinces; and above all, there is the minister of public instruction. In all the courts, councils, or commissioners exercising authority over the schools of any class, there are a few of the clergy, Protestant and Catholic being admitted according as the scholars belong to the one or the other church; and great care is taken to prevent the slightest offence from being offered to the religious feelings of any party. The choice of the books in the elementary school is left to the local committees. There are half-yearly examinations; and boys leaving school obtain certificate of their capacity, and their moral and religious dispositions, which must be produced when they go to the common, or enter into apprenticeship or service.

The Prussian plan embraces what is essential to every good system of national education—schools for training persons to act as teachers. In this branch, ample provision has been made; the ten provinces containing no less than 34 seminaries, which turn out annually a sufficient number of skilful teachers to supply the place of those who die or retire from infirmity. In these schools, the pupils remain three years or more; they are subjected to rigorous examinations; and besides studying all the branches of knowledge necessary to fit them for their future duties, they are practically instructed in the art of teaching, to which our schoolmasters are left to grop their way through a multitude of blunders and miscalculations. Teachers who distinguish themselves are promoted, or special recompenses are assigned to them.

In 1825, Prussia, with a population of 12,000,000, had 20,880 primary schools; 458 burgher schools for boys, and 278 for girls. In these were employed 22,261 masters, 704 mistresses, 2024 under masters and mistresses; in all 25,000 primary teachers, who dispensed instruction to 871,000 boys, and 793,000 girls, forming together 1,664,000 pupils. The children at school, therefore, comprised nearly one-seventh of the population, a greater proportion than is found in any other part of Europe. In Scotland, which has long boasted of its education, the proportion, we think, is only about one-tenth, and the instruction communicated is inferior to the Prussian in a still higher degree.

The Prussian system, though it has a very artificial aspect, is, it seems, strictly of a practical kind. The government has merely amalgamated and methodised the modes and arrangements which had sprung up spontaneously, or under local ordinances, in different parts of its dominions; and M. Cousin, whose words the Review borrows, says, "that the local committees, inspectors, boards, &c., have exerted a zeal at once so unremitting, and so well applied, that what the law prescribes is almost every where below what is actually performed." But the liberal and disinterested spirit of the Prussian government is above all praise. "A king, an absolute king (says M. Cousin), has given this law; an irresponsible minister has counselled or digested it; yet no mistaken spirit is betrayed: almost every thing is committed the authorities of the commune (parish), of the department, of the province: with the minister is left only impulse and the general superintendence." Look to this noble monument of enlightened patriotism, forget all the political misdeeds of Frederick William, find it impossible not to rank him with the best and best reformers of the present times. For the last four years, the improvement and extension of education must have been the great business of the government; so judicious and successful have its labours been, that the rising generation in Prussia are undoubtedly instructed than the youth in any part of the world, excepting New England.

The introduction of this system, so complete, so well arranged, and so Catholic in its spirit, into Prussia, is enough to mark an era in history. For the first time, we have seen the ruler of a great state devoting his energies for a series of years to the benignant duty of instructing the people, with as much zeal as other monarchs have shown in ruining them by taxes, or barbarising them by wars. The experiment has been made on a grand scale, and Prussia cannot fail to reap the fruits in increased industry, prosperity, and happiness. Even those princes who dread education will envy the advances it yields, and patronise the schoolmaster from a principle of selfishness.

Percussion Locks.—The question as to using the percussion locks in the French army is on the point of being decided. Amongst the various trials which have been made, we must refer to those reported in the Spectateur Militaire, from a statement of Captain Hauburg, of the Hanoverian army, where every thing tending to the improvement of the art of war is always met with great consideration. At first, each infantry regiment received 40 percussion muskets, with instructions to ascertain, by experiment, whether such guns charged with the ordinary ball-cartridges used in actual service, would answer in a campaign, by comparing them with the action of the same number of the muskets with flint locks, used under the same circumstances. The experiments were tried before 12 committees, appointed for the purpose, at the same time, that is, in the month of April, when the weather was very rainy, in order that the effect might be ascertained under circumstances the most unfavourable that can arise in the course of a campaign. Out of 340 muskets with percussion locks, consuming together 27,000 cartridges, there were only 2 that missed fire from the failure of the priming, and 72 from defect in the charge, making in all 93, while out of the same number of muskets with flint locks, burning the same quantity of cartridges, 1440 missed fire from the priming, and 378 from the charge, making together 1826. The experiments did not stop here. It was desired to ascertain the effect of firing each species of musket reiterated for a long time without being cleaned. Eleven committees returned, that out of 22 percussion muskets, firing 11,000 shots, 8 failed in the priming and six in the charge; and out of the same number of muskets with flint locks, 207 shots failed from the priming, and 599 from the charge; in all, 806. Still further experiments were made both in exposing the muskets to a constant rain, by wetting the inside of the cap, and by putting a drop of water into the touch-hole. The result was, that the percussion guns, after being exposed to the injuries of the weather, or even a constant rain, were greatly more to be relied upon than those with flint locks. Marshal Soult, who had been for a long time impressed with the advantages to be derived from the use of percussion guns, resolved to renew the above experiments in France; and last year, while residing at Saint Ouen, a committee of officers, under the presidency of the colonel of the 12th regiment of light infantry, repeated all the experiments above related, and the report thereupon, made by Captain Vivier of the artillery, completely established the supremacy of the new system. Inquiries have since been made so as to decide upon certain details in the construction of the locks, whether they can be applied to the muskets now in use, and to make them appropriate to every circumstance which may arise in the course of service. At the present time nearly 2000 muskets of all different kinds have been fitted with percussion locks, in order to make a last and grand trial.

Wool and Woollen Trade.—From Parliamentary documents just published, it appears that the quantity of wool imported into Great Britain, during the year 1832, was 28,000,000 lbs., of which 19,800,000 lbs. were from Germany, 2,600,000 from Spain, 1,400,000 from New South Wales, 950,000 from Van Diemen's Land, 850,000 from Russia, 830,000 from Prussia, 630,000 from the United States, and smaller quantities from other places. Of this wool, 27,600,000 lbs. were kept for home consumption, 550,000 lbs. were exported, and a part remains in the warehouses. In the same year there were 4200 lbs. British wool, and 2,200,000 lbs. woollen and worsted yarn, exported. The "declared value" of the woollen manufactured goods exported in 1832, was £5,244,000; of which the largest quantities went to the following countries:—United States, £1,420,000; Germany, £1,816,000; East Indies, £96,000; Spanish America, £437,000; Netherlands, £390,000; Canada, &c., £362,000; Brazil, £210,000; Italy, £194,000; Russia, £144,000. The quantity shipped to each of the other countries enumerated, fell short of £100,000.

India Writers and Cadets.—According to a return just published, the number of writers appointed in the twenty years ending 1832, was 820, or an average of 41 per annum. The number of cadets in the same period was 5043, or an average of 252 per annum. The cadets are the young men who go out under the Company's patronage to obtain commissions in the army as they fall vacant. The writers are young men who have received the education prescribed by the Company's rules, and go out to fill civil, judicial, or commercial situations under them. A cadetship, taking the ordinary run of chances, is probably worth from £300 to £600 per annum; a writership from £1000 to £2000 per annum.

Scientific Meeting at Cambridge.—June 24, the British Association for the Promotion of Science held their third annual meeting at Cambridge—Professor Sedgwick in the chair. The meeting consisted of near 800 persons, comprising the most distinguished men of science from every part of the empire. The general meetings were held in the Senate House, and the sectional meetings under their respective vice-presidents were held in the extensive range of apartments behind the Senate House. The first day was occupied in various arrangements and preliminary discourses, describing the objects of the meeting, and the subsequent days in reading papers on various philosophical subjects. The proceedings each day commenced at ten o'clock in the morning, in the various sections, under their respective vice-presidents, and the whole assembled together in the Senate House at one o'clock, under the direction of the president, when the proceedings of the respective sections were reported, and followed by reading papers upon general subjects. The corp d'ail of the Senate House during these re-unions was particularly imposing, comprehending above one thousand persons, of both sexes, distinguished for their rank, talent, and accomplishments. On Wednesday, the Master and Fellows of Trinity College gave a splendid entertainment to four hundred members of the Association, in their great hall—the Vice-Master, Dr Brown, in the chair, supported by Dr Buckland, Professor Sedgwick, the Marquis of Northampton, Earl Fitzwilliam, and Lord Mcrpeith. The evening passed off with the greatest harmony and enthusiasm. It was truly a most splendid sight to behold four hundred of the most talented and enlightened men of the empire, together with some of the most distinguished men of science from different parts of Europe and America, all united together for the advancement of knowledge in that hall where Newton, Bacon, Barrow, and other immortal philosophers, had so frequently met before for a similar purpose. The evening terminated with a splendid display of fireworks at the back of King's College gardens. Thursday was passed in the same manner, and doctors' degrees were conferred on Lords Fitzwilliam and Morpeth, Mr Davis Gilbert, Sir Thomas Brisbane, &c. In the afternoon the Master and Fellows of St John's College gave a grand dinner to some members of the Association.—At a meeting of the General Committee, held on Thursday afternoon, the city of Edinburgh was fixed upon as the next place of meeting of the British Association—Lieut.-General Sir Thomas Brisbane, G.C.H., K.C.B., to be President.

Rate of Mortality in the Manufacturing Districts.—During the last fifty years, the entire population has been undergoing a rapid conversion from an agricultural to a manufacturing character. In 1800, it was calculated that manufacturers were to agriculturists as 6 to 5; in 1825, 8 to 5; and in 1830, as 2 to 1. And if this examination be carried farther back, the tables are turned, and agriculturists have the numerical majority. Beginning in 1780, they were about equal; 1700, 6 to 5; 1740, 8 to 5; 1700, 2 to 1; and so on, till the great body of the inhabitants were exclusively devoted to agriculture. At the period when this was the condition of society, the average mortality was fully 1 in 36; in 1780, when manufactures had received their first great impulse, 1 in 40; in 1810, when the bulk of the population was engaged in them, 1 in 52; in 1820, 1 in 57; and in 1830, 1 in 60. Hence it appears, that, during the transition of employment, the mean duration of life has been steadily improving, and that, at the present time, its value is double to what it was in 1700. How manifestly unjust, how manifestly absurd, to declare that manufactures are injurious to human life. On the contrary, it may be said, that, were the population a fixed one, and one sober and moral in its character, it would show a rate of mortality infinitely superior to that in agricultural counties.—Gaskell's Manufacturing Population.

An Eastern Letter of Compliment.—The following is a literal copy of a letter recently addressed by Ibrahim Pacha to the Sultan, whose head, but for the intervention of the Russians, would probably ere this have adorned the gates of the seraglio:—"My sublime, magnanimous, awe-inspiring, mighty, great sovereign, our benefactor, the benefactor of mankind,—May God grant to your sublimity a life without end, and may he make the august shadow of your sublimity a protection for all men, and especially for my humble head. Your inexhaustible goodness has induced your most gracious sovereignty to grant me the government of Adana, as Mahassilik (in farm). Animated by the new power of your sublimity, the duration of my frail existence will be wholly devoted to praying to God for the prolongation of your life and reign. As my heart is pervaded by a feeling of happiness, I entertain (God is my witness) no wish but to act so as to obtain the gracious approbation of your sublimity, and to find occasion to devote myself to your service. For the purpose of expressing my gratitude to your sublimity, and to express my most humble thanks, I venture to lay this humble petition at the foot of the throne of the sublime, magnanimous, awe-inspiring, mighty, great Padishah, our august sovereign and benefactor, the benefactor of all men."—N.B. This letter is written by Ibrahim Pacha with his own hand, and sealed with his seal.

SCOTLAND.

THE CHURCH OF EDINBURGH.

In deference to the wishes of the inhabitants, as expressed at the public meeting of the 21st June, the Lord Advocate has given up his bill for modifying the tax levied in Edinburgh for the stipends of the clergy. His Lordship, while expressing his regret for the dissatisfaction with this bill, also states his fear that there will be great difficulty in carrying one such as the inhabitants seem to require. It gives additional perplexity to this question, that, while the people complain of this bill as not producing a great enough relief, the Presbytery of Edinburgh has presented a petition to Parliament, deprecating it for its tendency to fix the revenues of the clergy at a certain limit—a contingency which they conceive to be "religiously forbidden." July 11, the Court of Session decided, in the case of Messrs Hunter and Wilson, two citizens of Edinburgh, against Peter Hill, the collector of the city taxes, that this obnoxious tax can be enforced by imprisonment, as well as by distraint of goods. A general disposition has in consequence been expressed by the citizens to submit to even this penalty rather than pay the tax; and, on the 17th July, Mr Wilson, pocket-book-maker, George Street, was the first martyr to this resolution. He was attended to jail by a cavalcade of citizens, who, after his arrival there, paid the money and dues, and then conducted him to a tavern, where they resolved to honour him with some public testimonial of their admiration. A great number of charges of horning, or warnings of the coming penalty of imprisonment, have since been served upon respectable tradesmen and others who refuse to pay; and it is evident that the breach between the clergy and citizens is not only widening every day, but that this matter of dispute is rapidly engendering a deeply-rooted hatred of the established church, and doing more to promote dissent than all that has been done in Scotland for nearly a century.

The Scotsman gives the following summary of this unhappy question, which may make it more intelligible to strangers:—

"We have always been of opinion, that it is for the interest of the church, as well as for religion, that this tax should be abolished. The present state of society is very different from what it was when the tax was instituted. It is unfitted for the present times. An established religion cannot be long supported by a direct compulsory assessment. It comes home to the feelings at once. It places the church and the people in direct opposition; and so far from adding to the respectability of the clergy, it literally places them in the degrading situation of tax-gatherers, and they have also the odium attached to them for reaping where they do not sow.

"This tax has also something peculiarly odious attached to it.—1. It was for many years levied without any legal authority, and it was only by the act 1809 that one penny could be lawfully collected in the extended royalty.—2. The act 1809 was obtained by the most arrant deception on the part of those who were concerned in obtaining it, as the clause was surreptitiously inserted without public notification.—3. The magistrates had been in the practice of levying shore-dues at Leith, annuity money, and church seat rents, all in name of the church, and only paid the clergy fixed stipends of £300 as at 1814. The remaining large surplus went into the city Exchequer.—4. By a very moderate calculation, it is supposed, that after paying the clergy, and the whole expense of building churches, &c., these revenues have afforded the city a surplus of £60,000 or £70,000.

"With these facts before our eyes, and seeing that the clergy, by a compact with the magistrates, obtained, by a decision of the court, the proceeds of the whole assessment, while they allowed the magistrates to hold the seat rents as burgh property, it is obvious that the character of the church has been completely changed, and its principle subverted, and we blame the clergy as much as we do the magistrates for allowing such a gross misapplication of the ecclesiastical revenue."

INSOLVENCY OF EDINBURGH.

The commission alluded to in our last, as proposed in a bill, for the future management of the city's finances, has since met with a strong opposition from the liberal party in Edinburgh, who held a public meeting on the subject on the 6th July, and appointed four deputies to proceed to London, and oppose the measure now before Parliament. The chief objection is, that, while the finances of the city are managed by a commission, most of whom are of conservative politics, the magistracy, who are expected under the burgh bill to be of a liberal complexion, will be shorn of both their power and their splendour; and it is the desire of the opposition, that the city should rather be declared bankrupt at once, and proceed upon a new footing. As the creditors, by the one proposal, are promised full payment, and by the other something less, they have naturally made a stand for the bill, maintaining "that their claims are of paramount importance, and founded on the most undeniable principles of justice, and, therefore, cannot be sacrificed, or measures for their relief postponed, for any political considerations whatever."

NEW STAMP DUTIES.

The recent alterations in various of the stamp duties are highly important; an abstract of them for reference may be useful. The new act came into operation on the 5th July.

It reduces the duty on advertisements to one shilling in Ireland, and one shilling and sixpence in Great Britain.—It exempts from stamp duty, in Great Britain and Ireland, receipts for payments of money not amounting to five pounds.—It also exempts from stamp duty, in the United Kingdom, all insurances of "agricultural produce, farming stock, and implements of husbandry," against loss by fire.—It enacts that a copy of every pamphlet, or literary work, or periodical paper, containing advertisements, or having them annexed, shall be exhibited at the stamp office (in Edinburgh within six days

NEW DOCTRINE OF PASSIVE OPPOSITION.

LIBERALISTS have of late years had their attention directed to a new and remarkable doctrine in the Theory of Government—namely, a power which has been discovered to rest in the majority of a community, to defeat the intention of an obnoxious law, without in the least violating its literal purport, and this by merely submitting, passively, to the penalty which is imposed as the alternative of primary obedience; in other words, to the second award of the law instead of the first.

That laws may exist even in this liberal state, which have no other merit but that of existence, and which, notwithstanding their confessed demerits, are yet so tolerated to particular interests as to defy every effort of the boasted power of petition, and even the wishes of the government itself, to remove them, is a fact which all classes of political thinkers must acknowledge. Suppose that a law of this kind has the further obnoxiousness of having been obtained by a fraud equally gross and base, on the part of the few who profit by it—suppose it in every respect iniquitous and disgraceful, founded on injustice, intended for abstractly censurable purposes—violating the pockets and the consciences alike of all who are liable to it; and suppose that so long as its primary ends can be at all enforced, there is no hope of getting it repealed:—suppose all this—for we only put it hypothetically—it becomes a question in the philosophy of politics, if men are justified in taking any indirect expedient for relieving themselves, and, if that is permissible, is the particular expedient above described a safe one for all and sundry?

With regard to the first of these questions, it may, we conceive, be dismissed with a simple reference to such political necessities as that which dictated the Revolution of 1688—necessities of which the mass of the community must for the time be left its own sole judge.

With regard to the second, it must be argued solely with a reference to its expediency, or its bearing upon the general interests. In the very outset, there can be no denying the concern which every man has in seeing that the laws are obeyed. If it could, indeed, be shown that the indirect defeat of any law, however odious that particular law might be, tended to lessen the respect for laws in general, and thereby endangered the lives, liberties, and properties of men, it is secure, then would it be clear that no man would be justified by public opinion, however safe he might be from actual punishment, if he did any thing tending to that result.

It is conceded, however, by all parties in the British empire, that the great bulk of the people are the source of legislative authority. If they are so, it must also be allowed that the great bulk of the people are capable of distinguishing right from wrong, and of taking a safe course from a dangerous one. To show, then, that a case of passive opposition is safe for the general interests, it only requires to be shown that it cannot possibly occur, unless when the majority of the people is favourable to and concerned in it.

Suppose a case like that which has occurred in London and other parts of England, where there has been a disposition to delay payment of certain taxes: restraint and sale of goods is the penalty imposed by the law for this act, from whatever cause it may arise. Well, a recusant is willing to let his goods be taken and sold, rather than pay the money. The officers of the law take them, and, if any body will buy, sell them; whereby the money is as effectually realised, and the law as truly obeyed, as if the money had been paid at the first. The only difference is, that, for the gratification of his predilection, the householder has paid some considerable extra sums for expenses—generally a very sufficient guarantee for his acting on no light considerations. Now, there either will be buyers or there will not; there will be, if the majority of the public is indifferent to the subject; and there will not, if the majority, disapproving of the tax, think it honourable, and expedient for the general interest, that their neighbour has refused his money. Thus the whole question resolves itself into one of public opinion, and acts as quietly and innocuously as the getting up of a petition. The ruling interests are only apt to be a little more quickly convinced, than they generally are by petitions, of the earnestness of public feeling upon this particular question.

It may be represented, that, in the case of the passive opposition alluded to, those who refuse payment, and whose goods cannot be converted into money, throw an additional burden upon those who do pay, and thus commit an injustice. All that can be said to this, is, that the majority of the people must still be left to judge. Men are concerned to see that their own pockets are not injured by the proceedings they are sanctioning; and if they do find the said additional burden falling upon the said pockets, they will soon take quite another course. Any deficiency of revenue in the meantime is only a necessary part of the procedure—the means, to wit, of making the ruling interests feel the strength of the opposition, and of inducing them to grant relief.

It may be represented that a few triumphs by passive opposition will be apt to encourage men to refuse the payment of other and more defensible taxes, and even private debts. So they will, when the firmament falls and smothers the larks—but hardly till then. Suppose any man attempting to hold out against a police assessment, which had been duly imposed by general consent, and appealing to the sympathy of his neighbours not to buy his goods, or to give him their countenance while he lay in durance, would it not be evident to them that this man was anxious to turn over his part of the necessary public expense upon his neighbours, and would any one grant him the least sympathy? No—his goods would be bought, and the assessment paid; or he would be permitted to remain in jail as long as he pleased. No man would ever lend the least regard to such an obviously unjust and inexpedient recusancy.

It may still be said, that, after all, it is a virtual resistance to law, and, as such, not to be practised by right-thinking men. To this it may be answered, that, if sanctioned by the general voice, as it always must be, in order to be at all, there exists nowhere a right to attribute improper motives in individuals. It may be a man's humour to pay in goods instead of money, or it may be his conscience—as it notoriously is with the Society of Friends. He may prefer going to jail, on the same principle as that which actuates a brave man in putting a highwayman to his worst before surrendering his purse. If odium follows to the law, and it is consequently rendered of no force, why did the law not provide more effectually for its own defence? It is evident, that, in putting it through all its existing resources, he keeps within the legitimate expedients always allowed to an enemy—

—“seu versare dolos, seu certa occumbere morti.”

With his private motives, no man or body of men, nor the great law itself, has anything to do—for, fortunately, an unexpressed thought has not, in this country, been as yet declared an offence.

In short, the whole question resolves itself into this: It concerns lawgivers to make their laws agreeable to the general sense of the community. If they fail in doing this, they have failed in performing their duty to the public which they represent, and the public is entitled to think and say so. Petition and remonstrance have hitherto been the methods constitutionally allowed to the community, of expressing this sense; but these having apparently been found of slow and uncertain efficacy, a new method, infinitely more powerful, has been struck out by the exigencies of the time—the method of passive opposition. Like all new things in politics, this may carry with it some alarm. But yet no man can well express alarm at any such thing, without tacitly avowing a doctrine which all parties seem now to have abandoned—that public opinion, as residing in the majority, is not to be trusted to or respected. Where public opinion takes such a shape, it is obvious that it is both the duty and the interest of governments to yield—that, in fact, a continuance in the same course is impossible, or can only be persisted in with great danger. In a well-regulated state like Great Britain, where the mass of the community instantaneously forms a correct judgment of every public measure and movement, it will always be found that good laws execute themselves by the mere favour of popular approval—while no existing force or power will carry a bad one into permanent and steady execution.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS.

(From July 23 to August 20, inclusive.)

1. IRISH CHURCH REFORM.—On Tuesday (July 23), the House of Lords again sat in committee on this bill. Upon the 33d clause (for reducing the number of the bishops) being read, the Duke of Wellington moved, as an amendment, that the clause be altered so as to give his Majesty power to grant the sees to be abolished to the other bishops in commendam, and to place the temporalities of the church in the charge of commissioners.—The amendment was resisted by Earl Grey, Lord Plunkett, and Lord Brougham, as rendering the bill good for nothing, as the bishoprics would not thereby be abolished, but left open to be filled up by a future King and Ministry, should they think proper to do so.—Lords Harrowby, Wicklow, and Rosse; Bishops of Exeter, and Bath and Wells; Duke of Cumberland and others, supported the proposed amendment.—Upon a division, there appeared a majority against it of 14; the numbers being—For, 76; against, 90.—On Wednesday (July 24), all the clauses to the 78th were agreed to with scarcely any discussion.—On Thursday, clauses 79 to 116 were agreed to after some trifling amendments.—Upon clause 117, which gives power to the commissioners to suspend livings where there has been no service for three years, and to appropriate the revenue, being read, two amendments were successively proposed; one by Lord Wynford, which was withdrawn; the second by the Archbishop of Canterbury, which proposed to give the power of suspending to the bishop of the diocese, and that the profits of the suspended benefices should be applied to the building of churches and glebes.—The Bishop of London could not agree to the clause as it stood.—The Earl of Limerick protested against giving a power to the laity which naturally belonged to the clergy.—Earl Grey and the Marquis of Lansdowne strenuously resisted the amendment, at considerable length.—The house then divided, when the amendment was carried against Ministers by a majority of 2; the numbers being—For, 84; against, 82.—The further consideration of the bill was then, on the motion of Earl Grey, postponed, “in order to enable Ministers to decide what course should be pursued."

—Next day, Friday (July 26), upon the motion for the house again going into committee, Earl Grey rose and stated the determination of Ministers respecting the decision against them on the previous night. Upon mature consideration, they did not consider the amendment as one of great importance; and although he thought the bill would have been better without it, he would not oppose its adoption farther. He was resolved to conduct this important measure to as successful an issue as possible.—All the remaining clauses of the bill, some postponed clauses, and the schedules, were then agreed to, without any observations.—Upon the report being brought up on Monday (July 29), the Earl of Winchelsea said that he had not followed the bill into committee, being so decidedly opposed to every part of it, that his doing so would have been a mockery. But even at this late stage he would make an effort to defeat it, and would therefore move that the report be read that day six months.—After a reply from Earl Grey, the house divided.—For the motion, 30; against it, 68. Ministerial majority, 38.—On the motion of the Duke of Wellington, an amendment was agreed to, to the effect that the lay members of the commission should all declare themselves of the established religion. Another suggestion by his Grace was moved as an amendment by Earl Grey, and agreed to—namely, that ten livings, not exceeding £800 a-year each, should be appropriated to the junior fellows of Dublin University.—The report was then agreed to.—On the following evening (Tuesday, July 30), on being brought up for the third reading, the measure was once more opposed by Lord Eldon, Earl Longford, Lord Ellenborough, Duke of Gloucester, Earl of Haddington, and Duke of Buckingham, the latter of whom moved that it be read a third time that day six months.—Their lordships then divided on the question, that the bill be now read a third time, when there appeared—Contents present, 70; proxies, 65—135. Not contents present, 50; proxies, 31—81. Majority for the third reading, 54.—The bill was then passed.

2. SHORT PARLIAMENTS.—On Tuesday (July 23), after the presentation of a petition from Stirling in favour of triennial parliaments, by Mr Gillon, Mr Tennyson rose to move for leave to bring in a bill for shortening the duration of parliaments. He remarked, that, since the passing of the septennial act of 1716, a general corruption had spread itself both among the constituency and the representative body; and he would venture to say, that, at the present moment, there was an almost universal desire that the term of seven years should be abridged. So long as septennial parliaments continued, no man, however honourable his intentions might be on first entering the house, could resist the influence which the Ministry can exert. In his (Mr Tennyson's) bill, he should leave the duration of parliaments to be fixed by the house.—Mr Hume seconded the motion: he declared himself strongly in favour of triennial parliaments.—Lord Althorp said, the period of the session chosen for introducing this question rendered it unnecessary for him to enter into any discussion upon it. He did not think the same necessity existed now for shortening parliaments as before the reform act. The people were now actually represented. He could see no advantage, moreover, by adopting the present motion at so late a period of the session, as there could not be time for discussing the question.—Mr Cobbett said, he would never be satisfied until the old English constitutional practice of annual parliaments was restored.—Sir E. Codrington would wish to limit parliaments to five years.—Sir S. Whalley and Mr Kennedy (Tiverton) supported the motion.—Lord John Russell said, that annual parliaments could not co-exist with our mixed monarchy, and only with a democratic republic. His lordship then stated various grounds for his conviction, that, with our constitution, a long duration of parliament was to be preferred. Such had always been his opinion. (Loud cries of hear, hear).—Mr Shiel and Dr Lushington supported the motion at considerable length.—Mr Stanley opposed the motion, and strongly urged the indiscretion of bringing forward motions of this nature, ere it was tried whether, under the reformed system, the people had or had not sufficient control over their representatives.—The motion was further supported by Gen. Palmer, Mr Robinson, Col. Evans, Mr Hawkins, Mr O'Connell, Major Beaucherk, and Sir R. Fergusson; and was opposed by Mr Gaskell and Lord Sandon.—And on a division, the numbers were—For the motion, 164; against it, 213. Majority against the motion, 49.

3. ANTI-SLAVERY BILL.—On Thursday (July 25), upon the House of Commons going into committee on this bill (which was read a second time without a division on Monday, 22), Mr Stanley, as stated in the Postscript to our last, intimated that government proposed to reduce the term of predial apprenticeships from twelve to seven years, and non-predial from seven to five.—Mr Buxton proposed to reduce the term of five to three, but his motion was rejected by a majority of 117.—Lord Howick wished half the grant of £20,000,000 to be reserved till the abolition was carried into complete effect.—Lord Althorp could not accede to the proposition.—Dr Lushington moved to insert in the bill a clause for the immediate emancipation, without restriction, of all slaves who may, at any time previous to the passing of this bill, have been brought, with the consent of their possessors, or may at any time after the passing of this bill, with like consent, be brought into any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.—This gave rise to some discussion, and the resolution was eventually carried.—On Monday (July 29), Mr F. Buxton moved, as an amendment to the 10th clause, "that no apprentice should be removed from one colony to another, after the passing of this act, without the consent of the said apprentice, given and recorded in writing, before and by two justices of the peace."—Sir F. Burdett fully concurred in what had fallen from the honourable member.—After some observations from Mr Rigby Wason, Mr Gordon, and Mr Ewing, in support of the amendment, the clause, as amended, was ordered to stand part of the bill.—Several other clauses were agreed to, and the House resumed.—On Tuesday (30), Mr Stanley moved that the 25th clause (granting the £20,000,000) be now read.—Sir E. Wilmot rose for the purpose of moving an amendment of which he had given notice, that the sum of £15,000,000 be substituted for £20,000,000. He opposed the grant of £20,000,000 on two grounds; first, because the covenant agreed on by the resolution for the immediate abolition of negro slavery was not complied with; and, secondly, because the additional £5,000,000, proposed to be given to obtain the concurrence of the West India body, had failed to produce the effect intended.—An animated discussion ensued on this motion, which was adjourned to the following day (Wednesday, 31). It was then renewed with great spirit; but the amendment, upon a division, was lost by a majority of 51. The other clauses of the bill were then agreed to.—On Friday (August 2), upon the report of the bill being brought up, Lord Althorp moved, that any part of the sum of £20,000,000, that might be raised, previous to the next session of Parliament, should be raised on annuities payable for 100 years.—Mr Herries objected entirely to the proposition. He urged the committee to keep the management of these twenty millions in their own hands.—Sir R. Vyeyan, Mr Hume, and Lord Sandon, supported Lord Althorp's motion, which was finally acceded to.—On Monday (August 5), the house again sat in committee on the report, when several proposed amendments were adopted, and others rejected.—Lord Althorp brought up four clauses providing for the raising of the grant of £20,000,000. He observed that it had been suggested to introduce a proviso, enacting that no money should be raised under the act, except during the sitting of Parliament; and farther, that the terms of the contract should be laid on the table. He saw no objection to this.—Mr Hume thought the house ought to know the plan of providing for the interest.—Lord Althorp said he had frequently before stated that the mode contemplated was by a tax on colonial produce. Three clauses, empowering the commissioners for the management of the national debt to raise the loan in question in the shape of annuities, and specifying the manner in which the operation was to be conducted, were then brought up, read, and agreed to.—On Wednesday (August 7), the bill was read a third time.—Mr Wilks moved a clause, by way of rider, providing that apprenticed labourers should not be compelled to work on Sundays, and that they should be permitted to attend such places of worship as they pleased, which, after some remarks from Mr Stanley, &c., was agreed to, and added to the bill.—The bill being then passed, Mr Secretary Stanley and other members took it to the Lords forthwith, where it was read a first time, and ordered for a second reading on the ensuing Monday.—On that day (August 12), the Duke of Wellington presented a petition from certain annuitants on West India property, praying to be heard by counsel against the bill. His Grace, Lord Wynford, and the Earl of Rosslyn, strongly advocated the common justice of complying with the request; but the motion was negatived without a division.—Lord Colville, and the Earl of Belmore (late governor of Jamaica), argued that the bill, especially that part of it relating to apprenticeships, was utterly impracticable.—The Duke of Wellington reiterated his conviction to the same effect. The bill was moreover a direct infraction of the acts 18th and 52d George III.; which not only relinquished, on the part of the Imperial Parliament, the right to tax the colonies, but also secured to the colonial legislatures the right to legislate exclusively for the internal affairs of the colonies.—Lord Brougham defended the bill at great length, and combated the statements that the negro would not willingly work when free.—After several other noble lords had spoken, the bill was read a second time without a division.—On Wednesday (August 14), the house went into committee on the bill. Upon the reading of clause third, which provides "that all slaves brought at any time previously to the passing of the act, with the consent of their possessors, into the United Kingdom, and all apprenticed labourers hereafter with the like consent brought, should, after the passing of the act, be free," the Duke of Wellington said he feared the clause would have a retrospective effect, and moved as an amendment, that it should apply to such persons only as were in England, or the free British dominions, with consent of their owners at the time of, or after, the passing of the act.—Lord Brougham said the object of the clause was to give the negro as clear a right (if it should please his Majesty to give him a title to a seat) to sit in that house as either of the illustrious dukes now in his eye—whether the noble duke (Wellington), who was illustrious by his deeds, or the illustrious duke (Cumberland), who was merely "illustrious" by the courtesy of the house.—The Duke of Cumberland here rose to order. He could not conceive the meaning of this wanton attack upon him, seeing that he had not spoken one word on this question in committee.—Lord Brougham, with the most vehement tone and gesture exclaimed it was the illustrious duke himself who was out of order in interrupting him (Lord Brougham).—After this altercation ceased, the house divided, where the amendment was rejected by a majority of 23 to 12.—On the 22d clause being read, a proviso was added, on the motion of the Earl of Ripon, to provide negro apprentices having arms, or serving in the militia.—On Thursday, the committee resumed its sittings, when, after much discussion, all the remaining clauses were agreed to as framed, and the report ordered for Monday the 19th.—On that day, the bill was read a third time and passed, with an adopted amendment, proposed by the Duke of Wellington enabling the planters to remove slaves from one estate to another in the same island. Various other motions and amendments were negatived.

4. SUGAR REFINING.—On Wednesday (July 24) Mr Clay moved the following resolution:—"That it is expedient that foreign sugar be immediately admitted into this country for the purpose of being refined for exportation." He supported it in a speech of great length, in which he described the ruinous effects brought upon the refining trade by the prohibition of foreign sugars. In 1818, when foreign sugars were admitted for refining, 711,000 cwt. had been exported; in 1833, this great business had dwindled down to an export of 135,000 cwt. in the two first quarters of the year. In 1830, there were 234 pa. at work in the metropolis; in 1833, only 70. From this it would appear how much the refining trade suffered from this state of things. The country, large, moreover, suffered great injustice from it. We were paying from 7s. to 9s. per cwt. more for refined sugar than we need pay, if foreign sugars were admitted. He concluded by saying he had couched his resolution in general terms, so as to leave the proving of the machinery to the discretion of government.—Mr Ewart seconded the motion.—Lord Althorp, after reviewing the financial part of the question, concluded by saying, that, if Mr Clay would withdraw the word "immediately" from the resolution, he would not oppose it, unless he found, what he did not expect, that the West India interest had strong objections to the proposition.—Mr Margatt, Mr Bernal, and Lord Sandon, would not oppose Lord Althorp's moderate proposition.—Dr Lushington earnestly supported Mr Clay's resolution.—Mr Poulett Thompson said, he had prepared a bill for the purpose of allowing sugar in bond to be refined for exportation. He then laid on the table a full report of the experiments on sugar made by Dr Ure, at the desire of the government, during the last eighteen months; the result of which was, that it was clear, that, on West India as well as foreign sugars, a considerable bounty was given on exportation. Three experiments had been made on West India sugars, and the first, which was made from a necessary cause upon very indifferent sugar left in result that there was a bounty upon that description of sugar to the amount of 1s. 6d.; the second experiment left a bounty of 5s.; and the third left a bounty of 6s. on West India sugars. It was his (Mr Thompson's) firm conviction that the only means of settling the question would be to allow all sugars, whether British or foreign, to be refined in bond. He expressed hope that Mr Clay would consent to alter his motion to the following form:—"That it is expedient that sugar under lock be admitted for refining, for the purpose of exportation."—Mr Harvey, Mr Alderman Thompson, Mr Briscoe, and Colonel Torrens, congratulated Mr Clay on the success of his exertions, as the government had virtually conceded the point he required.—Mr Clay then withdrew his motion.—A bill, founded on Mr Thompson's resolution, has since been introduced, and carried through both houses without a word of discussion.—It was read a third time and passed in the House of Lords on Wednesday (Aug. 1).

5. EDINBURGH ANNUITY TAX.—In the House of Commons, on Friday (July 26), Mr Abercromby presented a petition from Edinburgh, signed by 9030 individuals, praying for the entire abolition of the annuity and impost taxes. Those taxes, he said, were the source of great discontent and bickerings between the clergy of Edinburgh and the inhabitants, and occasioned nearly as much ill feeling as existed in Ireland. He hoped that between this and the next session of Parliament, some measure would be considered with a view of adjusting and settling this question.—Mr A. Johnston observed, that the house probably was not aware of the painful situation in which the clergy of Edinburgh were placed. Their maintenance was secured to them by the tax complained of, by the law of the land; but a systematic passive resistance had been for some time acted up similar to that in Ireland, and the clergy had been latterly compelled to enforce their rights by prosecution and incarceration. Upwards of £11,000 of arrears of stipend were now due them. He regretted extremely that the Lord Advocate had abandoned this unhappy question, and recommended no provision for the present maintenance of the clergy, merely because ere happened to be some dispute among his constituents.—Mr Cobbett had hoped to hear what had come of a fund that had been raised to pay the clergy of Edinburgh, but nothing was said about it. He understood that about one thousand of the richest persons in Edinburgh were exempted from payment of these taxes, and the rest of the inhabitants very justly complained that they should be required to pay them. He certainly bore testimony, however, to the excellent conduct of the clergy of Edinburgh.—Mr Abercromby had omitted to say any thing about the fund alluded to by the hon. member for Oldham, solely because he did not wish to enter into the merits of the case at present. If he had entered into the merits, he could state where it was alleged—not where it had actually one—but where it was alleged to have gone. He would take another opportunity of moving for certain returns connected with the subject, which would show what had become of the funds.—[These returns have since been moved for, and an order has been made on the magistrates by the Secretary of State to furnish the following:—1. Return of fines levied by the magistrates of Edinburgh from the shore-dues of seith, for behoof of the clergy of Edinburgh, for 20 years previous to 1809, and how applied. 2. Return of the amount of the annuity tax collected by the magistrates for same period, and by what authority, and how applied. 3. Return of church seat-rents collected during the same period. 4. Return of stipends paid to the clergy during the same period, and what sum, if any, remained over after paying the clergy during the same period, at 1809, and how applied.]

6. EAST INDIA CHARTER BILL.—On Friday (July 6), this bill was read a third time in the House of Commons, and passed, after the addition of two provisions, proposed by Mr C. Grant, one of which was, "that the governor-general shall be empowered to apply such sums as may be deemed necessary for maintaining church communion in India, for other acts as well as for the English and Scotch." The other was, "that nothing contained in this act shall prevent the company from granting to communities, not being of the church of England, such sums as may be necessary for education or public worship."—This bill has also passed through the House of Lords without any alteration or addition, excepting a clause introduced at the suggestion of the Marquis of Lansdowne, providing "that no proceedings should be adopted by the governor-general and council towards the final abolition of slavery in India, until such proceeding shall have been submitted to, and approved of, by his Majesty's government at home, as well as by the board of directors." The bill was read a third time on Friday (August 16), but its final passage was postponed till Monday 19, at the request of Lord Ellenborough. No alteration, however, was made on the latter day, and the bill was passed.

7. BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.—Mr O'CONNELL AND THE REPORTERS.—On Thursday (July 25), Mr O'Connell moved that Mr Clement, proprietor of the Morning Chronicle, do attend at the bar to-morrow, to answer for a breach of privilege in publishing the debates of that house; and he should follow up that motion with moving that the printer of the Times also do attend the bar. He confessed that the object of his motion was because the paper alluded to had not published his speeches in full [in other words, that the breach of privilege was not large enough]. He had procured from the stamp-office a list of the journal proprietors of the metropolis, and he should wage war with them all till he defeated them. He would move day by day for their appearance at the bar of the house for breach of privilege.—This led to an extended discussion, in which members on both sides of the house bore testimony to the general impartiality and fidelity of the debates; and, at the instance of Sir R. Peel, who urged that the motion was calculated to increase rather than diminish difficulties, Mr O'Connell consented to withdraw his motion till Thursday ensuing.—On the following evening (Friday 26), however, he again brought the subject before the house, in consequence, he said, of a letter in the Times of that morning, signed by the reporters, in which they refused to report him unless he apologized for having spoken what was true. He alluded to the circumstance of his speech on the Irish poor laws having been summed up in eighteen lines and a half, and moved that Mrs Anna Brodie, J. J. Lawson, and J. W. Lawson, should be called to the bar of the house on Monday.—Mr Hume seconded the motion.—Mr H. Curteis put it to the gallantry of the honourable and learned mover, whether he would call a lady to the bar. (Laughter, and cries of hear!) The lady named in the motion was the widow of a clergyman, and resided at Eastbourne.—Mr O'Connell: "I will let the lady off."—Sir M. W. Ridley, Mr C. Fergusson, and Lord Althorp, supported the motion, which was then carried.—On Monday (July 29), accordingly, Mr O'Connell moved that the Messrs Lawson, printers and publishers of the Times, should be called to the bar of the house.—Mr Mc-thuen moved that the order be discharged. He protested against the house being drawn in as a party in a private dispute of one of its members. Mr O'Connell complained of the partial system of reporting, but none had profited more than he had by this partiality. The Tralee Mercury reported his speeches exclusively; and three Dublin papers had throughout the session reported them without giving the triumphant replies of Mr Stanley. With respect to the reporters, he did not mean to justify them for the course they had pursued, but human nature was frail; and he put it to any gentleman whether the charge made by Mr O'Connell against the reporters, of being guilty of "deliberate falsehood," was not one calculated to rouse all the feelings of a man, as well as of a gentleman? He had made inquiry into the characters of those gentlemen who usually acted as reporters, and he had every reason to believe that they were gentlemen of education; many of them were studying for the bar; and there were instances, and proud instances, of some of them having risen to the highest honours of the state.—A desultory discussion of great length ensued, in which between twenty and thirty members spoke, all in deprecatory terms of Mr O'Connell's motion, which was at last negatived, on a division, by a majority of 153 to 48.—Upon this, Mr O'Connell moved that the gallery be cleared, which, of course, was done, and the house proceeded with closed doors for the rest of the night.—Mr Robinson then gave notice of a motion for Tuesday, for suspending the standing order which excludes strangers. [This notice was afterwards withdrawn, as Mr O'Connell desisted from closing the gallery. The reporters have since published a manifesto, to the effect, that they will not "for another moment embarrass or inconvenience the proceedings of the high-minded and independent body of gentlemen who constitute the House of Commons, by refusing to report the speeches of any member."]

8. JEWISH DISABILITIES BILL.—On Thursday (August 1), this measure was, on the motion for its second reading, rejected by the House of Lords, by a majority of 104 to 54.—Earl Grey, it is stated by the Spectator newspaper, absented himself on this occasion, from a desire that the measure might not be reckoned a Ministerial one.

9. DRAMATIC PERFORMANCES BILL.—This bill was thrown out of the House of Lords on Friday (August 2), by a majority of 19 to 15.

10. REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURE.—On Tuesday (July 30), Mr C. Buller moved the following resolution:—"That it is the opinion of this house, that in order to satisfy the just expectations of the people, it is necessary that such extensive reductions be made in the public expenditure as shall effectually diminish the burdens of the country; and that it is the duty of his Majesty's Ministers to make such arrangements previous to the next session of Parliament, respecting the effective and non-effective services of the military, naval, civil, and colonial establishments, as may be necessary for the attainment of this object."—Lord Althorp moved as an amendment upon this another resolution, to the effect, "That, while this house acknowledges with satisfaction, that, by the reduction of the public expenditure, and by the financial arrangements carried into effect, there has been a reduction of taxation in the last and the present session to an amount exceeding £3,000,000 annually, they feel it their duty to affirm the determination to which they have already come, to adhere to the just principles of wise economy, and to apply those principles to all departments of the state, paying a due regard to all the national engagements, and to the interests of the public service."—Lord Althorp's amendment, after a short discussion, was agreed to without a division.

11. BANK CHARTER BILL.—On Friday (August 2), this bill was, after considerable opposition, read a second time.—Lord Althorp stated his intention to introduce a clause to oblige branch banks to pay their own notes, which would ensure their always having a quantity of bullion on hand.—On Friday (August 9), upon the motion that the house go into committee on the bill, a long preliminary discussion ensued on Mr Gisborne moving as an amendment that it be taken into consideration six months thereafter. He argued at great length against the proposed monopoly of the bank.—Sir Henry Parnell objected strongly to tying up the hands of Parliament for the length of ten years, and then proceeded to point out how beneficially a free trade in banking would operate in this country. He would advise that the charter be renewed for three years only.—Lord Althorp said he had at one time been favourable to a free trade in banking, but since investigating the subject more closely, he had completely altered his opinion.—Mr Fayer, Mr Cobbett, Mr Attwood, &c., opposed the bill.—Upon a division, Mr Gisborne's motion was thrown out by a majority of 119 to 40.—The house accordingly went into committee, when the five first clauses, including that by which £5 Bank of England notes are made a legal tender, were carried, after several divisions on proposed amendments.—Lord Althorp stated, in answer to a question by Mr Clay, that, with the exception of one alteration, [it was not the intention of the government to diminish what were termed the exclusive privileges of the bank. The exception to which he referred was, that joint-stock banks, without the distance of sixty-five miles, should be allowed to draw for sums under £50. The privilege of the bank in this respect it was his wish to do away with. As to the subject of the number of partners in private banks within sixty-five miles of London, his opinion had certainly been very different to what it now was. He certainly thought that the bank had a power over these establishments, which, on looking into the act, and taking the opinion of the law officers of the crown, he found it did not possess—he meant that as banks of deposit they could only consist of six partners. That there might not, therefore, be any doubt on this subject for the future, it was his intention to introduce a declaratory clause upon the subject.—Mr Gisborne: "Will the banks of deposit be empowered to accept bills?"—Lord Althorp: "No."—Two or three members: "Then no business can be carried on."—The debate was adjourned to next day, Saturday (10), when the remaining clauses (making 14 in all) were carried without any alteration, together with an additional declaratory clause relative to the establishment of banks with an unlimited number of partners within sixty-five miles of London.—Upon the report being brought up, on Monday (12), Lord Althorp moved the addition of the clause of which he had given notice, providing that the notes issued by branch banks should be payable in gold where they are issued, which was agreed to.—[The third reading of the bill has been postponed from night to night by Lord Althorp, until it has become rumoured that it will be allowed to stand over till next session. The Directors of the Bank of England complain in strong language of the departure which Lord Althorp had made from his bargain, and have passed resolutions declaratory of their dissatisfaction.]

12. ENGLISH TITHE COMMUTATION BILL.—On the motion of Lord Althorp, on Friday (August 2), this bill was ordered to be reported that day six months.

13. FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT.—In the House of Commons, on Tuesday (August 6), Mr J. A. Murray moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the 59th George III., commonly called the foreign enlistment act. No one act of the legislature had given greater dissatisfaction to the country, or was considered a greater stain upon its records, than this. He would maintain, that in a free state every man had a right, if he could not get employment in the service of his country, to seek for it in the service of foreign powers; and that gallant officers and brave soldiers, when their country did not want their services, had a perfect right to seek for glory and distinction in foreign lands. Was it not most unjust that gallant officers, who had gone abroad and added to the glory and distinction of their country, should be liable to be tried for a misdemeanour under this act of Parliament? (Hear.) The fact was, that this very law had given rise to almost all the complaints that had since been made against us as to breaches of neutrality. Were our soldiers to be kept, many of them, inactive and starving at home, instead of being allowed to seek for experience and glory abroad? Another objection to this measure was, that it was totally useless and inoperative.—Mr Cobbett defended the law as it stands.—Sir Robert Inglis objected to Mr Murray's proposition, that every man had a right to carry his courage, talents, and science, to whatever market he saw fit. So far from concurring in this proposition, he was of opinion that no man ought to engage in a war, or was at liberty to kill his fellow-man, except in the cause of his family, his country, or his religion. If the doctrines held by Mr Murray were good for any thing, the subjects of this country were justified in running the same race as the Buccaneers on sea, and the Condottieri on land.—Mr O'Connell said, the foreign enlistment act was inoperative—he knew so from experience. A man was justified in fighting for liberty, but not for religion. No doctrine had occasioned so many melancholy cruelties as that encouraging a contest for religion. Religion was not made to be fought for; and it had never been intended to mingle the cup of blood with the chalice of salvation.—Colonel Evans, Sir Edward Codrington, Mr Tynte, and Mr Robert Grant, supported the motion.—Sir James Scarlett had always opposed the foreign enlistment act, because it afforded no practical advantage. By the common law, it was an act of felony for a British subject, after the proclamation of his sovereign, to join the army of any acknowledged government; but this did not apply to revolted provinces; and hence it was, that, with regard to South America, complaints had been made by the Spanish Minister that the laws for the prevention of interference by British subjects were unequal. He should support the motion so far as it went to a restoration of the old common law of the land.—Lord Althorp thought the act was detrimental to the interests of the country.—The motion was then agreed to.—The bill has since been introduced, and passed through the Commons. It was read a third time on Thursday (August 15), without any comment.

14. IRISH TITHES.—On Monday (August 5), the house being in committee, Mr Littleton moved the following resolution:—"That his Majesty be enabled to direct Exchequer bills to an amount not exceeding £1,000,000, to be issued for the purpose of advancing, under certain conditions, the arrears of tithes due for 1831 and 1832, subject to a deduction of 25 per cent.; and the value of the tithes for 1833, subject to a deduction of 15 per cent., to such persons as may be entitled to such arrears or such tithes, and as may be desirous of receiving such advances; and that the amount advanced shall be included in the tithe composition, so as to be repaid in the course of five years, being payable by half-yearly instalments." He went into a long statement, to prove that the amount to be moved for was, as nearly as could be ascertained, the amount fairly due to the clergy for tithe during the ous discoveries relative to an extensive forgery of Bank of England notes. Some of the money-changers in the Palais Royal had transmitted to London a certain number of L.50 notes, supposed to be notes of the Bank of England. They were returned, cut in half, with the word "forged" stamped upon them in the usual way. Search was of course immediately made after the utterer of the forged notes, but for some time without success. About twelve days ago, however, a man of respectable appearance went into one of the money-changers' shops with twenty L.50 notes, purporting to be of the Bank of England, for which he required change in gold. The changer happening to be one of those who had suffered most by the late forgeries, immediately sent for the nearest commissary of police, to whom he gave the man in charge, on suspicion of uttering forged English notes. The man was examined, and search was made in the lodging of which he had given the address as being his own, where several other notes of a similar amount and description were found. The whole of the notes were proved to be forgeries, and the man was put in prison to take his trial for uttering and attempting to utter them. Some days after, a person calling himself a viscount, and wearing the cross of the legion of honour, waited on the prefect of the police, and said that he had heard of the circumstances of the man's arrest, and had come to bring an additional charge against him. The whole of the notes passed by him, and found on his person and at his lodgings, the viscount said had been stolen from himself. Those, and a very large quantity besides, the viscount said that he had himself forged, and had been keeping by him to use as a means of destroying the credit of the Bank of England at the next war between England and France. The prefect of the police, not being so much disposed to keep the secret of the viscount's patriotic intentions as the latter seemed to wish, instantly caused a search to be made at the place of his abode, where, in fact, several bundles of L.50 and other notes, purporting to be of the Bank of England, were found, as also every necessary material for making them. The whole of the notes and implements were of course seized, and the other day they were all produced before the Juge d'Instruction, where the viscount was also made to attend, in order to answer the inquiries necessary for the drawing up of the proces verbal. Some skilful typographers were also present, and they were desired to make experiments with the implements seized. The notes they drew proved such perfect imitations of those of the Bank of England, that in England itself it would have been hardly possible to distinguish them from genuine notes, much less in France. All the parties are bound to appear at the next assizes, but it is probable that the trial of the utterer will be deferred until the January assizes, as the Bank of England, who will probably be the prosecutor, wishes to make every possible inquiry into this extraordinary business, and, if possible, adopt such means as may put a stop to any such "patriotic" forgeries of its notes on the continent. One of the firm of the solicitors to the Bank of England has been sent to Paris for that purpose.—Paris Correspondent of the Times.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

The Globe (British ministerial paper) announces that all the important points of difference between these two countries are now settled, leaving only a few minor questions open.

The baptism of the infant crown prince of Belgium took place on Thursday, August 15. The ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of Malines, according to the forms of the Roman Catholic ritual, at the Cathedral Church, and in the presence of the Queen of France, who acted as godmother, and the Duke of Orleans, who represented his father, as godfather, the Belgian court, functionaries, and authorities. Nothing appears to have been left undone to give effect to the occasion, and it is described as having passed off with great clat.

The board of health at Hamburg has declared Rotterdam infected with cholera, and all the ports in South Holland suspected.

WEST INDIES.

ACCOUNTS from Jamaica, to June 30, represent that island to be in a state of dreadful ferment, in consequence of the promulgation of the Ministerial plan of emancipation. The slave population is in such a state of excitement; that the governor, Lord Mulgrave, alarmed at the aspect of matters, had issued a proclamation enjoining obedience to the laws, under the severest penalties. The slave-owners are also said to be in the last degree exasperated, and were giving vent to their feelings in the most bitter and acrimonious terms. At this time, however, only the first edition of the Ministerial plan had reached them; and it is probable that the substitution of a gift of L.20,000,000 for a loan of L.15,000,000, when they come to learn it, may tend to reconcile them somewhat to the measure. The great danger seems to be in restraining the feelings of the slaves themselves within peaceable bounds.

TURKEY.

THE Russian troops quitted the neighbourhood of Constantinople on the 2d July. The Egyptians at that time had nearly all marched out of the Sultan's territory, and Sir Pulteney Malcolm had sailed away from the Dardanelles. The Porte is, therefore, once more freed from the assistance and surveillance of her dear allies, and the fear of her rebellious Pacha. It is remarked, as not a little singular, that although a close treaty of alliance has been for some time contracted between Russia and the Porte, no notification of that circumstance has yet been sent to the other European powers.

SOUTH AMERICA.

In a late arrival from Mexico, accounts have been received of a treacherous attempt to produce a fresh revolution, by the seizure of the president, Santa Anna, in the beginning of June last. This plot was formed by the leaders of the old bigoted Spanish party, who inveigled Santa Anna into a conference, when they took him prisoner, and closely confined him, at a plantation near Cuantla. He soon contrived to make his escape; and thus the conspirators were defeated.

IRELAND.

The eastern wing of the Dublin customhouse stores was destroyed by fire on Saturday the 10th August. The fire broke out about one o'clock in the morning. The fire spread through the whole range of the stores with prodigious rapidity, and the efforts of the firemen and constant playing of the engines, which were speedily brought to the spot, were of no avail. About four o'clock the flames reached the whisky-store at the end next the north wall. More than five hundred puncheons of whisky were thrown into the dock. In rolling them out of the store, many were knocked against each other and burst, and many leaked in consequence of the heat. The spirits flowed upon the pavement, and soon becoming ignited, blazed in whirling sheets of flame higher than the roof of the building. A great quantity of whisky, which had flowed across the quay into the Liffey, took fire, and gave the river the appearance of a mass of flames. The vessels slipped their cables, and floated down the river. Many of the labourers and sailors employed in removing the whisky-puncheons, soon got very drunk with the liquor, which they caught by bucketfuls. It is believed that some of these men perished in the flames. About six o'clock, two pieces of cannon, which were sent for with the view of making a breach in the building, arrived; but it was then too late for them to be of any service. The greatest anxiety was felt during the whole time the fire was raging, lest it should reach the wine and spirit vaults below the building; but fortunately they escaped, and but little damage, as was subsequently discovered, was done to the wine by the heat. The building which was burnt fortunately stood apart; and as there was but little wind, and that from the westward, the customhouse itself was not endangered. The amount of property destroyed is not ascertained; it had been stated at half a million; but this is now considered to be an exaggerated estimate. The city of Dublin was most brilliantly illuminated; the crowd collected was immense, and the whole scene was amazingly grand and striking. By eight o'clock, the fire was extinguished for want of fuel. The immediate cause of this great burning has not been discovered.

Mr Nathaniel Sneyd, a well-known merchant of Dublin, and lately member for Cavan, was assassinated lately, in the middle of the day, by Mr John Mason, the son of a gentleman of respectability residing in Dawson Street. Mr Sneyd was returning from the bank, along Westmoreland Street, to his house in Sackville Street, when the assassin discharged a loaded pistol at his head. He fell immediately, and then received a second shot, and a violent blow from the butt-end of the pistol. Mason was secured by the sentries of the bank: he made no resistance or attempt to escape. He was soon examined at the police-office; but nothing was extracted from him, except his name and residence, and an avowal that to have shot either of Mr Sneyd's partners, Mr French or Mr Barton, would have answered his purpose equally well. He had no particular grudge against Mr Sneyd, but had resolved upon killing one of the concern eighteen months ago. There is some reason to think the man insane. Mr Sneyd died on the second day afterwards.

Several cases of malignant cholera have lately taken place in Dublin. Bride Street, Wood Street, and the line of Quay leading to Ringsend, it is said, have suffered most.

At the last Mayo assizes, a prisoner was indicted upon a charge, to substantiate which it became necessary to produce a donkey in court, as something turned upon its identity. The prisoner was convicted, and the very next day the unfortunate witness (the donkey) was found murdered by the roadside!

ENGLAND.

The King has ordered Virginia Water and the adjacent grounds to be open to the public in general.

A regular daily mail (Sunday excepted) has now been established between England and France.

The National Metropolitan Political Union of London has been dissolved. It is said all the Unions throughout the kingdom are in a state of decay.

In consequence of the retirement of Sir John Key from Parliament, under circumstances of a very unhappy nature (see our Parliamentary report), a vacancy lately occurred in the representation of London. Several candidates took the field, and more were spoken of, but these all gave way to Messrs Kemble and Crawford—the former a retired London merchant and a Tory, the latter a wealthy East India merchant and a Whig. Polling commenced on Wednesday (August 14), when Mr Crawford took the lead, and kept it, with an increasing majority, up to the last, when the numbers were—Mr Crawford, 4041; Mr Kemble, 2004. Majority for Mr Crawford, 2037. Mr Crawford is the same gentleman who was an unsuccessful candidate for Glasgow at the last election.

A private subscription has been entered into to erect a public monument to the late Sir John Malcolm, to be placed in Westminster Abbey. The Dukes of Wellington, Northumberland, and Buccleuch, have each subscribed L.100, Sir J. Graham, L.50, and the Pacha of Egypt, L.100.

During Dr Chalmers's late visit to London, his sermons preached for the National Scotch Church, gent's Square, procured towards its funds L.600, 11s. and there are, besides, received in donations L.700, including L.100 each from the Duke of Buccleuch, Marquis of Bute, and W. Brunton, Esq., and L.50 from Marquis of Abercorn.

The board of trade has organised an office for the ranging of statistical returns. Its chief object is the preparation of an annual volume, showing the revenue, population, commerce, &c. of the United Kingdom and its dependencies. The first compilation, including from 1820 to 1831, has already been published. Such a must prove of the greatest practical utility.

A public meeting was held, on the 27th July, at the City of London Tavern, the Duke of Sussex in the chair, for the purpose of determining on the most appropriate manner of manifesting their admiration of the conduct of Admiral Napier, and of expressing in some substantial form their approbation of the late exploit of that gallant officer. Various resolutions were passed expressive of approbation of his conduct, and a subscription opened for the purpose of purchasing some honourable testimonial to be presented to Admiral Napier.

The obituary of the week announces the death of Doctor Fly, confessor to the king's household. A Protestant divine has, it seems, been holding the office of receiving the emoluments of a Popish priest, in household of the Protestant king of a Protestant people.—Spectator, Aug. 17.

Upwards of L.1400 have been subscribed towards erecting a monument in St Paul's Cathedral, to record the worth and talents of Dr Babington, the father of London physicians.

The late Mr Wilberforce was buried in Westminster Abbey, on Saturday, Aug. 3. The funeral procession moved from Cadogan Place, accompanied by an immense crowd of people, who flanked it on either side, to the Abbey. When it reached Westminster Hall, it was joined by a considerable number of Peers, and about a hundred and fifty members of the House of Commons, all dressed in deep mourning. The pall-bearers were, on one side, Lord Brougham, Mr Manners Sutton, Lord Bexley, the Marquis of Westminster; on the other, Mr Charles Grant, Sir Robert Inglis, Mr William Smith, and the Duke of Gloucester, who, according to etiquette, was the last on the extreme right. The procession of the Peers, they entered the Abbey, was headed by the Dukes of Sussex and Wellington; then followed the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Chichester, and others. When the coffin was lowered into the grave, the Duke of Sussex, Gloucester, and Wellington, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lords Brougham, Lansdowne, Rosslyn Althorp, Auckland, and others, formed a circle round the grave is close to the tombs of Fox, Pitt, and Canning. Upon the coffin-lid is this inscription—"William Wilberforce, Esquire. Born 24th August 1759. Died 29th July 1833."

At the Globe Inn, Mill Bridge, near Halifax, lately a weaver named Mills sold his wife for 5s. to her mother!

As Mr William Ratcliffe was returning from Tetbury, on Monday evening last, on horseback, before reaching Stroud he fell asleep. On approaching the new building, near the George Inn, where an inclined scaffolding had been erected for wheeling the material to its summit, his horse mistook the road, and actually ascended the scaffolding to the height of thirty-two feet, when Mr Ratcliffe suddenly awoke, sensible to the horrors of his situation. Assistance was immediately procured for the rescue of the horse, but before it could be removed, it unfortunately fell over the precipice, and was killed upon the spot. Mr Ratcliffe providentially escaped unhurt.—Gloucestershire Chronicle.

Restrictions on Trade.—The injurious effects of restricting the free buying and selling of commodities between one country and another, have just been manifested in the following transactions mentioned in the Spectator of August 3:—"A few days since, an underwriter in the city actually insured a cargo of Dantzic timber from Dantzic to Halifax, in North America, and thence to Portsmouth. The premium of insurance was no less than five guineas per cent.; had the course of the vessel which was to carry the timber been a direct one from Dantzic to Portsmouth, it would only have been fifteen shillings. In addition to the higher rate of premium—more than five instead of three quarters per cent.—all the other costs of transportation, the unloading and reloading of the cargo at Halifax, and the loss of interest, owing to the length of time during which the purchaser would be out of his money, are to be taken into account. Still, Baltic timber is so much better and cheaper than Canadian, that it is a good speculation to obtain it in the roundabout way. The Canadians, therefore, are, in fact, deprived of the apparent advantages of their monopoly. The French commercial code contains, probably, as many absurd provisions as the English. In illustration of this also, we happen to be furnished with an actual case, the same date as the other. A merchant in Havre was desirous of purchasing some indigo from a brother dealer in London. Well, it may be said, he sent the order, and the indigo was shipped forthwith. No such thing: the London merchant shipped the indigo to New York, with instructions to re-ship it from that port to Havre, as the enormous duty upon it, if shipped from a British port would have rendered the transaction a losing one. The insurance, owing to the indirect mode of conveyance was thirty shillings per cent.; had the indigo been sent direct from London to Havre, it would have been about five shillings. In this case, also, there were, of course, immense additional shipping charges, freight, and other outlays of money."

Passive Opposition to the Assessed Taxes.—On Monday the 12th ult. considerable excitement was manifested at Hull, on its being announced by Mr Noble, printer, bookseller, and news-agent, by a placard posted general ut the town, that property seized from him for re-ing to pay assessed taxes, would that morning be atpted to be sold, by auction, at the Exchange sale-ns. It was generally supposed that Mr Hyde, the ioneer, being a respectable man, would refuse to sell property. In that, however, they were mistaken—Hyde pleaded ignorance as to their having been seized, observed, that having made entry of them, he must for them for sale. By ten o'clock, the time announced the sale, the rooms were crowded almost to suffocath, as also the adjacent court and passage, by trades-n and shopkeepers generally, all firmly determined to purchase at any price. The goods seized were elegant portable writing-desks and two sets of books.

The auctioneer had announced the conditions of sale, Mr Noble addressed the persons assembled, in an equent and impassioned speech, relative to the taxes payment of which his goods were now seized. Impasse cheering followed this address, and the sale commenced. The first article offered was a portable desk—biddings; but, just as the auctioneer was about to the lot, a voice from the midst of the crowd faintly amed out, "five shillings." Every eye was turned the place where the sound came from, and the whole nary was, "Who is he? turn him out," &c., when it ved to be Lee, a constable, and the person to whom warrant was entrusted to seize the property. The ans and execrations were now perfectly deafening;
this individual persisted in his determination, and it knocked down to him at a quarter the cost price.
a second being offered, he was again the bidder purchaser: after this, the people would bear it no lger, and the rest of the lots were passed without his ing the courage to be again the purchaser. It does appear that the attempt to sell was farther persisted in and Mr Noble left the auction-rooms amidst the ers and congratulations of the assembled multitude.
A melancholy accident took place, on Monday, August off Scarborough. On the James Watt heaving in st, on its way to Leith from London, Mr Johnstone, ector of customs at Hull, with five other passengers, luggage, and nine dogs, put off in a boat to go on
ard. The sea was very rough, and just as the boat ue alongside of the packet, the latter gave a sudden ch, came upon the boat, and striking her with the idle-box, completely upset her. All the persons in boat were saved except Mr Johnstone, who was taken floating with his face downwards. An inquest on his ly was held, and the jury returned the following verdict:—"We find that the deceased came to his death the accidental upsetting of the coble, caused by the ching of the packet." We wish to express our dissafaction at the conduct of the captain of the packet, in coming nearer shore for the purpose of taking in passengers; and we lay a dead and of L.20 on the packet."
We trust that this rebuke will do something towards recting what has been long desired by the public—the arkation and disembarkation of passengers without aid of small boats. At both Newhaven and Leith, it eldom that the large steam-vessels can come alongside quays, notwithstanding the immense sums which have been lavished on harbours and piers.]

Lamentable fate of Dr Dixon, the African Traveller.— Letter, received from Cape Coast Castle, dated April gives the following account of this catastrophe:—
Dixon was proceeding through the interior of Africa, in the Dahomey coast, to meet Captain Clapperton and his companions at Katunga. The king into whose ritory he was about to enter from Dahomey, having orn to afford him protection and assistance, came out his principal town to meet him, attended by his sons d chiefs, and desired his eldest son to swear fidelity to e stranger, after the fashion of the country. This is ne by drawing a sabre, and making a long harangue, ing the most violent gestures, and pushing the sword the face of the person in whose favour the oath is en; in fact, they show their dexterity by cutting close the face, without actually touching it. Dr Dixon un-tunately mistook the nature of the ceremony, and inking the king's son meant to kill him, drew his ord, and thrust it into his body. The doctor would ve been sacrificed on the spot, but the king ordered m to be safely guarded, declaring that he could not eak his oath, though his son had been killed. The ext morning Dr Dixon was sent on his journey, under e protection of an escort, but the instant they passed e boundaries of the king's dominions, thinking the ng's oath no longer binding, they fell on the doctor d killed him.

Improved Microscopes.—Many of our readers are peraps not aware that immense improvements have recent-been made on microscopes, chiefly through the agency certain gases. A greatly improved hydro-oxygen miroscope, by Messrs Holland and Joyce, which is at pre-nt exhibiting in London, magnifies two million and a lf times, or two millions of times beyond the highest wers of former instruments. It likewise exhibits opaque jects in their natural colours, and with a sufficient de-ee of distinctness to render the instrument available to e discovery of their exterior construction. But the capabilities of the instrument in this respect are not yet lly developed; the highest power which has been itherto directed to the display of opaque objects being irty-five thousand. Some seeds were exhibited, which appeared like solid objects resting on a dark background, rather suspended in space; those in the centre of the sc being most strongly defined. Experiments are gong on with a view to render the powers of the instrument omparatively as efficient for opaque as transparent obets. The disc contains 254 square feet, and is 18 feet diameter, being twice that of either of the others.
he instrument is not achromatic, however. It exhibited lea under the power of 2,500,000, magnified to litely the size of an elephant; and though only a semi-transparent object, it seemed as vivid and distinct as when en under a power of only 500,000 through the other struments. There would seem to be no limits to the arvels of the microscope.

Mismanagement of the Poor.—Defoe's observations on the tendency of employing the poor in workhouses are unanswerable, and constitute the staple of all the arguments subsequently employed on the same subject.
"Suppose now," says he, "a workhouse for the employment of poor children sets them to spinning of worsted. For every skein of worsted these poor children spin, there must be a skein the less spun by some poor family that spun it before. To set poor people at work on the same thing that other poor people were employed on before, and at the same time not increasing the consumption, is giving to one what you take away from another; enriching one poor man to starve another; putting a vagabond in an honest man's employment, and putting his diligence on the tenters, to find out some other work to maintain his family." He considers the improvidence of the poor a principal cause of their wretchedness.
"We are," says this shrewd observer, "the most lazy diligent nation in the world. There is nothing more frequent than for an Englishman to work till he has got his pocket full of money, and then go and be idle, or perhaps drunk, till it is all gone. I once paid six or seven men together on a Saturday night, the least ten shillings, and some thirty shillings, for work, and have seen them go with it directly to the alehouse, lie there till Monday, spend it every penny, and run in debt to boot, and not give a farthing of it to their families, though all of them had wives and children. From hence come poverty, parish charges, and beggary."—History of the Middle and Working Classes.

Caution to Mothers.—Effects of Maternal Excitement on the Health of Infants.—In the report of Mr Wardrop's Lecture on Surgical Operations, published in the Lancet, it is stated, "The only circumstance of importance to be particularly attended to, when operating on an infant, is the management of the nurse. I am convinced, that, in many cases where operations on infants have proved fatal, the death has been caused by changes produced in the nurse's milk, in consequence of the mental agitation which, as you may suppose, is often produced in the mind either of the nurse or the mother, when an operation on her young charge becomes necessary. I have seen several remarkable instances of this kind, and similar cases are recorded by authors. The first case, which came under my own notice, took place some years ago in an infant from whom I had removed a small, very hard tumour, which was situated behind the ear. No fever or inflammation supervened; and after suppuration had been established, and the wound was granulating in the most healthy manner, the child died suddenly of convulsions. On inquiry, I found that the mother had been thrown into a violent fit of passion late at night, and that she suckled her infant soon afterwards, immediately subsequent to which the fatal convulsions succeeded. In another instance, I was sent for in great haste to see an infant in a convulsive fit, and, on inquiry, found that the nurse who was employed to suckle her infant had been guilty of some misconduct, for which she had been severely reprimanded. Soon after this mental agitation the infant was suckled by her, and that occurrence was followed by the convulsive attack referred to. The late Sir Richard Croft, who had the immediate care of this child, informed me that he had frequently known similar cases, and that all the mischief was to be attributed to the pernicious effects which moral excitement produces on the milk of the nurse—an effect with which, in some degree, every one is familiar. Mr North, in his treatise on the 'Convulsions of Infants,' makes allusion to this circumstance, and has mentioned examples of it.
Ever since the occurrence of the cases now mentioned,
I have considered it of great importance to arrange, previous to an operation on an infant, how the nursing was afterwards to be conducted, and have taken care that neither the mother nor the hired nurse should be agitated by the screams of the child, or that, if they be at all alarmed by them, the child shall not be allowed to suckle until all effects of such agitation have ceased."

CHOLERA.

This malady has re-appeared in London, and other parts of Great Britain. Cases began to show themselves in the metropolis about the beginning of July, and have since continued steadily to increase in number. For instance, one week the number of deaths was 84; the week following, 162; and the one subsequent to that (ending Aug. 17), there were 386. Bermondsey, the Borough, Westminster, Whitechapel, Bethnal Green, and Marylebone, have all suffered more or less, and some of them very severely. In some districts, fever is beginning to show itself, which has been repeatedly observed to precede or accompany the cessation of cholera.
Government have appointed inspectors to report the state of the different districts daily. Among the deaths, we observe that of Lady Charlotte Berkeley, sister of the Duke of Richmond, K.G., and wife of the Hon. F. Berkeley, one of the lords of the Admiralty. Her ladyship was seized with malignant cholera on Sunday evening, 15th August, and, notwithstanding every medical assistance, expired at twenty minutes before nine, on Monday.
The disease has likewise broken out at Manchester; but the victims have, as usual, been all of the lowest and most dissipated class.

INNOCENT PLEASURES FOR THE PEOPLE.

The Public Walks Committee have recommended the appropriation of three sites to the purpose of recreation in the neighbourhood of London—namely, Copenhagen Fields; Bonner's Fields, Hackney; and Mill Walk, Poplar.
They also advise the formation of a public walk round Kennington Common, and deprecate the projected enclosure of Primrose Hill, which they wish to be kept open for the public. We hail this recommendation as the first act of government for the sole benefit of the people. Whatever improvements have hitherto been made, have been less for the general good than for the gratification of royal pleasure and caprice, or the convenience of government or of influential individuals. In no free state have the wants and comforts of the people at large been so little considered by the legislature. One of the things which contribute most to the contentment of nations under despotic governments, is the paternal regard had to their comforts in the matter of recreation.
Numerous small enjoyments make up a great sum of happiness. The majority of the people are less sensible of political evils than of social and public gratifications. As some petty act of oppression or vexatious fiscal exaction is often the exciting cause of popular resistance, so is some apparently small addition to the common means of enjoyment more valued than a far more important privilege. It denotes consideration for their comfort, and, as such, disposes the people to loyalty and contentment.

The great masses of wealth, and the general prosperity of this country, have rendered the middle classes more independent of government in this respect; but the working and poorer classes are but small sharers in the luxuries of recreation.—Spectator.

MANY THINGS IN FEW WORDS.

Mr Crawford, the recently appointed member for the city of London, is of Scottish parentage; his father kept a circulating library at Brighton, and he owes his rise in the world to his own active exertions.—A soldier has been condemned to be hanged at Lancaster, for having shot his corporal in a fit of passion, at Manchester.—Four young men have been drowned by the upsetting of their boat, betwixt Southend and Sheerness, at the mouth of the Thames.—The carpet trade at Kidderminster is very busy; the silk market is firm, and tallow is brisk.—This harvest, the lowlands of Scotland have been overrun with Irish; and the poor Highlanders, who came later, have got little or no employment; the Highland Society would do a good turn if they would let the poor class of Highlanders know every year when the harvest was ready for the sickle.—A fisherman, his two sons, and three nephews, have been drowned in the Moray Firth, by the wrecking of their boat; a widow and six children left.—A splendid steam-vessel, said to be the largest ever built in Scotland, has been launched at Port-Glasgow, and is to sail betwixt Dundee and London.—The Scottish newspapers lately have abounded in advertisements for schoolmasters, rectors of academies, and teachers of various kinds; this is a good sign of the country.—Mr Jeffrey has lost much of his popularity in Edinburgh, in consequence of his mismanagement of the affair of the annuity tax; had he accomplished the abolition of this infamous assessment, he might have calculated on a monument being erected to his memory.—The accounts from the sportsmen on the hills continue very favourable.— Something like a regular battle has taken place betwixt a troublesome and ferocious band of poachers, and a body of gentlemen in Northumberland, and the latter have been successful in capturing their enemy, who have one and all been committed to Morpeth jail.—Dr Chalmers has been preaching at various places on his way from London.—The mummies at Irving's chapel are still going on with unabated fanaticism.—Mr Wallace, the member of Parliament for Greenock, has been thanked, by a public meeting of the respectable inhabitants of that place, for his spirited conduct on the post-office question.—The vessel, Hope of London, with emigrants to Quebec, has been wrecked, but the passengers, 95 in number, were all got safely ashore, and have mostly reached Montreal.—It is currently reported that the Marquis of Anglesea intends to resign the viceroyship of Ireland, in consequence of ill health.—It is announced that important alterations have taken place in the buttons of the coats and jackets of the household infantry, which have met the approbation of Lord Hill.—The new stamp bill provides that money shall be given for cancelled stamps.
—The announcements of the London papers, for the hundredth time, that Sir Francis Burdett was immediately to be created a peer, have of course again proved abortive: we are now completely tired of these very prognostications, which have become little else than a nuisance in the newspaper press.—The wheat crop in Germany is said to be very fine.—On a trial at Paris for the murder of a lady twelve years ago, the skeleton has been produced in court, for the purpose of showing, from the state of the vertebrae, and a rope found also in the grave, that her death had been effected by strangulation.—Since it has been determined that banks may be instituted in England with any number of partners, a prospectus has been issued for the establishment of a joint stock bank in London, with a capital of ten millions.—Five thousand copies have been sold of White's Natural History of Selborne, which forms the first volume of the British Library: a series of works publishing in three-and-sixpenny volumes.

Milton, to Lady Selina Charlotte Jenkinson, second daughter of the Earl of Liverpool.
20. The Most Noble Charles Marquis of Ailesbury, K.T., &c., &c., to the beautiful Miss Maria Tollemache, youngest daughter of the Hon. Charles Tollemache, and granddaughter to the Countess of Dysart.

A few days since a couple went to Thame Church to be married.
The ceremony went on as usual very well until it came to the words "with this ring I thee wed," when the bride, essaying to take her glove off her maiden hand for the last time, could not effect it. Whether it was agitation or heat, nervousness or perspiration, the leather clung to her hand as man and wife ought to do, and would not part company. The bride blushed and pulled, but in vain. The bridegroom (bold man!) laughed outright; so did the father, so did the mother, so did the bride's maids, so did all the spectators, except the clergyman, and he, the Rev. Mr Lee, exclaimed, "I do not come here to be laughed at;" and, shutting his book, left the ceremony half-finished, the bride half-married, and the glove—half off. We add, for the satisfaction of the sympathisers, that the bride went to church next day with her hand uncovered, and the nuptial knot was then tied "as tight as a glove."—Backs Herald.

DEATHS.

DUKE OF SUTHERLAND, K.G.—This distinguished nobleman expired at his seat, Dunrobin Castle, in the county of Sutherland, on Friday, the 19th July. He had been in an infirm state of health for several years, and was seized with a serious illness twelve hours after his landing at Dunrobin on the 6th July. His Grace was in his 76th year, having been born Jan. 9, 1758. By his death, his youngest son, Lord Francis Leveson Gower, succeeds to a fortune of £80,000 a year, with the certain prospect of some title of nobility connected with the honours of the dukedom of Bridgewater.

20. At Glasgow, Mr William Begbie, of the British Linen Company's Bank, Edinburgh.

21. At the Manse of Farnell, the Rev. Alexander Douglas, minister of Farnell.—At the Manse of Borrowstounness, the Rev. Dr Robert Rennie, minister of that parish.

22. At 24, Ainslie place, Edinburgh, John Eneas, youngest son of Colonel Ross, K.H., late 4th Royal Irish Dragoon Guards.—In Edinburgh, Captain Andrew Hare, late of the Hon. East India Company's service, and colonel in the command of a brigade in his highness the Nizam's service.

9. At Laig, island of Egg, Allan M'Donald, Esq.

10. Hon. Algernon Percy, late a minister at Switzerland.

11. Francis Elizabeth, Viscountess Allen.

13. At Edinburgh, Andrew Gillies, Esq. advocate, sheriff-substitute at Dundee.—At Mearns Manse, the Rev. Dr M'Latchie, minister of the parish of Mearns.

16. At London, William Trotter, Esq. of Bellenden, late Lord Provost of Edinburgh. Mr Trotter had been long indisposed.

20. At Trinity, Leith, Robert Menzies, Esq. shipbuilder in Leith. Lately, at Aberdeen, Dr Dauncey, in his 84th year, Professor of Civil Law in the King's College, Aberdeen, and sheriff-substitute.—At Brahead, Scotland, Janet Leslie, aged 105.—At Finchley, William, third son of Lieut.-Col. Vans Agnew.

ANNUITY TAX.

In pursuance of the system adopted by the clergy of Edinburgh and their agents, Mr Tait, bookseller, was, on Saturday, August 10, incarcerated for the arrears of this tax. He was seized on the street, and, without being permitted to visit his shop to make the necessary business arrangements, hurried off to the Calton Jail. Mr Tait was soon after visited by a deputation of the inhabitants of Edinburgh, and solicited to remain in prison till the ensuing Tuesday evening, when a procession would be formed to accompany him home, and testify openly the disapprobation with which the proceedings of his incarceration were regarded. To this Mr Tait consented, and accordingly, on Tuesday evening, August 13, an immense assemblage of people was collected in front of the jail, and upon the Calton Hill, to witness the unusual circumstance of the liberation of an individual in good circumstances, who had voluntarily submitted to imprisonment for debt upon public principles. Amidst the crowd were ranked up the members of several trade associations, with banners. A little before seven, Mr Tait left the jail, and entered an open coach, to which were attached four horses, with liveried postilions, and which contained several gentlemen of different political parties. On his appearance in the coach, Mr Tait was greeted with loud cheers from the multitude, and immediately after, the populace resorted to the degrading and odious proceeding of taking the horses from the coach, in order to drag it themselves. In proceeding along Prince's Street, the procession was joined by other trades in marshalled array, from the Old Town; and at one period the whole of the North Bridge, Prince's Street, Waterloo Place, and the Calton Hill, seemed completely covered with spectators, and others concerned in the proceedings. On reaching Walker Street, where Mr Tait resides, he left the coach, and soon after appearing on a balcony in front of his house, harangued the crowd, which filled the streets below, on the subject of his incarceration. In this speech he ascribed the severities with which he and others had been visited, to the clergy alone, and prognosticated that a little more of such practices would soon put an end to the connection between church and state in this quarter of the world. The crowd then dispersed quietly. The trades, however, did not part till they had held a meeting on the Earthen Mound, where it was resolved upon to send a petition to Parliament, praying for the dissolution of that union. Within a few days following this demonstration of public opinion, several other citizens were incarcerated on the same account as Mr Tait. On Monday evening, one of these, Mr Johnstone, Hanover Street, was taken home from prison by a procession similar to that which attended at the liberation of Mr Tait. During all the proceedings, the clergy and authorities have given no token of being disturbed by them, except in issuing writs of lawburrows against twelve of the persons who carried banners in the late procession. There is something in this measure strikingly at issue with the historical character of the church of Scotland. The lawburrows (a writ for the protection of one subject from the apprehended violence of another) was never before resorted to for any such purpose, except in the year 1678, when the Duke of Lauderdale took advantage of it to restrain and coerce the noble patriots who braved death and all ills, on behalf of the church which now stands (at least so far as Edinburgh is concerned) in so different a position regarding the people.

CHEAP TEAS.

The people have lately heard a good deal about the abolition of the monopoly of the East India Company, and they now expect to get cheap tea. But in this they will find themselves very much disappointed. The new law provides that, in lieu of the duties now payable on tea, there shall be collected and paid, from and after the 22d day of April 1834, the several duties following; that is to say—For every lb. of bohea, 1s. 6d.; for every lb. of congou, twankey, hyson skin, orange pekoe, 2s. 2d.; for every lb. of souchong, flowering pekoe, hyson, young hyson, gunpowder, imperial, and all other teas not enumerated, 3s. By the imposition of these high fixed duties, instead of the old duty of 100 per cent., good teas will not be any cheaper than they now are, even with the free trade which is to take place. The abolition of the monopoly of the Company may do good to a few ship-owners and merchants; and that is nearly all that can be expected. We shall never drink our tea the cheaper or the better for all the fuss that has been made. On this subject the Edinburgh Courier has the following sensible remarks:—"If tea had been always sold in Britain, as it might have been with a moderate duty and no monopoly, at 2s. 3d. or 2s. 6d. per lb., all classes would have partaken of this refreshment, and it would of course have superseded the more free use of other beverages, such as spirits. The drinkers of tea are noted for sobriety, and if, by a lower price, it had been brought within the reach of the working classes, it would have done more to wean them from their destructive taste for ardent spirits than all the temperance societies that have yet been established. It was precisely the antidote that was wanting, because it refreshes without intoxicating, and the habit, once formed, would have operated as a security against other dangerous propensities. But the high price of tea has limited its use to those in better circumstances, and has left the lower ranks a prey to vicious indulgences. Its free introduction into this country will no doubt, in some degree, remedy this evil by lowering its price. But the increase of the duty by the finance minister tends to counteract this salutary effect."

Aug. 3. A barbarous murder was at noon-day committed on the body of a poor old man, named Peddie, employed in breaking stones on the highway, near Banceore, about two miles from Stirling. His hammer was found lying beside him on the public road, with part of his brains and grey hair adhering to it. On searching near the spot, a young man, named Tennant, a fellow-workman of the deceased, was found lying asleep, and he was committed to Stirling jail under strong suspicions of his being the murderer.

—13. A procession of the trades of Leith took place, as a commemoration of the reform jubilee of last year.

—16. Patrick Davidson, Esq. advocate, Aberdeen, was elected this day to the Civil Law Chair in the King's College there, vacant by the death of Dr Dauncey.

The number of new claims for enrolment as voters in Edinburgh, up to 20th July, were 302, of whom 66 have been already rejected, and the consideration of 17 postponed.

Application is about to be made to government for money to build a place of meeting for the General Assembly in Edinburgh, which, if granted (and such accommodation is highly necessary), will save the impoverished purse of the city the expense of building one of the two new churches now in contemplation, by converting the present assembly hall into a place for preaching.

Privileges of Corporations.—A curious legal case has just occurred in Edinburgh. The Incorporation of Fishers or Butchers of Canongate, prosecuted William Wight, an unfree man, for selling flesh within their bounds. Mr Wight denied that the incorporation had any title to molest him; and it appears, that, after repeated delays of time had been granted to the incorporation by the Sheriff to bring forward their title, they had literally no rights to show—their title-deeds were either lost or had become matter of tradition. The consequence is, the incorporation is not only unsuited, but is reduced to the character of a legal nonentity.

At a meeting of the Presbytery of Edinburgh, July 31, the Rev. Mr Tait was suspended from his charge of the College Church, Edinburgh, on account of his continued refusal to put an end to the scenes called manifestations of the spirit, which from time to time occurred in his place of worship. One of a very extravagant nature, the prominent cause of this tardy act, had occurred on the previous Sunday. According to Mr Tait's own account of the matter, as given in the meeting of the Presbytery, "He was on the miracle of Lazarus, and was observing that some people were of opinion that if notable miracles were wrought, all would believe them; but here, though many believed, some went to the chief priests to put a stop to such proceedings, or words to that effect, when a gentleman rose up on my left, and exclaimed, 'I came not to send peace on earth, but a sword, the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God.' I considered this as confirmatory of what I had been preaching." Since Mr Tait's suspension, it is understood that he and his followers have met for private worship. Mr Carlyle, advocate, who was the chief figure at his church, has since made several public appearances on the streets, preaching in a very enthusiastic manner.

The article of sugar has made a very great and rapid advance in price: brown sugar, which was lately selling at 47s. per cwt., cannot now be purchased under 57s. or 58s., which is a rise of more than one penny per pound. Coffee, cocoa, and other West India produce, have likewise considerably advanced.

Mr Wordsworth, the poet, has just returned from a tour to the Hebrides.

Glasgow Lottery.—The lottery legalised by the Glasgow Improvement bill is to be concluded, but Lord Althorp has intimated that no similar measure will be sanctioned.

The ancient burgh of Dunbarton, it seems, is to be put under trust. A meeting of the creditors was held lately, when, we understand, the magistrates and council agreed to convey the whole of the property of the burgh to five trustees, for behoof of the creditors at large.

The packet ship Science, Captain Snell, sailed lately from Greenock for New York, with 100 emigrants, principally of the agricultural class.

John Irving Henderson, Esq. advocate, has been appointed sheriff-substitute at Dundee, in room of the late Andrew Gillies, Esq.

Such is the influx of labourers from Ireland, that it has been computed that from two to three thousand have of late been weekly imported to the Clyde.

Postscript.

On the 12th August, Bourmont was at Santarem, 45 miles from Lisbon, with 40,000 men, designing to make an immediate attack upon the capital, where, it appears, Don Pedro has not more than 12,000. It is calculated that, if unassisted by the English marines, the latter will hardly be able to maintain his ground in Lisbon against such odds. Decisive intelligence may be expected to arrive very soon from this quarter.

A project for a general insurrection throughout Italy, and the subsequent establishment of a federal republic over the whole of that country, has been divulged at Paris, where an effort has been made by revolutionary agents to obtain a loan for the purpose.

The number of suits commenced by the [English] clergy, in order to maintain their obsolete claims for tithes, amounts to nine thousand. Fortunately for the clergy, the House of Commons sees the danger to which the church establishment is exposed by the infatuation of her ministers; and Mr Blamire's bill to "stay their suits," will be passed this day, having gone through the previous stages during the week.—Spectator of Saturday, Aug. 24.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

We have the satisfaction of continuing our favourable report of the state of almost all the staple branches of industry throughout the whole of the united kingdom. In Leeds, the prices of cloths are so high as to have caused some momentary decrease in the demand. In Bradford, the same may also be said; the manufacturers refuse to accept the merchants' prices. In Rochdale, the flannel-sellers are looking for better prices. At Liverpool, lately, some Australian wools, prime marks, brought high as 3s. per lb. Australian wools are coming very extensively into use in the manufacture of merinos and other stuff fabric. In some qualities of cotton, there has been a rise within the half year of nearly 100 per cent. which has encouraged a good deal of speculation. In consequence of the great rise in wool, the bonnet and carpet manufacturers of Kilmanock and Stewarton have nearly all abandoned the former trades for weaving. At Stroud, Dursley, &c. great activity prevails, and the masters find it difficult to execute their extensive orders. At Newport, the stout iron is now smaller than for years, and it is shipped as fast as it arrives from the works. Some of the Leicester hosiers have given an advance of 3d. per dozen to their workmen upon plain wools and half hose in and under 4 gages. The prices for making lambs' wool hose in Scotland are thus fixed by mutual agreement:—Merino, 28 inches long, in 20 gages, 8s. 9d. per dozen; 22 gage, 9s. 6d. 24 gage socks, 7 inches long, 3s. 3d. Wool continues to advance 1s. 6d. was freely given at Cowbridge market, on August 13, what would only fetch 7d. three years ago.—In the spirited and industrious little town of Hawick, where the manufacture of yarn and hosiery has for many years been carried on to an amazing extent, a few of the manufacturers turned their attention some time ago to the manufacture of woollen shawls, which they are now making of a quality so superior to those of the same place, as producing Messrs Wilson and Sons, of the same place, are producing flannels rivaling in beauty and quality the very best fabrics of Lancashire. At Dunfermline, the demand for the staple manufacture, table-linens, especially the coarser kinds, is very brisk; hands are employed, orders increase, and a rise of wages is expected.—Our statement, last publication, regarding the rise of wages at Hawick, referred to the stocking weavers, who are remarkably well employed.

THE FISHERIES.

Herrings.—The herring fisheries are proving in general extremely prolific this year at all the stations, whether coastwise or inland. Along the coast, from Wick to Cromarty, the curers are already refusing to take more fish—a proof of precocious success hitherto unprecedented. Some days many of the boats caught from 50 to 55 crabs, but the more ordinary take was from 3 to 30 crabs. Lybster, in Caithness, the take already surpasses the annual average supply, although the season is not half over. In two weeks as many fish have been cured as was last season (a very good one) in eight or nine. Many of the curers have been compelled to store for want of barrels and salt. It is expected the herrings will soon be as low as 12s. or 13s. a-barrel.

Salmon.—Of late the fishing in the Tweed has been unusually successful. Immense quantities of grilse have recently been caught in the Moray Firth and River Ness, and the fishermen have been filling their nets at every haul.

White Fisheries.—The white fishing has this summer almost entirely failed in the Shetland Islands, owing partly to the stormy weather, but principally to the want of fish on the coasts; the Shetland cod sloops have hardly caught any cod at all.

THE HARVEST.

On this momentous topic, it need only be stated, that, from parts of the empire, the most favourable accounts are received. Reaping seems to have been general in Scotland at the middle of August, and in England a little earlier. The crops appear to be every where luxuriant. A field of barley, between Crail and Kirk Barro, on the east coast of Fife, was at dawn in the middle of July, being the first, perhaps, in the kingdom. Every species of green crop is unusually luxuriant. We learn, however, that corn plants are almost universal in Mid-Lothian of the prevalence of the wheat crops, and that the oats are likewise generally afflicted with the mysterious disease termed black.

SCOTTISH BANKRUPTS.

July 29. Robert Macbrayne, coalmaster, dealer in coals, iron, stone, and freestone, at Summerlee, near Airdrie.—30. James Anderson, junr. general-merchant, Aberdeen.—31. James Thomson cotton-spinner, Gorbals of Glasgow.—Aug. 1. George Adamson, Dumfries.—3. Thomas Spears, distiller, Yardsheads, Leith, sometime T. Spears, junr. distiller, Kirkcaldy.—15. William Allan, grocer and spirit-dealer, Paisley.—21. Peter Seater, junr. merchant, Peirowall, island of Westray, Orkney.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The first thirty-six numbers of CHAMBERS'S EDINBURGH JOURNAL, originally published in a folio shape, are now reprinted in the present small size, by which means sets of the work for the commencement may now be had, in every respect fitted for binding. A title-page and index are likewise prepared for the first volume, and may be purchased at the price of a number. The who have not preserved their numbers as published, may have the first volume, done up in boards, from the publishers or agents.

Besides the Journal and the present monthly Newspaper, Messrs Chambers publish a sheet once every fortnight, similar in appearance and price to these works, under the title of "CHAMBERS'S INFORMATION FOR THE PEOPLE," of which the following numbers have been recently published:—

13. THE VEGETABLE KINGDOM, being a simple and entertaining view of Botany and Vegetable Physiology.

14. EMIGRATION to VAN DIEMAN'S LAND.

15. Containing POLITICAL ECONOMY, will appear on Wednesday, September 11. In this sheet has been condensed in a popular form, all the important truths of the science for the use chiefly of the industrious classes.

Articles are also in preparation on a variety of subjects generally interesting to the people, and will in due course appear.

EMIGRATION.

Nos. 1, 4, 5, 10, 12, and 14, of the INFORMATION FOR THE PEOPLE, are now stitched up in a part by themselves, and may be had by applying to any bookseller; comprising, at the low price of 1-pence, a complete body of INFORMATION for EMIGRANTS, respecting CANADA, NOVA SCOTIA, NEW BRUNSWICK, PRINCE EDWARD'S ISLAND, CAPE BRETON, THE UNITED STATES, NEW SOUTH WALES, and VAN DIEMAN'S LAND, along with maps of all the countries. The matter of these six sheets is equal in extent to two ordinary octavo volumes. It has been written expressly for the use of those classes of the people who cannot afford more expensive works; and for all ordinary purposes, it precludes the necessity of purchasing any other.

W. and R. Chambers have just published a small volume, price 7s., entitled REEKIANA, or the MINOR ANTIQUITIES OF EDINBURGH, and intended as a sequel of the "Traditions of Edinburgh." Reekiana is embellished with numerous wood engravings, and will form an useful guide to the remarkable places of antiquity in the Scottish metropolis.

WHAT'S ALL THE HURRY?

Some twenty years ago, there was a forum or debating society at Edinburgh, which had weekly meetings, open to the public, and generally discussed such well-timed questions as, "Whether is fortitude in adversity or moderation in prosperity most to be commended?" "Whether is the single or the married state the happiest?" "If a man were shipwrecked, what had it in his choice to save a mother, a sister, or a wife, which ought he in heart and conscience to save?"—questions, in short, on which a great deal could be said on both, or on all sides, and which therefore had the agreeable effect of producing a perfect equality of disputation for three or four hours, without tiring the debaters or the audience a whit more enlightened on the subject than they were at the beginning—if so much. These meetings used to be frequently enlivened with the homely humour of the Drick Shepherd, who contrived to be so often droll and entertaining, that people would sometimes laugh even when they only saw him about to speak. One night, however, he had been taking up a good deal of time, and, to make himself more tedious, he proposed to read extracts from some papers which he had brought in his pocket. In order to do so, he pulled a candle for him, and began, with a provoking solemnity and deliberation, to proceed about the business of brightening up the luminary by means of the snuffers. Some impatience was expressed by the audience, who, though they might have tolerated the reading of the papers, as part of the business of the night, could not endure to see their time taken up with the trivial business of trimming a candle. The Shepherd just turned his head, and while he held the snuffers suspended near the light, as yet untrimmed, inquired, with irresistible comicality, "What's a' the hurry?" at which the audience were at once and completely restored to good humour.

Many a time since then, we have been struck by the force of this query, "What's all the hurry?" and we have often been tempted to apply it in matters much more grave and dignified than the snuffing of a candle. It might be applied very pertinently, we think, to the more eager and ardent class of politicians; for there is now hardly any distinction among them in reference to the consideration of state affairs, except their comparative urgency in hurrying forward measures of political amelioration. First, there is a small body of Conservativists, who are only willing to move inch by inch. Then there is a large body, who gallop along at a smartish pace, but can upon no account endure to be hurried or drawn any faster. Lastly, there is a small but most mercurial class, who swear by every thing like a trot, and wonder why all men are not at the gallop like themselves. This last set of people, feeling all their own moral machinery going at a tremendous rate, seem to experience as much pain from the comparative tardiness of their brethren, as one playing a hornpipe in an orchestra would suffer if all the rest were to give it as an adagio. Rushing, cuffing, hauling, spurring, and scolding—the fellows are such pests to the soberer and more moderate people, that it is no wonder if the latter occasionally turn half round, like Hogg, and say remonstratingly, "What's all the hurry?"

There are perhaps some grounds for the ridicule which the third party throws upon the first and second for their cautiousness in the race of political improvement. But the first and second retort upon the third, that, in their eagerness, they so far overshoot the general dispositions of the people, that their measures become next to impracticable. If, from possessing property and other causes, say these two parties, the great bulk of mankind are timid and slow in forming desires and aims in politics, is it not better for a statesman to do what this mass will countenance him in doing, than, by attempting something more, startle the huge and hardly rational collective, and so get nothing done? It is hardly to be denied that there is some practical sense in this way of putting the case; and it is at least certain that, hitherto, all political amelioration has been strictly progressive—that is to say, has only advanced as the majority could be got to see that there was no danger in the movement.

The most timid thinkers now allow very readily that it was as well the people became emancipated from the feudal system. Very few think the nation was wrong in resisting Charles the First. The rights obtained at the Revolution of 1688 are subject of unmingled congratulation to all parties which now exist. All these are points settled: their good effects have been felt, and the turmoil and danger which attended them have passed away. It is only, however, because no danger can now possibly be dreaded to flow from them, that all men allow them to have been good moves, and avow themselves liberalists up to those points. Such is the constitutional timidity of a vast number of men, in regard to state matters, that the least alteration frightens them, and they do not become reconciled to it all their lives, nor think their posterity will be safe from it for several generations. Such men would cry, "Fire, fire," in Noah's flood. Other men may smile at such silly alarms; yet as these persons are also concerned in the commonwealth, of which, with their property, they perhaps form the larger portion, it would be difficult to avoid acting with a certain deference to them. Their minds must be allowed time to receive assurance and confidence against loss, before any movement in advance can be taken. It is just the expense that the retarded individuals must pay for the advantage of living in society with a large nation, all of whom cannot be expected to be of the same mind with regard to questions of political ameliorations, or any other questions whatsoever.

It is for some such reasons as these, that, standing as we do aloof from all parties, we would feel inclined sometimes, when we see the ultra-liberals a little fretful about the indifference and cautiousness of their brethren, to say to them quietly, "What's all the hurry?"

THE POOR.

THERE are two classes of writers on the complicated subject of the poor and the poor-laws. One is an advocate for the principle that the wealthy part of the community ought to be obliged to support the poor, though under certain fixed and salutary regulations. The other is of opinion that all compulsory relief of the poor is not only unjust, but has really no good tendency, and allege that, the more the poor are supported, the more numerous they become, and the greater becomes the burden of their subsistence. Which of these parties is correct in its argument, it is almost impossible to decide, there being so many incidental circumstances sometimes swaying to the one side, and sometimes to the other. In all likelihood truth lies between the two extremes. A sense of common humanity, independent of legislative authority, points out the propriety of supporting, to a certain extent, those in utter destitution. Besides, if those in such a state of misery be not relieved of their more urgent necessities, outbreaks of crime, riot, and bodily disease, may be anticipated by the community as a natural consequence.

The obligation to support the poor has one good tendency: it compels the rich to superintend in some measure the conduct of the poor, and to sympathise in the distresses of the wretched: so much so, that the greater distance to which the rich remove themselves from the poor, so do the numbers and necessities of the poor increase in proportion. This is very fully demonstrated in the present condition of Ireland, which, having had no poor-laws, has immense hordes of poor, in many cases totally regardless of the deficiencies and regulations of civilised society, and at times overwhelmed with epidemics, diseases, and famines. It is thus evident that the rich must pay a penalty for the enjoyments of isolation; the penalty is the poor-rates. But there is a limit to the obligation to support the poor, and the poor should be made aware of such a fact beforehand. The subsistence which is afforded should never be such as to act as a temptation to assume the garb of pauperism. A neglect of this excellent principle in the system leads to nearly the same result as that produced by no extension of public charity at all, namely, a dangerous increase in the numbers and necessities of the poor, and likewise a lamentable want of that independence of spirit in which so much of national virtue consists.

It appears to us that there is only one mode by which society may be somewhat righted, and that is, the cultivation of the minds of the lower classes of the community. By the universal establishment of schools, and a simultaneous close supervision by resident clergymen and gentry, Scotland, for instance, has hitherto escaped with tolerable effect from the horrors of the poor-law system. Schools teach the art of reading, and he who reads soon discovers the difference betwixt the advantages of knowledge and the ignominy of ignorance. Indeed, it is only by the possession of this art that human beings are much elevated above the condition of ordinary animals. But the art of reading does much more than this, immediately as regards the poor-laws; and here lies, in a certain degree, the secret of the exemption of the Scotch from the burden of a degraded population of paupers. It at once puts into the possession of the poor a knowledge of the situation of places at which good work and subsistence can be obtained, and takes away disinclination to remove thither. Hence, the extensive process of voluntary emigration from Scotland, and hence, from the want of this knowledge, and the appetite for emigration, the deplorable overburdened condition of English parishes.

From all that has ever come under our own knowledge, it has appeared that nine-tenths of the poverty which any where prevails is to be traced solely to bad behaviour, mismanagement in various ways, particularly indulgence in over-expensive habits, and recklessness of consequences. There seems to be but a limited portion of the community who care much about what their condition will be in after times; the greater number appear to live in such a way as if there was no future, no old age, no miseries liable to be endured, and no possibility of preventing the approaches of poverty by perseverance and self-denial. For our own parts, we have ever experienced the greatest difficulty in getting persons to attend with sobriety and diligence to the work to which they were put; and our own case, we are sure, is that of thousands of individuals having employment for others. The highest remuneration in the shape of wages, the friendliest admonitions, the most anxious superintendence, we have frequently found to be entirely unavailing. It is said that the poet Burns used on many occasions to declare, that there was not a more humiliating and painful sight in creation, than the spectacle of "a man seeking work;" and from this idea was elaborated that beautiful ode, "Man was made to mourn." But had the poet thought a little more philosophically, and seen a little more of the world, he would most probably have had occasion also to remark, that the spectacle, by no means uncommon, of "masters seeking men to take employment, and keep it after they had obtained it," was almost equally painful to the philanthropic mind. The celebrated author of Robinson Crusoe, in a pamphlet on this subject, has said, that "no man of sound limbs and senses can be poor, merely for want of work." "We are," says this shrewd observer, "the most lazy diligent nation in the world: there is nothing more frequent than for an Englishman to work till he has got his pocket full of money, and then go and be idle, or perhaps drunk, till it is all gone. I once paid six or seven men together on a Saturday night, the least ten shillings, and some thirty shillings, for work, and have seen them go with it directly to the alehouse, lie there till Monday, spend it every penny, and run in debt to boot, and not give a farthing of it to their families, though all of them had wives and children. From hence come poverty, parish charges, and beggary."

The accumulation of poor in all our large towns, and a corresponding depression in the condition of the necessitous, with an increase of rates for their support, have excited astonishment wherever inquiries have been instituted. It is found that one of the chief causes conspiring to fill cities with poor, is the extensive establishment of charitable institutions for their relief; while it has been proved that nothing has been more detrimental to the moral and physical condition of the lower classes in large towns, than the system of pledging small articles with pawnbrokers. It is notorious to those acquainted with the habits of the poor, and it is admitted by the paupers themselves, that by far the greater number of articles are pledged for liquor. The immense proportion of these pawnings are by women, and chiefly of articles deemed essential to their use and comfort. It is calculated that, on loans of 3d. for one day, these unfortunate creatures pay at the rate of 5200 per cent. of interest; if for a week, 866 per cent. A legislative enactment to prevent the pawning of articles under half a crown of value, would perhaps do more to diminish the wretchedness and numbers of the poor in large towns, than almost any expedient that could be devised. And if the number of public houses were at the same time restricted—we speak here chiefly as regards the large Scotch towns, for instance Edinburgh, where there is a public house for every fourteen families!—the good done to the poor would be incalculable.

Charitable institutions, though doubtless established from the most commendable motives, are now discovered to be by no means so generally useful as is supposed. Our cities being full of these establishments, offer attractions for the settlement of the poor, the idle, and the worthless, from the most remote parts of the country. The injury done to the moral character of the poor by the dispensation of charity from such institutions, is amusingly exhibited in the Report of the Commissioners on the Administration of the Poor-Laws—a work containing the most extraordinary facts relative to the poor in England. The Rev. William Stone, of the parish of Christ-Church, Spitalfields, in his examination, thus exemplifies the common case of a pauper deriving assistance from these institutions from his cradle to his grave:—

"A young weaver of twenty-two marries a servant girl of nineteen, and the consequence is the prospect of a family. We should presume, under ordinary circumstances, that they would regard such a prospect with some anxiety; that they would calculate upon the expenses of an accouchement, and prepare for them in the interval, by strict economy and unremitting industry. No such thing. It is the good fortune of our couple to live in the district of Spitalfields, and it is impossible to live there without witnessing the exertions of many charitable associations. To these, therefore, they naturally look for assistance on every occasion.

They are visited periodically by a member of the 'District Visiting Society.' It is the object of this society to inquire into the condition of the poor, to give them religious advice, and occasional temporal relief, and to put them in the way of obtaining the assistance of other charitable institutions. To the visitor of this institution the wife makes known her situation, and states her inability to meet the expense of an accoucheur. The consequence is, that from him, through his recommendation, or under his directions, she obtains a ticket either for the 'Lying-in Hospital,' or for the 'Royal Maternity Society.' By the former of these charities she is provided with gratuitous board, lodging, medical attendance, churching, registry of her child's baptism, &c. &c. By the latter she is accommodated with the gratuitous services of a midwife to deliver her at her own home.

Delivered of her child at the cost of the 'Royal Maternity Society,' she is left by the midwife, but then she requires a nurse, and for a nurse, of course, she is unable to pay herself; a little exertion, however, gets over this difficulty: she sends to the district visitor, to the minister, or to some other charitable parishioner, and, by their interest with the parish officers, she has at last a nurse sent to her from the workhouse. But still she has many wants, and these, too, she is unable to supply at her own expense. She requires blankets, bed and body-linen for herself, and baby-linen for her infant. With these she is furnished by another charitable institution. Soon after her marriage, she had heard one of her neighbours say that she had been favoured in no less than five successive confinements with the loan of the 'box of linen' from the 'Benevolent Society.' She had, accordingly, taken care to secure 'the box of linen' for herself, and, during her confinement, she receives occasional visits and pecuniary relief from a female visitor of the charity. By her she is kindly attended to, and through her, or 'the district visitor,' she is provided, in case of fever or other illness, with the gratuitous services of the parish apothecary, or of some other charitable medical practitioner in the district.

At the end of the month, she goes, pro forma, to be church'd; and though, perhaps, the best-dressed female of the party, she claims exemption from any pecuniary offering by virtue of a printed ticket to that effect, put into her hands by the midwife of the 'Royal Maternity Society.'

The child thus introduced into the world is not worse provided for than his parents. Of course he requires vaccination, or, in case of neglect, he takes the small-pox. In either case he is sent to the 'Hospital for Casual Small-pox and for Vaccination,' and by this means costs his parents nothing.

He has the measles, the whooping-cough, and other morbid affections peculiar to childhood. In all these instances he has the benefit of the 'City Institution for Diseases of Children.'

Indeed, from his birth to his death, he may command any medical treatment. If his father is a Welshman, he applies to the 'Welsh Dispensary'—if not, or he prefers another, he has the 'Tower Hamlets Universal Dispensary,' the 'London Dispensary,' and the 'City of London Dispensary.' In case of fever, he is sent to the 'Fever Hospital.' For a broken limb, or any sudden or acute disorder, he is admitted into the 'London' or other 'Public Hospital.' For a rash, or any specific disease of the skin or ear, he is cured at the 'London Dispensary.' And for all morbid affections of the eye, he goes either to the same charity, or to the 'London Ophthalmic Infirmary.' In case of rupture, he has a ticket for the 'Rupture Society,' or for the 'City of London Truss Society.' For a pulmonary complaint, he attends the 'Infirmary for Asthma, Consumption, and other Diseases of the Lungs.' And for scrofula, or any other disease which may require sea-bathing, he is sent to the 'Royal Sea-Bathing Infirmary' at Margate. In some of these medical institutions, too, he has the extra advantage of board, lodging, and other accommodations.

By the time the child is eighteen months or two years old, it becomes convenient to his mother to 'get him out of the way;' for this purpose he is sent to the 'Infant School,' and, in this seminary, enters upon another wide field of eleemosynary immunities.

By the age of six he quits the 'Infant School,' and has before him an ample choice of schools of a higher class. He may attend the Lancasterian School for 2d. a-week, and the National for 1d., or for nothing. His parents naturally enough prefer the latter school; it may be less liberal in principle, but it is lower in price. In some instances, too, it is connected with a cheap clothing society; in others, it provides clothing itself to a limited number of children; and in others, again, it recommends its scholars to the governors of a more richly endowed clothing charity school. To be sure, these are only collateral advantages. But it is perhaps excusable in a parent delivered by the 'Royal Maternity Society,' to value these above any of the more obvious and legitimate benefits to be derived from a system of education.

A parent of this kind, however, has hardly done justice to herself or to her child, till she has succeeded in getting him admitted into a school where he will be immediately and permanently clothed. This advantage is to be found in the 'Protestant Dissenters,' in the 'Parochial,' or in the 'Ward Charity School,' and she secures him a presentation to one of these, either by a recommendation from the 'National School'—by the spontaneous offer of her husband's employer—or by her own importunate applications at the door of some other subscriber. It is true, some few industrious and careful parents in the neighbourhood object to putting their children into these charity schools. With more independence than wisdom, they revolt at the idea of seeing their children walk the streets for several years in a livery which degrades them, by marking them out like the parish paupers of former days, as the objects of common charity. But the parent in question has no such scruples—she has tasted the sweets, and, therefore, never feels the degradation, of charity. She is saved the expense of clothing her own child herself; and she observes that almost all her poor neighbours, like the dog in the fable, have come to think what is really disreputable to be a badge of distinction. She knows, too, that most of the 'gentlefolks' who support these charities openly proclaim (O monstrous absurdity!) that they were more especially designed for 'an aristocracy among the poor.'

It is possible that she may not succeed in getting her child into a clothing charity school; it is more than possible, too, that she may find a more profitable employment for him than attendance at the 'National;' she may keep him at home all the week to help her to nurse her fourth and fifth babies, or she may earn a few pence by sending him out as an errand boy. Yet, even under these circumstances she does not necessarily forego the means of getting him an education, or a suit of clothes for nothing even then she can send him to one of the innumerable 'Sunday schools' in the neighbourhood; and for clothing, she can apply to the 'Educational Clothier Society.' The object of this society is the lending of clothing to enable distressed children to attend Sunday schools. Only, then, let her child be 'a distressed one,' and he is provided by the 'Educational Clothing Society' with a suit of clothes, which he wears all the Sundays of one year, and, in case of past regular attendance at school, all the week-days of the next. The Sundays of the second year, he begins with a new suit of clothes as before.

The probability however is, that, by the time the boy is eight or nine years old, his mother does not proceed in procuring his admission into the 'Clothing Charity School;' and there is the same probability that she will continue him in it; she has strong reasons for so doing, for she knows that he will not be clothed and educated at the expense of the charity but that, when he is fourteen, that is, when he has remained five or six years in the school, he will be apprenticed by it to some tradesman, with a fee varying in the different schools from L.2 to L.5.

At fourteen, accordingly, the boy is put apprentice by the charity to a weaver, and, at the expiration of the usual term, he begins work as a journeyman. He has hardly done so before he proposes to marry a girl about his own age. He is aware, indeed, that there are difficulties in the way of their union, and that even on the most favourable supposition, their prospects in life cannot be considered flattering. He has saved no money himself, and his intended is equal unprepared for the expenses of an establishment. He knows that, working early and late, he can earn no more than 10s. a-week—that, in case of sickness or the failure of employment, he may frequently be deprived even of these—and that his own father, with a wife and seven children, was in this very predicament but the winter before; nevertheless, 'nature intended every one to marry;' and, in the case of himself and his beloved, 'it is their lot to come together.' On these unanswerable grounds, he takes room at 2s. a-week, and thus utterly unprepared, he appears, either for the ordinary or contingent expenses of a family—he marries.

We may suspect, however, from the result, that it is not so rash and improvident in this conduct, as upon an ordinary calculation, he must appear to be.

Within a few months she has the prospect of a child, and a child brings with it many expenses; but no matter; he need not pay them; for in his neighbourhood he may fairly calculate upon having the paid by charity. Charity never failed his mother in her difficulties, and why, in precisely the same difficulties, should it be withheld from him? In the case of his wife, therefore, as in that of his mother, the 'Lying-in Hospital,' or the 'Lying-in Dispensary,' or the 'Royal Maternity Society,' provides the midwifery, &c. The 'workhouse,' the nurse, the 'Benevolent Society,' blankets, linen, pecuniary relief, &c. The 'parish doctor,' the 'dispensary doctor,' or some other 'charitable doctor,' extra drug and medical attendance. By a little management, may avail himself at the same time of several obstetric charities, and be visited successively by churchmen, Quakers, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, Calvinistic Methodists, Huntingdonians—in fact, by the charitable associations connected with every church and chapel in the neighbourhood.

He now finds that his earnings are precarious, and that, even at their utmost amount, they are inadequate to the support of his increasing family. But his father's family was for years in the same circumstances, and was always saved by charity. To charity, then, he again has recourse.

He hears, that twice a year there is a parish gift of bread. From some vestryman, or from some other respectable parishioner, he obtains a ticket for a quarter loaf at Midsummer and at Christmas. There is also a parish gift of coals. By the same means, every Christmas gets a sack of coals. Indeed, by importuning several parishioners, and by giving each of them a different address, or the same address with different names, he is sometimes so fortunate as to secure three sacks instead of one. On these periodical distributions he can confidently depend; most of the parishioners dispose of their annual tickets to the same poor persons from year to year, a matter of course; and others, who are more discriminate, invariably find, upon renewed inquiry, that their petitioners are in the same state of apparent indigence or destitution. Under these circumstances, our applicant soon comes to look upon his share of the parochial bounty as a legitimate and certain item in his yearly receipts.

But this is only a slight periodical relief. He wants more loaves and more coals, and he has the means of obtaining them. If the weather is severe, the 'Spitalfields Association' is at work, and for months together distributes bread, coals, and potatoes. The 'Soup Society,' also, is in operation, and provides him regularly with several quarts of excellent meat soup at a penny, or sometimes even a halfpenny a quart. At all times several 'Benevolent Societies' and 'Pension Societies,' are acting in the district, and from these he receives food or pecuniary relief. He may apply, too, during the temporary cessation of all these charities, to the charitable associations of the different religious denominations, to the 'District Visiting Society,' to the 'Independents' Visiting Society,' to the 'Friend in Need Society,' to the 'Stranger's Friend Society,' to 'Zion's Good Will Society.' He may even be lucky enough to get something from all of them.

If his bedding is bad, he gets the loan of a blanket from the 'Benevolent Society,' or from the 'Blanket Association;' or he gets a blanket, a rug, and a pair of sheets, from the 'Spitalfields Association.' The staff of these charities supplies him with a flannel waistcoat for himself, and a flannel petticoat for his wife. In one instance, it furnishes his wife and children with shoes and stockings.

Thus he proceeds from year to year with a charity to meet every exigency of health and sickness. The time at length arrives, when, either from the number of children born to him, under the kind superintendence of the 'Lying-in,' the 'Royal Maternity,' or the 'Benevolent Society;' or from a desire to add a legal and permanent provision to the more precarious supplies of voluntary charity, he solicits parish relief; he gets an extract from the parish register, proves his entitlement by the charity-school indenture of apprenticeship, and quarters his family on the parish, with an allowance of five shillings a-week. In this uniform alternation of voluntary and compulsory relief, he draws towards the close of his mendicant existence.

Before leaving the world, he might, perhaps, return thanks to the public. He has been born for nothing: he has been nursed for nothing: he has been clothed for nothing: he has been educated for nothing: he has been put out in the world for nothing: he has had medicine and medical attendance for nothing: and he has had his children also born, nursed, clothed, fed, educated, established, and physicked for nothing.

There is but one good office more for which he can and indebted to society, and that is his burial. He is a parish pauper, and, at the expense of the parish, he is provided with shroud, coffin, pall, and burial-ground; a party of paupers from the workhouse carry his body to the grave, and a party of paupers are his mourners."

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS.

(From 20th to 29th August inclusive.)

1. IRISH TITHES ARREARS BILL.—Upon the question that the house go into committee on the Irish tithes arrears bill (Monday, August 20), Mr Hume moved, that it be an instruction to the committee at the sum advanced to the Irish clergy should be secured on the temporalities of the church.—The house divided.—Ayes, 42; Noes, 69. Majority against Mr Hume's motion, 27.—The house then went into committee, and the several clauses were agreed to.—On its being brought up for the third reading on Wednesday (22), Mr Hume asked whether church property was to be made liable for the payments contemplated by this bill.—Upon Mr Littleton answering "No," Mr Hume then moved, that the bill be read a third time that day six months.—Mr O'Connell supported the bill, declaring that it reflected great credit on the government, that it purchased peace in Ireland, and that it was right to make those pay for a Protestant establishment in Ireland, who wished to continue it as part of the state.—Mr Shaw said, the bill before the house contained, in his opinion, all the elements of bad legislation.—After considerable discussion, Mr Hume withdrew his amendment, but moved, as a rider to the bill, a clause providing, that in all cases where the amount of the present loan was not faithfully repaid within the stipulated period, the balance, whatever might be its amount, should be charged on the church temporalities in Ireland, and that sum be placed at the disposal of the commissioners under the church temporalities bill.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the clause, if agreed to, would most effectually secure the non-payment of the present loan, by relieving the persons who benefited by it altogether at the general expense of the Irish church property. He must, therefore, decidedly oppose it.—The house then divided, when the numbers appeared.—For the clause, 27; against it, 47. Majority in favour of the bill as it originally stood, 20.—The bill was then passed.—On Monday (August 26), the House of Lords sat in committee upon it. The only alteration made was the insertion of a clause, on the motion of Lord Melbourne, to prevent defaulters in the payment of tithe from receiving the benefit of the 25 per cent. deduction, to which other tithe-payers were to be entitled under the provisions of the bill.—On Wednesday (28), it was read a third time and passed.

2. ENGLISH MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.—On Wednesday (August 21), Lord Brougham brought in and explained the principles of the bill for the purpose of regulating the municipal affairs of those boroughs, thirty in number, which, under the reform bill, sent members to Parliament, but which had no proper municipal institutions. The whole population of the boroughs which this bill was to regulate, amounted to upwards of L.200,000; and the number of persons qualified under the late reform act to vote for the election of members of Parliament was between 58,000 and 60,000. The boroughs themselves were for the most part situated in parts of the country where the iron and other important branches of trade were carried on, such as Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Stoke-upon-Trent, Halifax, Wakefield; and there were others in other parts of the country, such as Cheltenham, Brightelmstone, Chelmsford, Frome, Stroud, &c. Each borough would be divided into wards; and the qualification which would entitle the inhabitant of any of these wards to vote for a member of Parliament, would entitle him to vote for common councilmen, who would be chosen for three years, and who would have the power of electing an alderman for each ward of the borough, who would have his seat for life, except in cases where specified disqualifications should occur. A recorder for each borough would be nominated by the crown.—Lord Wynford approved of the bill, but he objected to the recorder being appointed by the crown; which Lord Brougham acknowledged required further consideration.—The bill was then read a first time.—(This bill appears to be giving great dissatisfaction throughout the country.)

3. BANK CHARTER BILL.—This bill passed through the committee of the House of Lords on Friday (August 23); on Monday (26), it was read a third time, and passed, after the rejection of a motion by the Duke of Wellington to fix ten instead of five pounds, as the limit above which bank-notes are to be a legal tender.

4. POST OFFICE REGULATIONS.—This subject was again brought under discussion on Tuesday (August 20), upon further complaints being made by various petitioners of the opening of letters and parcels at the Post Office.—The Solicitor-General declared the law of the case to be, that letters could be sent by an individual, provided he delivered them in person with his own hand, or in parcels by a carrier conveying goods (and law deeds like those of the petitioners were included), provided such letter or letters related to the goods or deeds so conveyed.

5. STAY OF SUITS FOR TITHES.—(IRELAND).—This bill was read a second time on Tuesday (August 21), after the Solicitor-General and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed their approbation of it; adding, that they were desirous of affording all possible aid to promote its objects.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, that he hoped, by next session, to have a bill prepared for the requisite settlement of the question of tithes in England.—On Saturday (August 24), the bill was read a third time and passed. It was then carried up to the Lords, where it was read a first time.—On Monday (26), upon a motion by Lord Western for its second reading, the Bishop of London said, he considered the measure as most unjust, and was surprised to find so much censure expressed against the clergy, who had commenced legal proceedings upon the authority of Lord Tenterden's bill, which limited the recovery of their rights to three years. Lord Tenterden, and the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, had both declared in that house, that ecclesiastical persons should have time to establish their legal claims.—Lord Wynford, after severely censuring the bill, moved it be read again that day six months.—Lord Brougham could not deny that the bill was an extraordinary one, and liable to many objections.—The amendment was ultimately put, and carried without a division, and the bill, therefore, was lost.

6. TRIAL OF OFFENCES IN IRELAND.—The bill for this purpose passed through the committee of the House of Commons on Tuesday (August 20).—On Wednesday, Mr Littleton moved that it be read a third time.—Mr O'Connell strenuously opposed it. Ireland was now tranquil, because they had given up the collection of tithes, and had poured in troops, in addition to the police force already in exercise there. He believed not a case existed where a jury refused to do their duty. This bill was as insulting as the coercion bill was iniquitous towards Ireland, and he moved that it be read a third time that day three months.—After much discussion, the amendment was rejected, by 61 to 15, and the bill passed.

7. ROMAN CATHOLICS' MARRIAGE BILL.—This bill, the principal object of which is to place Roman Catholics on the same footing with Protestant dissenters, as regarded the celebration of marriages, was read a second time in the House of Lords on Tuesday (August 20).—On Friday (22), it was read a third time and passed.

8. CHINA TRADE BILL.—Was read a third time in the House of Lords on Thursday (August 22), and passed.—An additional clause, proposed by Lord Auckland, was inserted, which makes 5s. the maximum tonnage on vessels entering China, and imposes a duty of ten per cent. upon the cargoes.

9. CHOLERA BILL.—On the motion of Mr Poulett Thompson, on Monday the 19th August, a bill to renew the cholera act of last session was read a first and second time; the standing orders of the house being suspended. On Tuesday, it went through the committee, and was read a third time and passed. On the same evening, it was read a first time in the House of Lords; on Wednesday it was read a second time, and went through the committee; and on Thursday was read a third time and passed.

10. FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT.—Lord Western, on Friday (August 23), moved the order of the day for the second reading of the bill for repealing the foreign enlistment act.—The Earl of Rosslyn hoped it would be withdrawn till next session.—Earl Grey and Lord Brougham professed themselves friendly to the principle of the bill, but agreed to withdraw it, on the ground of its having been introduced into the House of Commons at short notice, and sent up to the House of Peers at the close of the session. Next session they would support it.—The Duke of Wellington promised to oppose the bill whenever it should be brought forward.—The motion for the second reading was then discharged.

11. CHANCERY OFFICES' BILL.—On Thursday (August 22), Sir John Campbell moved the third reading of this bill, and explained, at great length, the objects of it, which he had been prevented from doing at an earlier stage. It went to abolish thirteen offices which had long existed, and which were nearly sinecures; in others the salaries were greatly reduced. The old system upon which these offices were conducted was this: there was the chief sinecurist, who did nothing; he appointed a deputy, who was allowed a larger salary than what ought to have been allowed to the office altogether. These reductions and abolitions would effect a saving to the public of L.21,670. Out of the savings thus effected, the suitors would receive L.9000 by a diminution of fees; L.2834 was to be paid to the suitors' fund, and L.9736 to the consolidated fund. The next branch of the bill applied to the Masters in Chancery, who each received upon an average L.3900 per annum from fees and perquisites. They were now to be paid a fixed sum of L.2500 each; and as there were ten of them, the saving would be L.14,000 per annum. The following were the reductions in the Masters' office:—

	Present Income.	Future Salaries.	Savings to Public.
Masters, averaging L.3900 a-year each	L.39,000	L.25,000	L.14,000
Their chief clerks, averaging L.1300 a-year each	13,000	10,000	3,000
The Master of the report-office	4,300	1,000	3,300
The registrars and their clerks	27,800	14,050	13,750
The two examiners	2,400	1,400	1,000

It was proposed in future to pay the Masters from the suitors' dead fund, so that the actual saving in all future suits would be the total of the Masters' present income 39,000

Savings by their chief clerks	3,000
Savings by registrars and clerks	13,750
There would thus be an immediate saving to suitors, in two offices alone, of per annum	L.55,750

Orders were to be all entirely abolished. Petitions and affidavits, formerly required by the Chancellor, were to be sent before the Master. The great object was to make the Masters efficient officers of the court.—Mr Sinclair said the bill reflected the highest credit on its author, Lord Brougham, but complained of giving Masters of Chancery more than the judges in the Court of Session, whose duties were very laborious. He had expected, after the pledges to that effect by Ministers, their salaries would have been increased.—Lord Althorp said the members of government had unanimously voted against increasing the salaries of the Scotch judges.—The bill was then read a third time and passed.—On Tuesday (August 27), the verbal amendments made by the Commons were agreed to by the House of Lords.

12. ROYAL MARRIAGE ACT.—On Tuesday (August 20), Colonel Williams moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal this act, which he said had produced an immensity of mischief, by forcing the heirs of the British throne to contract alliances with German despots, and by preventing the royal princesses from "following their own inclinations."—Sir John Campbell opposed the motion. He was anxious, he said, to prevent the idea going abroad that the act in question prevented the members of the royal family from marrying with English women. That was a vulgar and gross error. The act provided that no descendant of George the Second should marry any subject without the consent of the reigning sovereign; but if that consent were given, the marriage would be valid. Colonel Williams should be aware, that, by the common law of England, independently of the marriage act, the reigning sovereign had always the right to control the marriages of his children and heirs, and of the heir presumptive to the throne. The royal marriage act only provided that no descendant of George the Second should have a right to marry without that consent.—The motion was then withdrawn.

13. FOREIGN POLICY.—On Saturday (August 24), Colonel Evans brought forward a motion for papers respecting the recent foreign policy of Ministers. With respect to Portugal, the capital of which country was now in the possession of the queen, he had hoped that his Majesty's government, with that of France, would have announced their recognition of her Majesty. As Russia had prevented our interfering in the affairs of Portugal, he thought that, on the other hand, England and France should have prevented any interference in the affairs of Turkey on the part of Russia. The first question he would put was, whether the body of troops lately sent to Turkey by Russia were sent with the concurrence of the English government; and if not, whether, in opposition to any intervention on the part of the same, they had possessed themselves of the fortifications of the Dardanelles. He thought that some strong measure ought to be taken to check Russia, as it must certainly be evident to all that it was the policy of that country to extend her sway until she had completely nullified all the other European powers. He hoped the noble lord would take into consideration whether it were not desirable that a treaty be entered into between France and England to counterbalance that which existed between Russia and Turkey. He concluded by moving for the production of any papers which might be in the possession of his Majesty's government relating to these matters.—Mr Cutlar Fergusson seconded the motion, and concurred with him in all the topics he had introduced.—Lord Palmerston felt it right to correct one mistake into which the hon. and gallant member had fallen with respect to Portugal. He could assure the hon. and gallant member that Russia had not in any way whatever influenced our government in the line of conduct pursued towards Portugal. With regard to the conduct of France, he believed that government also to have acted on their own principles, without any consideration for the feelings of Russia. With regard to the affairs of the east, he was aware that it had been announced that a treaty had been concluded between Russia and Turkey, but nothing had been made known to his Majesty's government in relation to it; it was impossible therefore to give any information upon the subject. In answer to the question, whether the Russian troops had entered Turkey with the consent of England, or actually against her protest, he had merely to say, that, having the most entire confidence in the honour of Russia, and trusting that she would withdraw the troops as soon as her object should have been accomplished, they did not think it necessary to make any protest on the matter.—The motion was then withdrawn.—On Monday (Aug. 26), Mr Thomas Attwood again introduced the subject of our foreign policy. After expressing his delight at the recognition of Donna Maria as Queen of Portugal by the British government (which had taken place since the previous discussion), he proceeded to put various questions to Lord Palmerston respecting a treaty said to have been lately entered into between Holland and the United States, very detrimental to our interests—the refusal of assistance to Turkey against the Pacha—the object of Lord Durham's mission to Russia—and the reception of Count Orloff (the Russian ambassador) at the British court.—Lord Palmerston said, with regard to the first question, he had no knowledge of any treaty lately concluded between Holland and the United States. With respect to the second point, there was an error as to dates. It was in the month of October that the application for assistance by Turkey was made. Without giving any very detailed explanation of the matter, he would remind the house that we were then embarking in naval operations in the North Sea and on the coast of Holland, and were under the necessity of keeping up another naval force on the coast of Portugal; and without an application to Parliament, it would have been impossible to send to the Mediterranean such a squadron as would have served the purpose of the Porte, and at the same time have comported with the naval dignity of this country; and as Parliament was not then sitting, it was impossible for government to acquiesce in the request made by the Sultan. With respect to the mission of Lord Durham, great misapprehension had prevailed on that subject. The person who was ambassador at the court of St Petersburg left it in consequence of ill health, and it was before another was appointed that his lordship went out. He did not go with any specific instructions—he was charged with the whole general business of Europe for England at that court—his instructions embraced all points. The manner in which the noble lord had conducted that mission had obtained for him the unqualified approbation of his colleagues and his sovereign—his mission was perfectly successful. Then with regard to Count Orloff, he was not in this country on a mission: he had been sent to the Hague on one, but in this country he was more in the character of a distinguished traveller.—Mr Attwood spoke a few words, and the conversation dropped.

13. ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.—On Saturday (August 24), Lord Althorp moved that the house, on rising that day, do adjourn to Wednesday (28), in order to give the Peers time to bring up the arrears of business, which was accordingly done.

14. ROYAL ASSENT.—On Wednesday (August 28), the royal assent was given by commission to about sixty bills; among which were the East India charter, China trade, colonial slavery, Irish grand jury, fines and recoveries, and Chancery Offices bills.

15. LONG SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Sir Robert Inglis, on Thursday (August 29), upon presenting the forty-first report of the committee upon public petitions, called the attention of the house to the length of its sittings during this and preceding sessions. It appeared from a statement, which had been prepared with great care, that the house, during the present session, had sat more than twice the number of days, and nearly three times the number of hours that were occupied in the session of 1826, during which the house sat 64 days, or 457 hours. Even the great reform session of 1831 sat only 98 days, or 918 hours; while, in the present session, the house had, up to yesterday, sat 142 days, or 1270 hours. The session of 1806, it appeared, had occupied 125 days, or 645 hours, giving an average proportion of 5 hours each day; the session of 1807, 86 days, or 434 hours, giving also an average proportion of 5 hours each day. In 1811, the Parliament sat 135 days, or 588 hours, which gave an average of only 4½ hours each day; and in 1814, the sittings occupied 127 days, or 476 hours, which was not 4 hours each day. It was a cruel mockery to compare factory labour with the labours of the house; for from these statements it would be seen, that, during the whole session, the house had been occupied 9 hours a-day on an average; and for the much larger portion of the session, namely, since Easter, considerably more than 12 hours a-day. These facts had not been collected by himself, but by one of the most able and intelligent officers of the house, whose presence prevented him from saying more.

16. THE PROROGATION.—On Thursday (August 29), the King entered the House of Lords about two o'clock, and took his seat on the throne. The Commons were then summoned to attend; and the Speaker soon made his appearance, accompanied by several members. The royal assent was given to a number of bills.—The Lord Chancellor then, on bended knee, presented the King with a copy of the following speech, which his Majesty read with a firm and distinct voice:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"In opening the present Parliament I stated, that never at any time had subjects of greater interest and magnitude called for your attention. The manner in which you have discharged the duties then committed to you now demands my warmest acknowledgment, and enables me to close a session not more remarkable for its extraordinary duration, than for the patient and persevering industry which you have displayed in many laborious inquiries, and in perfecting the various legislative measures which have been brought under your consideration.

"I continue to receive from my allies, and from all the foreign powers, assurances of their friendly disposition.

"I regret that I cannot yet announce to you the conclusion of a definitive arrangement between Holland and Belgium. But the convention which, in conjunction with the King of the French, I concluded in May last with the King of the Netherlands, prevents a renewal of hostilities in the Low Countries, and thus affords a fresh security for the general continuance of peace.

"Events which have lately taken place in Portugal have induced me to renew my diplomatic relations with that kingdom, and I have accredited a minister to the court of her most faithful majesty at Lisbon. You may rest assured that I look with the greatest anxiety to the moment when the Portuguese monarchy, so long united with this country by the ties of alliance and the closest bonds of interest, may be restored to a state of peace, and regain its former prosperity.

"The hostilities which had disturbed the peace of Turkey have been terminated, and you may be assured that my attention will be carefully directed to any events which may affect the present state or the future independence of that empire.

"An investigation, carefully prosecuted during the last session, has enabled you to renew the charter of the Bank of England, on terms which appear to be well calculated to sustain public credit, and to secure the usefulness of that important establishment.

"The laborious inquiries carried on by committees of both houses of Parliament for several successive sessions, have also enabled you to bring the affairs of the East India Company to a satisfactory adjustment. I have the more confident expectation that the system of government thus established will prove to have been wisely framed for the improvement and happiness of the natives of India; whilst, by the opening of the China trade, a new field has been afforded for the activity and enterprise of British commerce.

"The state of slavery in my colonial possessions has necessarily occupied a portion of your time and your attention, commensurate with the magnitude and difficulty of the subject. Whilst your deliberations have been guided by the paramount considerations of justice and humanity, the interests of the colonial proprietors have not been overlooked. I trust that the future proceedings of the Assemblies, and the conduct of all classes in my colonies, may be such as to give full effect to the benevolent intentions of the legislature, and to satisfy the just expectations of my people.

"I observe with satisfaction that the amendment of the law has continued to occupy your attention, and that several important measures have been adopted, by some of which the titles to property have been rendered more secure, and the conveyance of it more easy; whilst by others the proceedings in the courts of law and equity have been made more expeditious and less costly. The establishment of the Court of Privy Council is another improvement, which, while it materially assists suitors at home, will, I trust, afford substantial relief to those in my foreign possessions.

"You may rest assured that there is no part of your labours which I regard with a deeper interest than that which tends, by well-considered amendments of the law, to make justice easily accessible to all my subjects.

"With this view I have caused a commission to be issued for digesting into one body the enactments of the criminal law, and for inquiring how far and by what means a similar process may be extended to the other branches of our jurisprudence. I have also directed commissions to be issued for investigating the state of the municipal corporations throughout the United Kingdom. The result of their inquiries will enable you to mature those means which may seem best fitted to place the internal government of corporate cities and towns upon a solid foundation, in respect of their finances, their judicature, and their police. In the meantime, two important acts have been passed for giving constitutions upon sound principles to the royal and parliamentary burghs of Scotland. Your attention will therefore be called to the expediency of extending similar advantages to the unincorporated towns in England, which have now acquired the right of returning members to Parliament.

"It was with the greatest pain that I felt myself compelled to call upon you for additional powers to control and punish the disturbers of the public peace in Ireland.

This call was answered, as I confidently expected, by your loyalty and firmness. I have not found it necessary, except in a very limited degree, to use the powers confided to me, and I have now the satisfaction of forming you that the spirit of insubordination and licence, which had prevailed to so alarming an extent, been in a great measure subdued.

"I look forward with anxiety to the time when the painful necessity of continuing this measure of great unavoidable severity may cease; and I have given my sent, with unqualified satisfaction, to the various salutary and remedial measures, which, during the course of the present session, have been proposed to me for my acceptance.

"The act, which, in pursuance of my recommendation you have passed with respect to the temporalities of the branch of the united church which is established in Ireland, and for the immediate and total abolition of vestments, and the acts for the better regulation of juries, both as to their civil and criminal functions, affords the best proofs that full reliance may be placed on Parliament of the United Kingdom for the introduction of such beneficial improvements as may ensure the well of all classes of my subjects; and thus effectually cementing that legislative union, which, with your support, it is determination to maintain inviolate.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I thank you for the supplies which you have granted for the service of the year. The estimates proposed by my direction were considerably lower than those of former sessions, and you have wisely applied savings which have thus been effected to a diminution of the public burdens. In this course of judicious economy, combined with a due regard to the exigencies of the state, I am persuaded that you will persevere, and thus confirm the title which you have acquired to general confidence, as the faithful guardians of the honour of the crown, and of the true interests of the people.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"In returning to your respective counties, you will carry with you the gratifying reflection that your labours have been assiduously employed for the benefit of your fellow-subjects. During the recess, your attention will be equally directed to the same important object. As in this useful and honourable discharge both of your public and private duties, under the blessing of Divine Providence, I confidently rely for the encouragement and support of my people in that love of liberty and order, that spirit of industry and obedience to the laws, and that moral worth, which constitute the safety and happiness of nations."

Then the Lord Chancellor, by his Majesty's command, said—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It is his Majesty's royal will and pleasure that Parliament be prorogued to Thursday, the 31st day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Thursday, the 31st day of October next.

The Commons retired, and the King left the house.—In the House of Commons, the Speaker, as usual, read the royal speech; then shook hands with Lord Althorp, Sir James Graham, and other members, and the whole separated.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

THE close of the first session of the reformed Parliament has very naturally been made the occasion of a general comment; for instituting a comparison of its labours with those of its predecessors, and thus determining the result of the "grand experiment" which it owed its existence. As might be expected, the public judgment is, or is represented as being, much divided on the subject; and any one inclined to be satirical, might find ample matter for the indulgence of his humour, in the diversity of extreme opinions promulgated by the different parties in the state; all of which is very natural, and only what any one acquainted with the feelings which actuate mankind must have anticipated. Posterity, however, will not, on this account, feel the less curious to know the tone and temper of the public mind at such a crisis, and we have thought it worth while to collate a few of the decisions pronounced by the more influential portion of the newspaper press, and which, we believe, may be held as pretty truly representing the opinions of the various parties in the country.

MINISTERIAL.

TIMES.—All the important business of the session has been transacted within the last five or six weeks, and the vast majority of the session has been taken up with long-winded and unprofitable speeches, many upon motions which seemed to have been brought forward with no other object than that of furnishing topics for display to garrulous vanity, and a means of fictitious reputation out of doors. The "display" were, in nine cases out of ten, lamentable failures, while the motions have been so seldom pressed to division, that the most extended charity will hardly induce any one to believe that they could have originated in any serious desire to benefit the public. The vice of interminable prating must be eradicated, or the next session the House of Commons will become a positive nuisance. Upon the whole, it may be remarked, as to this first session of a reformed House of Commons, that the new instrument has worked more kindly in some respects than its most sanguine ends had predicted from so unripe an experiment; and that it has signally disappointed the forebodings of its enemies, who stigmatised, by anticipation, an assembly chosen by the people as one through which would be "impossible to carry on the public business—as a slave and pander to the lawless mob—as a wild democracy, inconsistent with the maintenance of property and order, and repugnant to the spirit of our monarchical constitution."

MORNING CHRONICLE.—The first session of the reformed Parliament is now at an end. We may say, without fear of contradiction, that a great deal of time has been spent very unprofitably. The system of discussing the various clauses of long bills in committees of the whole house, seems to us to betray a great want of skill in the mode of conducting business. The speech of his Majesty contains a clear and succinct account of the labours of the session, and indicates some of the subjects which must be entered on at the next session. The view which is taken in it of our foreign relations is fair and candid. The representatives of the people may not in all cases have deemed their pledges; and the constituencies may have expected more from Ministers and the reformed Parliament than has been realised. But we cannot help thinking that, on reflection, they will admit that much has been done both in the way of reduction of expenditure and improvement of our institutions. And it ought to be borne in mind, that the vessel of the state is now fairly launched on the sea of reform; that what has been gained this session in the way of reduction and municipal improvement, lays the foundation for still further reduction, and still further improvement. The balance of the constitution has been inclined towards reform; and what we have not received this year, we shall infallibly obtain in future years.

GLOBE.—As the first reformed Parliament has at last been prorogued, it may be well to compare the state of affairs now with that in which they were just before the present Ministers came into office. At home, and in the metropolis, in 1830, the King was advised by his Ministers not to go into the city, for the people were either so dissatisfied or so wretched from taxation and want of employment, that it was apprehended they might insult their sovereign, notwithstanding his recent accession to the throne, and the popular profession of the navy, in which he was reared. In 1833, whenever his Majesty or his court appear, "swift unspoken pomps" proclaim his approach, and there is not a city in the world where attachment to the government and loyalty to the prince are more manifested or more marked than in London. In 1830 there raged in this country a systematic riot and turbulence, and a general discontent, which was not inaptly stigmatised as a servile war. In 1833, the manufacturers are fully employed at comparatively high wages, and the peasantry generally so at wages which, if not ample, are much better than heretofore, and that notwithstanding the reasonable price of all the necessities of life, and the great cheapness of wearing apparel. Peace and confidence are restored, and the relations of master and servant, tenant and landlord, gradually becoming, as in the best times, the bonds of affection and attachment—not, as under the old Tory system of corruption, profusion, and severity, the badge of hatred, dishonour, and hostility. In Europe and France, in the autumn of 1830, every thing appeared unsettled and warlike, and the world was perplexed not only with the dread of change, but with the approach of general collision and war. In Portugal, indeed, the civil war still rages; but under what different circumstances! In the two great cities of that kingdom, the authority which two successive monarchs of Great Britain and their respective cabinets have recognised as legitimate, is fully established—the English name is respected—the English connection is cherished, and the English merchant sailed and treated from one end of the coast to the other as a brother and a countryman. In the meanwhile, confidence is restored, commerce and trade reviving, and a fair prospect afforded of these blessings being substantially secured by permanent and liberal institutions, and by the authority and presence of a regency and sovereign attached to the crown and people of Great Britain by the ties of recent obligation and gratitude, as well as ancient treaties and obvious interest. Let those who really are Conservatives, that is, who love order and tranquillity combined with liberty, justice, and prosperity, look to the condition of Englishmen at home and abroad, and deny, if they can, that a liberal Ministry and a reformed Parliament have been successful in discovering the secret of preserving these blessings.

ANTI-MINISTERIAL.

MORNING POST.—The reformed Parliament has completed its first session, distinguished from parliaments not reformed only or chiefly by the circumstance, that the community at large recognise now for the first time, in the cessation of parliamentary labour, a great public good. The speech of his Majesty consists almost entirely of a summary of the legislative acts of the session, mingled with expressions of praise, which, as the authors of the acts are also the authors of the speech, may be considered of doubtful value. The general allusion to the state of foreign affairs conveys just as much meaning as such allusions generally convey—that is, none at all; while, upon the single branch of foreign policy, which excited the desire and the expectation of something more definite and intelligible, that which relates to Portugal, his Majesty is restricted to the communication of the fact, that the diplomatic relations of England with that country have been renewed, and to the expression of his royal wish for the restoration of peace, happiness, and prosperity to its inhabitants. As to the style of king's speeches, we would not be fastidiously critical. The statesmen by whom they are written, often are, and always ought to be, intent upon graver matters than mere elegancies of composition. But if we wanted any proof that the boasted march of intellect is a retrograde march, and might be permitted to infer meanness and barbarity of thought from meanness and barbarity of language, we should point with confidence to the King's speech of yesterday.

INDEPENDENT.

MORNING HERALD.—The first session of the reformed Parliament has closed—not with a degree of eclat commensurate with the splendid anticipations which attended its opening. The public may have been unreasonable in the hopes which they indulged of the rapid and effective working for the national benefit of the new machinery of representation; but if they have indulged in hopes unreasonable and extravagant, it should be remembered that those hopes had been cherished by the lavish promises of candidates who have been very scant of their performance, and whose conduct on the floor of Parliament has formed a striking and instructive contrast with their professions on the hustings. Some there are who have well maintained the character of independence which should ever distinguish the representatives of the people; but no one can have attended to the proceedings of the past session, without coming to the painful conclusion, that no small number of persons have, somehow or other, obtained admission into the first reformed House of Commons, who are mere hunters after place and its emoluments—men destitute of talent, intelligence, and public virtue, and who, in less excited times, would not be able to persuade any enlightened body of constituents that they possessed the requisites which should belong to the legislators of a great empire. His Majesty's speech, or rather the speech of the Ministers of the crown, is exuberant of gratitude, and it ought to be; for never had any Ministers to deal with a more subservient body of representatives. If they committed an error by removing a burden from the people's shoulders, as in the case of the malt tax, or abating some grievous oppression, as in the case of the factory system, they had sufficient docility, when properly lectured, to repair the error and make atonement for the indiscretion, by replacing the burden and restoring the grievance. History will not fail to do adequate justice to such exalted consistency.

ATLAS.—A more laborious session is not upon record; and although much of its time was frittered away in idle declamation and unprofitable motions, yet it must be admitted on all hands, that a vast amount of public business has been actually transacted since it met. Considering that it was the first session of the reformed Parliament; that it contained a large infusion of popular spirit, somewhat rudely blended with the great mass; that much was expected; that an eager desire for personal distinction, and the fulfilment of extravagant pledges, prevailed, and that the novelty of many of the parts prevented the harmonious working of the whole, we think that it has established a favourable claim, notwithstanding the many practical inconsistencies it exhibited, to the approbation of the country. It is true, that in one part of the empire reform seems to have deteriorated the quality of representation, and that Ireland has not gained either in the respectability, the weight, or the abilities of her representatives, by the measure that enlarged her electoral privileges. But the circumstances of Ireland are anomalous, and the struggle to obtain one object, which the people suffered themselves to be persuaded was necessary to their welfare, deceived them into a hasty submission to the dictates of a sovereign demagogue, who put the representation of one half of the country into his pocket. Hence the inequality of personal character and intellectual influence that was exhibited on the surface of the bygone session. But mediocrity and impudence must settle down to their natural level; and as the experience of the Parliament advances, and the members begin to feel their strength, and to fall into their proper places, and the pressure of business displaces the vanity of individual display and turbulent politics, we anticipate that the reformed Parliament will be found to accomplish its destiny, not, perhaps, so successfully as could be desired, but with sufficient utility to justify the confidence of the people. It certainly ought to have done more, considering the time that it consumed in the session just closed, but it ought not to be forgotten that it did a great deal.

LIBERAL.

SPECTATOR.—The curtain falls on the first session of the reformed Parliament; is the nation—are the electors of the House of Commons—satisfied with the performance? We believe not. Disappointment—at one time we might have used a harsher word than disappointment—has prevailed through the greater part of the session, to the very close; and this feeling is not confined to rash and unscrupulous innovators and inexperienced dreamers in politics, but extends to large bodies of cautious and thoughtful men, whose expectations are moderate, and their views constitutional and patriotic. They say that, hitherto, they have seen little or no difference between a reformed Parliament and an unreformed Parliament; this, in one word, is the cause of quarrel—and the complaint is general. The grand error of a large majority of the members of the present Parliament, has been their neglect of proper preparation. They were evidently under the impression, that with the reform Ministry at the head of affairs, nothing could go wrong. The consequences of this error would not have been so disastrous to the reputation of our representatives, had Ministers themselves been equal to the performance of the duties required from them. So far from this being the case, however, their ignorance, inaptitude, and negligence, have been astounding. The history of their measures proves that this assertion is not too harsh or sweeping. The most thoroughgoing of their partisans cannot deny the recorded facts of the Parliamentary journals. Every measure of importance (except, perhaps, the East India bill)—the coercion, Irish church, bank charter, and slavery bills, and their measures of finance, required perpetual amendments and remodelling; and many of their most essential features bore little resemblance, when they finally received his Majesty's sanction, to those which they possessed when first introduced by the Minister. In all their changes, they still received the steady support of large, though frequently dissatisfied majorities. Now, why did these dissatisfied gentlemen vote for these measures? Principally, we believe, from the conviction which weighed upon them, that they had no choice. Many clearheaded men saw at a glance that the government had blundered; that their measures were inefficient, and all but impracticable; but, owing to the previous reliance upon the wisdom of our rulers, they had neglected to prepare better plans of their own as substitutes. The various subjects, too, having been once broached, there were strong arguments for their "settlement," as it was termed—though in many instances erroneously so—with as little delay as possible. Any thing, it was said, is better than suspense—matters cannot go on as they are: and thus, measures disgracefully bungled were hurried through the house amidst the anger and sneers of the very men who voted for them. That Ministers are justly liable to the gravest censure for the incomplete state and the ill-considered manner in which nearly every measure of the session was brought forward, there can be no doubt. The blind confidence which was so liberally awarded to them was misplaced, and indiscreet under any circumstances. Public patience has been severely tried during the last few months. Not merely have a large class of the measures passed in Parliament been objectionable, but others—such as the repeal of the septennial act, the declaration against sinecures, the abolition of military flogging, and almost every question relative to the freedom of the press—have been discussed in a style and tone which ill became the reformed house. The independent party have hitherto failed to satisfy just expectation almost as much as the mere ministerialists. They must totally change their present tactics, and learn to act in concert. If they mean to effect substantial good to the country, the different members must, for a time at least, throw aside their own peculiar, and, under present circumstances, impracticable plans, and unite in some feasible attempt to benefit their constituents. As it is, one aims at an alteration of the currency, another at the abolition of the corn laws, another at extensive emigration, and so forth; each insisting upon the pre-eminent importance of his own project, but refusing to exert himself heartily for that of a brother member. This is not the way in which a Ministry is to be kept in check, or a nation to be benefited by its representatives. In proof of this, we ask, what has the independent party effected for the country during the last six months?

EXAMINER.—Ministers thank their subservient majority, as they well may do, for their profligate votes of the public money; brag of diminution of burdens (in tiles and tax-carts); give themselves the praise (no one else will give them) of a judicious economy; and tell their creatures that they have confirmed the title they had acquired (when? and how?) to general confidence, as the faithful guardians of the true interests of the people. No other mouth but the unfortunate King's could these men get to utter these prodigious inventions. They make his Majesty the trumpet upon which to sound their own note of praise, and they do it like men who know that they must take the matter into their own hands, and make the fullest and freest use of their only opportunity. All this is said of the most unpopular Parliament that ever closed the disappointments and vexations of a session! But by whom is the praise given? By the King? No. By the Ministers, who have dragged it through the dirt, and protest that the ordure is frankincense.

Foreign News.

PORTUGAL.

SINCE our last, the courts of England, France, and Sweden, have officially recognised Donna Maria as Queen of Portugal. This was done by the British government on August 15th, when Lord William Russell delivered to Don Pedro his credentials for this purpose. The young queen arrived at Portsmouth on Sunday, September 8, on her way to Lisbon. OCTOBER, 1833.

bon, and, in consequence of the command of his majesty, was received with royal honours. All the yards of the vessels were manned, and she entered amid loud cheers and discharges of artillery. Sir James Graham and other distinguished persons received her majesty, and she was conducted to the residence of the port admiral. On Tuesday evening, the queen, with her stepmother, the Duchess of Braganza, proceeded to Windsor, where she was royally entertained for several days by their majesties. They sailed, on the afternoon of the 18th, for Lisbon, in the Soho steamer.

For several weeks during August and the early part of September, the forces of Don Pedro appear to have employed themselves exclusively in fortifying their main position in Lisbon, while those of Don Miguel, under Marshal Bourmont, amounting to above 20,000, and thus greatly outnumbering their opponents, remained in no distant quarters, preparing for a grand attack on the capital. This attack took place, September 5, being chiefly directed to the northern quarter of Lisbon; but, though apparently in the first instance crowned with some success, it was not eventually triumphant. On the 7th, the assailing troops do not appear to have remained in possession of any part of the city; and every thing had resumed its wonted position.

On the 9th, the army of Don Miguel advanced upon the palace of Ajuda, which they pillaged, and then retired. Upon the whole, it appears that the prospects of this individual are not so desperate as they appeared after his evacuation of Lisbon. His army under Bourmont doubles the whole forces of Don Pedro. He has another army of 3000 in the south, under Larochejaquelein. The whole country, besides Oporto and Lisbon, is in his hands. The priests are indefatigable in exerting their immense influence to supply him with recruits, who are said to pour in very fast. The forces of Don Pedro are said to be in great distress for provisions, and dare not go into the country except in large numbers, on account of the resentment and hostility of the populace. Again, it has been formally announced that Britain will afford him no actual assistance. He must sink or swim with the forces which he at present possesses.

About five thousand pipes of wine have been destroyed by the Miguelites at Oporto.

FRANCE.

THE King has been making a tour in the northern quarter of his dominions, where he is stated to have been very favourably received. At Cherbourg he had an interview with Lord Durham, which is held to indicate some stir in the western cabinets in reference to the congress of the eastern sovereigns. Louis Philip is now so unpopular with his subjects at Paris, that bets are freely laid that he will not be in possession of the throne a twelvemonth. There can be no doubt, from that infallible test, the circulation of the newspapers, that the party against this monarch is rapidly increasing.

Great numbers of Carlists are said to be on the way to visit the royal exiles at Prague, to congratulate the young prince, whom they style Henry the Fifth, on his attaining his majority of thirteen. The Duchess de Berri is also on the point of visiting her relatives, with the hope of being reconciled to them.

RUSSIA.

A PLOT is stated to have been discovered for the assassination of the emperor. The individuals concerned appear to be Poles returned from France; but the accounts received on the subject are exceedingly obscure.

The Russian government have issued a new catechism for the use of the schools in the Polish provinces of Russia. We insert a few of the queries and answers laid down in it, that our readers may have some idea of the genuine spirit of absolutism, as it exists even at the nineteenth century. No other motive could induce us to stain our pages with this revolting effusion of despotism and blasphemy. It is printed at Wilna, 1832.

Q. How is the authority of the emperor to be considered in reference to the spirit of Christianity?—A. As proceeding immediately from God.

Q. What duties does religion teach us, the humble subjects of his Majesty, the Emperor of Russia, to practise towards him?—A. Worship, obedience, fidelity, the payment of taxes, service, love and prayer, the whole being comprised in the words worship and fidelity.

Q. What kind of obedience do we owe him?—A. An entire, passive, and unbounded obedience in every point of view.

Q. Is the service of his majesty, the emperor, obligatory on us?—A. Absolutely so; we should, if required, sacrifice ourselves in compliance with his will, both in a civil and military capacity, and in whatever manner he deems expedient.

Q. How are irreverence and infidelity to the emperor to be considered in reference to God?—A. As the most heinous sin, the most frightful criminality.

Q. What motive have we to fulfil the duties above enumerated?—A. The motives are twofold—some natural, others revealed.

Q. What are the supernatural revealed motives for this worship?—A. The supernatural revealed motives are, that the emperor is the vicegerent and minister of God to execute the divine commands; and, consequently, disobedience to the emperor is identified with disobedience to God himself; that God will reward us in the world to come for the worship and obedience we render the emperor, and punish us severely to all eternity should we disobey and neglect to worship him.

Q. What books prescribe these duties?—A. The New and Old Testaments, and particularly the Psalms, Gospels, and Apostolic Epistles.

Q. What examples confirm this doctrine?—A. The example of Jesus Christ himself, who lived and died in allegiance to the Emperor of Rome, and respectfully submitted to the judgment which condemned him to death. We have, moreover, the example of the apostles, who both loved and respected them; they suffered meekly in dungeons conformably to the will of emperors, and did not revolt like malefactors and traitors. We must, therefore, in imitation of these examples, suffer and be silent.

Q. At what period did the custom originate of praying to the Almighty for the prosperity of the sovereign?—The custom of publicly praying for the emperors is coeval with the introduction of Christianity; which custom is to us the most valuable legacy and splendid gift we have received from past ages.

JAMAICA.

THE amended plan of Ministers, for the extinction of colonial slavery, was received in Jamaica on the 19th July, and gave general satisfaction to the planters. The slaves, however, are stated to be grumbling at the new condition of apprenticeship into which they are transferred, but chiefly on account of their being thus no longer at ease on the subjects of sickness and old age.

SOUTH AMERICA.

THE states of South America are now recovering rapidly from the unfortunate civil broils in which they have been so many years engaged, and there is much reason to hope that we shall soon enjoy a lucrative commerce with those countries. The happiness of the Great Central Colombian Republic is said to have been achieved mainly by its late separation into three states, Venezuela, New Grenada, and Quito; the union of these incongruous elements having been productive of only discord and misery.

CONGRESS OF SOVEREIGNS.

CONSIDERABLE attention has been attracted, during the past month, to a congress of the sovereigns of the east of Europe, which, after being long contemplated, has at length taken place at a town in Bohemia, designated Munchen-Gratz. The sovereigns are the Emperors of Russia and Austria, and the King of Prussia. No doubt appears to be entertained that the object of these monarchs is to devise measures for arresting the progress of liberal opinion in Europe, though what shape such measures could take, in the present state of feeling, is utterly beyond calculation. A power appears to have been reserved for forming a rupture with Great Britain and France, in the breaking off of the negotiations respecting Holland and Belgium, which has taken place since our last. It also appears that Prussia has been forming a party in the Swiss Confederation, as if with the view of obtaining a centre of action near France. Its hopes in this quarter, however, are stated to be for the present blighted. Disturbances, it is well known, have long agitated the cantons of Basle and Neuchâtel; and the malcontents in the latter state lately petitioned Prussia to be taken under its protection. The Swiss Diet has just put down these movements by occupying Neuchâtel with the troops of the confederation. The Prussian ambassador thought proper to protest against this proceeding; but it is said the only reply he will receive, is to be one expressing surprise at his interference. Since then, the canton has sent deputies to the Diet as usual.

Upon the whole, it is impossible to see the least chance which these sovereigns can have of suppressing liberal institutions and opinions in the powerful countries where they are already triumphant. The parties in those countries which might have been expected to befriend such an effort, are reduced to a state of perfect powerlessness; and every day which passes, without showing any actual mischief as arising from the new opinions, gives them fresh strength and durability.

IRELAND.

EARLY in the past month the Ministry appointed the Marquis of Wellesley to succeed the Marquis of Anglesea as Lord-Lieutenant, the latter nobleman (who, it is said, will be created Duke of Mona) having found it necessary to retire on account of his long declining health. The Marquis of Wellesley was formerly Lord-Lieutenant, and conciliated the popular party by discountenancing the Orangemen. But he is now 73, and though, from his selection by Ministers, a liberal administration may be expected, it seems to be feared that he has not sufficient energy remaining to discharge ably the critical and onerous duties imposed upon him.

During the summer, as usual, Ireland has been comparatively tranquil. But, notwithstanding the coercion bill, or rather perhaps in consequence in some measure of that act, there is much reason to expect dreadful disturbances in the winter, when the people have the pinch of both cold and hunger to excite them. A most determined resistance to the payment of rent has already sprung up in the county of Limerick, and the landlords are stated to be in the greatest alarm. A mischievous spirit has also been manifested in the county of Armagh. The combination system, lately so prevalent among the tradesmen of Britain, has also spread to Ireland, which for once has been the recipient instead of the giving party in the interchange of the elements of disturbance.

The loss, by the recent burning of Dublin custom-house (detailed in our last), is stated to be £140,000.

The sufferers have claimed compensation to amount from the government. No cue has been to the origin of the fire.

ENGLAND.

DISASTERS BY SEA.

On the evening of Friday, the 30th August, and some places rather earlier, one of the severest that have visited the coasts of this island for years, commenced blowing. The range of its force was chiefly confined to the shores of England, Holland, and France, and the amount of damage which it produced is prodigious. On all these coasts a great number of vessels have been damaged or wrecked; while, by land, much injury was done upon hop-plantations, gardens, and orchards. Houses were unroofed, and streets flooded in the towns on the coast. By far the most calamitous occurrence at sea appears to have been the loss of the Amphitrite convict ship, which was cast upon the French coast near Boulogne, on Friday the 30th.

This vessel sailed for New South Wales, from Woolwich, on the 25th of August. Captain Hamilton was the commander; Mr Forrester the surgeon; there were 108 female convicts, 12 children, a crew of sixteen persons. The captain was the owner of the vessel. When the ship arrived at Dungeness, the gale began. On Friday morning the captain hove the ship to, the gale being too heavy to sail. At noon on Saturday, owing to the wind being round from the south-west to the north-west, the vessel went upon the shore a little way to the east of Boulogne harbour. In the language of an officer who was afterwards appointed by the Admiralty to inquire into the circumstances, "the ship behaved very well, was well found, and made little or no water." The conduct of the master, more particularly in the danger was discovered, was seaman-like, judicious and decisive, and he was perfectly cool and collected throughout. When he saw that it was impossible to avoid the land, he told the mate that they must get out for the best berth, and run her up as high as possible. The helm was put up, the after-sail taken in, and the yards squared for that purpose as the ship grounded; after which the anchor was let go, and the chain cable shoved out, with the view of lighting the ship forward; and, subsequently, the shackle was taken out, and the cable slipped, that the vessel might drive up as the tide rose, the maintop sails being set up to assist her. Neither the master, the surgeon, nor the crew, had any fears for their safety, or apprehended their inevitable fate on the rise of the tide. The pilots declare that no vessel, whatever her strength, could possibly have been saved, and made no signals. The greater part of the crew were below in the evening, some to supper, and others to their hammocks, and were there till the ship broke over them, about nine o'clock, believing the ship made no water after striking heavily on the first grounding, that she would float up, and be left high and dry after high water. No steps were taken to save the crew by getting on shore, although they had the means for doing so within themselves by their own boats, and also it was proposed to them, in two instances, by some gallant French pilots and fishermen; and it is evident there was a reasonable hope that all hands might have been saved by either of these means, from the time they were struck, at about half-past four, till near seven in the evening; for this sad error in judgment, they paid an extreme penalty; it is through this fatal error the lives of the crew and the poor wretched passengers were sacrificed; for there is no reason to believe, from the evidence of the three surviving seamen (all intelligent men for their situations), that either the master or surgeon feared or thought about the escape of the poor convicts. It was at one time ordered the surgeon to get the long-boat out to land the convicts, but, most unhappily, this was prevented by the interference of his (the surgeon's) wife, [who, in pride, objected to going on shore in the same boat with convicts.] "This occurrence was not known to the master."

It appears that these unfortunate creatures were battered down under the hatches, but, when darkness approached, broke wildly through that barrier, and frantically rushed on deck. About seven o'clock the flood-tide began, and the crew, seeing there were no hopes of landing, clung to the rigging. The poor women and 12 children remained on deck for an hour and a half, uttering the most piteous cries. Several persons, including the captain, subsequently trusted themselves to spars, and endeavoured to reach the shore; but only three men, Owen, Towsey, and Rice, accomplished this object, being all that were saved out of 136 persons. The ship eventually broke in two, when all the women and others remaining on deck disappeared in the gulf that yawned for their destruction.

Some blame was at first thrown by the public upon Mr Hamilton, the British consul at Boulogne, for being present to order the convicts on shore; but on an inquiry, his conduct turns out entirely free of reproach.

The second disaster in point of importance as to loss of life, was the beaching of the Earl of Wemyss schooner (trading between London and Leith), off Brancaster, Wells, which took place on the morning of Saturday the 31st, after the vessel had been for twenty-four hours ageable. Owing to some very culpable negligence, the female part of the passengers were left to perish in the cabin, while the remainder of the individuals on board got off to shore. The names of the sufferers are, Hamilton, her son, and daughter; Mrs Pyne, her daughter; Mrs Cornac and son; Miss Susan Pyne and nephew; and Mrs W. Brown. It appears that the vessel was in no respect damaged by coming on shore, except in the rudder. The unhappy disaster was occasioned by the sea washing over the deck, and filling the ladies' cabin by penetrating through the skylights. Had the unfortunate sufferers been fixed to the deck, they would have been quite safe. The Ardincaple steamer, trading between Leith and Aberdeen, left the former port on the morning of Sunday, September 1, with about forty persons, including crew, on board. She was struck about noon by a tremendous sea near Holy Island, by which nine persons were swept overboard, including the master, who with four others perished. The vessel, then in a dreadfully shattered condition, and leaky, was moored within two miles of shore. In this sad condition she lay till Monday, when a codger picked off the remaining passengers, and they were landed in the evening at Hartley. The wreck was sent to the Tyne on Tuesday morning. It appears that not eight lives have been lost in this disastrous event.

It was remarked, when the King went in state to promote Parliament on Thursday, August 29th, that not the slightest popular enthusiasm was displayed, though he behaved with decorum.

His Majesty has lately presented the female members of his family with £5,000 each.

The Duke and Duchess of Cumberland are about to proceed to Berlin with their son Prince George, where he will remain for some time. The young prince is to be put under the charge of a physician at Berlin, from whose skill the duke himself derived great benefit in his youth some years ago.

Mr Manners Sutton has been made a Knight of the Bath. This honour is said to be a voluntary act on the part of his Majesty, who refused last session to confer on him a peerage at the request of Earl Grey.

London has been officially declared free of cholera. A shopkeeper in Holborn lately complained at one of the police offices, that the omnibuses stopped no fewer than 544 times each day in front of his premises.

Of great interest, it is said, is making to obtain the new appointments of magistrates in the West India islands; and the smallness of the salaries (£300 a year) does not seem to hold out any very tempting allurement.

Less than 134 notices of motions for the next session have been entered on the books of the House of Commons, twenty-five of which are for committees of inquiry. There are likewise amongst them four for triennial parliaments, and three for excluding the bishops from the House of Lords.

A requisition is in course of signature for convening an early general meeting of the friends and admirers of late Mr Wilberforce connected with Yorkshire. The requisition is signed by the Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of York, Earl Carlisle, Earl Fitzwilliam, and several others of the principal noblemen and gentlemen of the county.

A correspondent in Manchester informs us that the new bill is likely to be made a dead letter, by the passive resistance of the factory-owners. We are told that their determination to disregard the eight hours' regulation altogether; that they will employ no children at all; will not work the same number of hours—twelve or thirteen—as the adults; and that the first conviction under the new act will be the signal for all of them to close their factories, and thus throw the whole of the immense manufacturing population at once out of employ. Such a course of things could not long continue; but the masters whose act it would be, are better able to hold out the workmen in the case of a strike among themselves. So desperate an opposition to the working of the measure could not have been seriously entertained upon strong grounds; and if it is carried into effect, it will afford prima facie evidence of the injustice and impolicy of the new law.—Spectator.

An extraordinary instance of presence of mind occurred at a fire in Monmouth Street, London, on the 29th inst., by which the lives of a whole family were saved. The daughter of a man who resided in the house had been turned out of doors for some misconduct by her mother, but, taking advantage of his absence from home the day above day, went to see her mother; and just as she was about to depart, the house was discovered to be on fire, and the flames had gained such an ascendancy on the staircase, as to prevent any person descending from the upper apartments. The daughter, seeing the dangerous situation in which her mother and sisters and herself were placed, seized a poker, and, jumping on the roof, succeeded in making a hole in the ceiling and roof sufficient to admit a person creeping through. The mother then first ascended, and drew the children up, one by one, after her. On reaching the fourth child, she became exhausted, and let it fall. At this time the flames were bursting through the floor in several places, the child's clothes instantly caught fire. Still the young woman's courage and presence of mind did not leave her; and although her own dress was then blazing round her, she seized her sister in her arms, and aided in clambering through the hole on to the roof, where the whole party then took refuge in the adjoining room; and scarcely had they entered it, when the floor on which they had been standing but a few seconds previously, gave way. The young woman was severely hurt about the legs, but is fast recovering. No less than fifty-three persons lived in the house, which was saved by an old clothesman.

A strange seizure was lately made on board a steamer at Hull—namely, a large pigeon-pie. Although the pie of the birds appeared above the crust, their bodies were not beneath it, and in their place was a valuable quantity of gunpowder tea.

Extensive combinations have for some time been forming at Leeds, Huddersfield, Halifax, and other manufacturing towns, amongst the workmen, to compel their masters to give increased wages. They have now assumed so alarming an appearance, that the masters have memorialised government respecting them.

A Maidstone paper gives an account of a most singular occurrence which took place lately at Frant. In a field occupied by Mr C. Hickens, smoke was seen issuing from the decayed part of a beautiful beech-tree, and immediately afterwards flames were observable, although noon-day. With some little difficulty they were subdued. In a short time afterwards, the body of another tree (a very large ash) in the same field was discovered to be on fire, and before means could be resorted to, to extinguish it, the flames encircled the whole body, and defied every exertion that was made to save it, until the tree broke off about six feet up. Both trees were in a most healthy condition. From what cause the fire could have originated, remains a complete mystery.

The new dome of Brighton Bathum fell in with a tremendous crash, on Friday the 30th August. Its weight, being composed entirely of iron, was between four and five hundred tons, and exceeded in size that of St Peter's, at Rome, by 8000 superficial feet. The glazing, which was just about to be begun to, would have required two acres of glass. The immense weight of the dome was too great for the sides, and thus occasioned the accident.

On Monday week, a fellow exhibited his wife for sale, with a halter round her waist, in Melksham market, Wiltshire, and she was purchased by a neighbour for 2s. 6d.—Spectator.—[Why is it that public feeling is almost daily shocked with announcements of this description? If there be no specific law for punishing the actors in such brutal exhibitions, is the common law against public nuisances not wide enough to prevent them? Such transactions are clearly illegal, besides that they would disgrace the darkest days of barbarism.]

At Yaxley, in Huntingdonshire, a young lady unfortunately killed her own mother in a very simple and accidental manner. The old lady had been scolding her, and the young lady, in a pet, flung her work-bag at her, in which were some penny-pieces, which, striking her on the temple, instantly proved fatal.

A soldier of the 84th foot, who was confined in Worcester jail for desertion, one day lately placed his right forefinger on the lock of a door, and then drawing it to violently, part of the finger was wrenched off. This was done to disable himself for service.

So strong has the popular feeling become against every impost connected with the church establishment, that at a distraint for poor rates lately in Boston, a number of paupers actually convened to deter any one from bidding at the sale! The recusants, says the Boston Herald, were only deterred from proceeding to acts of violence by the prompt appearance of a party of constables.

Another house in the East India Trade, Shotton and Company (late Shotton, Malcolm, and Company), is stated in the Cape Town papers lately received, to have failed for a large amount.

The Duke of Orleans has remitted to Boulogne the sum of 500 francs, for the relief of the three men saved from the Amphitrite.

The health of President Jackson is stated, in the last accounts received from the United States, to be much improved.

The following letter and memorandum, which are extracted from the Glasgow Chronicle, contain information relative to the trade with China, transmitted from the India board on the 12th ultimo, by Mr Charles Grant, in answer to queries submitted by Mr Ewing, the member for Glasgow:—

At what time British ships will be allowed to clear and sail for Canton?—Not till after 22d April 1834.

At what time teas will be permitted to be landed, warehoused, and sold, by the private trade in this country?—Any time after April 1834, "from the Cape of Good Hope, and from places eastward of the same to the Straits of Magellan, and not from any other place."

How is the stock of teas belonging to the East India Company, and supposed to be equal to two and a half years' consumption, to be realised? Are any restraints likely to be imposed on the mode in which the teas are to be brought to market, so as to prevent an unnecessary glut, and consequent depression of price? Is any arrangement in contemplation for an assumption of the stock by government?—By sales under the superintendence of the Company and Board of Control, which sales must be regulated according to the discretion of the Court and Board, with a view as well to the advantage of the Indian revenues as to that of the British public and the free trader.

Has any resolution now been formed, or if not, can any information be afforded, as to the probability of the mode in which the duties on teas are to be charged?—The act of Parliament fixing rates on certain different classes of teas, varying from 1s. 6d. to 8s. per pound, has passed.

Is the silk raised in Bengal by the Company to be sold in Calcutta? or how is it to be disposed of? and under what regulations as to time, &c., is the transition of the Company's silk factories to private parties to take place?—The silk to be sold in Calcutta if possible; the factories to be disposed of as speedily as practicable; the particulars of the arrangement to be managed by the Indian government.

Is the Company to cease, after the 30th of April 1834, to act as warehousemen and salesmen? and what is to be done with the warehouses?—The Company will continue so to act till their commercial concerns are wound up; private merchants to avail themselves of this arrangement as at present, at their option. Due notice will be given of the Company ceasing to act in that capacity.

SCOTLAND.

ANNUITY TAX.

THE agitation of the citizens of Edinburgh on this subject has now considerably subsided, though not without leaving a deep and abiding sentiment in the minds of the great mass against the authors of the evil. On Friday, August 23, a tradesman in Hanover Street, named Ewart, and a Baptist by religious profession, who, even if willing, was totally unable to pay the tax, was seized and taken to prison, accompanied by the usual array of people carrying flags and placards. According to a chronicler of the day, "his daughter, a fine young woman, in a fit of heroic indignation, which completely overmastered her grief and the natural timidity of her sex, seized one of the flags, and would have walked before her father to prison with the crowd, but was prevented by him and the interference of the humane bystanders." Ewart was in such circumstances, that his incarceration completely ruined him—deprived him of all he had in the world, and all immediate means of supporting himself and family. His case accordingly excited a very general feeling of horror, as well as compassion. His shop next day was seen shut, with a placard affixed to it, bearing the words, "IN PRISON FOR MINISTERS' STIPEND." Some days afterwards, it was stated that Mr Ewart was very ill, and a request in the usual form was put into the plate at the door of one of the city churches, entreating the prayers of the clergyman for his unfortunate victim: it was intercepted by an elder, and torn to pieces. A medical gentleman named Walker gave a certificate that the life of the prisoner was in danger from his confinement, and the magistrates were petitioned for his release. The bailies, however (Sept. 5), gave a deliverance, finding, that as two other medical persons were of a contrary opinion to Dr Walker, the prisoner should remain where he was. Ewart was at length released (Sept. 12), in consequence of his solicitor having found some flaw in the diligence by which he was incarcerated. Sept. 3, Mr Simpson, a wealthy poulterer, was incarcerated under the usual circumstances, but in a few hours after procured his own liberation, by making payment of the sum charged upon. This, however, he paid under protest, in respect that part of the money had been previously paid; and his agent has given notice of an action of damages for wrongful imprisonment. No other incarceration has taken, or is likely to take place. The bulk of the recusants have been paying their arrears, under a conviction that enough has been done to assure all concerned that this tax can no longer be permitted to exist. The clergy have thus obtained the money which they esteem their right; but it has been only purchased at the expense of all their usefulness among the middle and lower orders of society, for, notwithstanding the efforts that have been made to show that it is not they, but the magistrates, who originate these prosecutions, the opinion is next to universal, that, as the magistrates are under no compulsion to make good the money, they must only act as the direct agents of the ministers, who therefore remain liable to all the blame and indignation which has been so abundantly heaped upon them. It would have been happy for the interests of the church, and, what is of infinitely greater importance, for the interests of religion, if the clergy had come forward to aid the councils of their fellow-citizens in endeavouring to obtain an alteration of this unhappy impost; but though a general and uncontradicted rumour prevails that they were active in getting the tax put upon its present footing, they seem to have conceived it no duty of theirs to interfere in getting it removed. The whole affair forms one of the most unfortunate passages in the history of the Church of Scotland since the Revolution, and, to every one acquainted with the earlier history of that church, must appear as a deep and ineffaceable stain upon its memory.

ABSTRACT OF THE BURGH REFORM BILL.

The following is an abstract of the bill for reforming the Scottish burghs, which may be considered as perhaps the most important measure affecting the internal management of the country which has taken place since the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in 1748:—

1. Right of election to be in all owners, or occupants of premises within the royalty, qualified to vote for a member of Parliament, who have resided six months previous to last day of June, within seven statute miles of royalty. No person in receipt of parochial relief, or pensioner of any corporation, within twelve months of election, to have a vote.
2. In burghs having no member of Parliament, all claims to be voters to be given in by 20th September this year, and 21st July every succeeding year, to the town clerk.
3. Town clerks of burghs to make up a complete list of voters by 20th October this year, and by 16th September every succeeding year, by transferring their names from the parliamentary registers.
4. Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dundee, Perth, Dumfries, and Inverness, to be divided into wards or districts, which, with the number of councillors to be chosen by each, shall be fixed by the commissioners to inquire into the condition of the burghs, appointed 15th July last. Each ward to choose, generally as may be, six councillors this year, and two each following year.
5. On first Tuesday of November next, the voters shall choose from such of their number as either reside within the royalty, or as carry on business there, such a number of councillors as by the act of the burgh constitutes the council. In the burghs that are divided into districts this to be done by open poll, at polling places fixed for each district; and in subsequent years, one-third of the council to retire by rotation, though capable of being re-elected; and the voters annually, at same period, to elect one-third of the total number of the council.
6. The poll to be kept open only one day, from eight in the morning till four in the afternoon. The town clerk has power to appoint as many polling places in each ward, and as many booths, or divisions, at each polling place, as may be necessary.
7. At the close of the poll, the poll books to be sealed up, and transmitted to the chief magistrate, who, on the next lawful day, shall, between the hours of twelve and two, within the town hall, cast up the votes, and declare on whom the election has fallen, and forthwith give notice of their election to the several persons elected, and require them to appear in the town hall, on the second lawful day after such election, and declare whether they accept or decline office.
8. Persons elected, failing so to attend, to be held as declining acceptance.
9. No person to be inducted as a councillor till he enters as a burgess of the burgh.
10. The whole councillors, so elected, to assemble in the town hall on the third lawful day after their election, and, by a plurality of voices (the councillor who had the greatest number of votes at the election to have a casting or double vote, in case of equality), elect from among their own number a provost, or chief magistrate, the number of bailies fixed by the act of the burgh, a treasurer, and managers of any charitable or public institutions, whose appointment is vested in the magistrates and town council of such burgh.
11. Present town councils not to go out of office till the completion of this year's elections.

CANDOUR IN POLITICS.

ALTHOUGH there is nothing in which the greater number of people are more conscientious than in politics, it is a very strange fact, that there is nothing in which they are so little disposed to allow conscientiousness in those of an opposite way of thinking from themselves. Almost every man, of whatever side, feels the most intense conviction that he is honest and sincere in his opinions, and occasionally he proves that he is so, by some doing or suffering which nothing but conscience could have brought him to. At the very same time, however, he sees nothing in his opponents but the basest and most interested motives. Every movement of that party, from the most important down to the most trifling, he traces to some wicked and shabby end. Even when the individual undergoes some actual distress, perhaps death itself, in vindication of his sentiments, or following out the purposes of his party, the inflexible partisan of the different side will endeavour to find out some unworthy cause for such conduct, or at the very utmost allows that it must have been done through sheer bigotry. A statesman, perhaps, by an unpopular course of politics, loses almost all his political influence; an unfortunate patriot who agitates at a wrong time, is banished, not for any distinctly made out crime, but because his fate may keep other people quiet; and the opposite party sees nothing in the one case but a desperate effort to retain unjust power, or in the other but a wretch meeting due punishment for his wicked attempts to overthrow our blessed constitution. The martyr of either side would die at the stake, while his political enemies, looking on, would say, by way of a very particular stretch of generosity, "Ah, his goodness would do honour to a better cause."

This want of charity among politicians was very strikingly exemplified in the state of the public mind during the late agitations for reform. In that struggle, we saw on the one side a small party, chiefly composed of the more exalted classes of society, who exalted themselves, by every possible means, to prevent the state-power (we cannot get a better word) from being diffused over a wider circle; on the other, the vast multitudes of the middle and lower classes, whose aim it was, by equally nervous exertions, to obtain the diffusion of power. Now, though nothing is yet proved in government, and the question was exactly one of those abstract ones which may be expected to divide instructed minds, neither of the parties ever would allow that the other was inspired by any thing but a self-seeking motive. The popular party looked on the Conservatives as a mere banditti, who, having wrongfully acquired, were determined forcefully to keep; a troop of vultures living on the vitals of the nation; men, if men they could be called, who were enemies to their kind, and, so that they only could a little longer be permitted to feed on corruption, care not whether the country went to revolution and ruin. The Conservative party, on the other hand, could see nothing in all this agitation but the ambition of a few restless men, who wished to ravish power and place from themselves, and, for that purpose, had roused the worst passions of the populace, so as to get themselves pushed forward on the shoulders of that unsteady and dangerous ally. Now, nothing can be more certain than that the motives mutually ascribed by the two parties, could not be the motives which inspired all, or even any considerable portion, of the opposing host. So speculative a subject, there could not but be a great difference of opinion; and we believe we are going no farther than the philosophy of human nature will warrant, when we assert our belief, that a bourgeois-proprietor might have sincerely anticipated a national evil from the reform bill, and that a popular leader might exert himself without caring either for the glory of a newspaper notice, or the prospect of a vote. In fact, to ascribe all the sayings and doings of mankind on such a question to one selfish end, is allowing too general an influence to prudence, and, in some measure, flattering human nature. A just observer sees too much done through passion, too much of real interest sacrificed every day to self-love, and in general too great a confusion of motives in the proceedings of the most of men, to admit that these uncharitable views could be to any considerable extent correct.

The two parties are hardly yet, perhaps, fully roused from the errors in which they respectively lay during the agitation alluded to; but the historian, some years hence, will see through the whole, and, among other things he will have to relate, must be one not very creditable to the national mind in the nineteenth century—that each party afterwards found it had been unjust, ungenerous, and wrong, in the judgment it formed of the designs and motives of the other, and that, in the dust cast up in the struggle, very little truth or sense was any where to be seen.

It is certainly to be wished, that, in debating the great questions which concern the national welfare, men could be a little more candid regarding the motives of their opponents. Some will say, that, where difference of opinion exists, and men consequently arrange themselves into parties, it is not to be hoped that one set will ever allow to another what in effect must increase the weight and respectability of that hostile body. Character, public and private—every thing must be denied to those who so far injure us as to take contrary views from ourselves. In one order of public intelligencers, there must be a departure from truth and fairness on one side; in another, an equal departure on the other. But if all this be necessary, what a mass of error and injustice have we every day coming into existence! Can a philosophical mind bear to think of such a copious and ceaseless flow of calumny and falsehood—such a loose let to all the less worthy passions of our nature? To descend even to the meaner principle of utility, can we with common patience behold so much labour every day misspent, in propagating what is so little in the way of doing good?

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

FERDINAND THE SEVENTH, who for some months past has been in a declining state of health, expired on the 29th of September, in the forty-ninth year of his age. It had been the policy of his court to represent him as in perfect health, and he had accordingly been of late brought several times abroad, when he ought to have kept his chamber. The consequence was a pulmonary affection, which helped materially to hasten his end. On the night of Saturday the 28th, his illness assumed a very threatening appearance, and a bulletin stating that fact was published next morning. Early on the 29th, he experienced a revival of appetite, which he indulged so inordinately as to bring on a stroke of apoplexy. The queen, who was the only person at that moment in his bedroom, screamed, and brought in Costello, his physician, who, by various tests, quickly ascertained that the king was dead.

Ferdinand has been four times married, but has left only one child, Maria Isabella, now in her third year. The Bourbons having introduced the Salique law into Spain, which confines the succession to males, Ferdinand had the law rescinded, the ancient Spanish order of succession restored, and his daughter declared heir to the crown, about two years since, by a solemn act of his council, which was ratified some months ago by a Cortes assembled for the purpose. Against this proceeding a protest was understood to be taken by Don Carlos, the presumptive heir under the Salique law, in consequence of which protest, and of his intrigues and treasonable designs, he was ordered to leave the kingdom, and retire to Italy. He went, however, no farther than Portugal.

The intelligence of the king's death caused no excitement in Madrid. The queen, who is a sister of the Duchess de Berri, immediately assumed the character of regent for her infant daughter, and published three decrees, in the first of which she summoned the royal council of Castile, to draw up the proclamation by which Donna Isabella the Second was to be declared queen; the second and third fixed the late king's ministers in their offices, and maintained all magistrates and government functionaries in their posts.

The will and testament of King Ferdinand was opened with due ceremony at Madrid, on the 3d of October. It appoints the queen guardian and trustee of the young queen, and regent and governess of the kingdom, until the latter shall attain the age of eighteen. The will also appoints a sort of privy council (Consejo de Gobierno) to advise with the queen regent in matters of importance, and directs that it shall be composed of the following persons, in the order in which they are mentioned:—Cardinal Don J. F. Marco and Catalan, the Marquis of Santa Cruz, the Duke of Medina Celi, General Castanbos, the Marquis of Amarillas, Don J. M. Puig, of the chamber of Castile, and Don F. X. Caro, of the council of the Indies; and in case of the absence, sickness, or death of any of the aforesaid members of the council, the vacancy shall be supplied, if the absentee be an ecclesiastic, by Don T. Arias, Auditor de la Rote in this kingdom; if a grandee, by the Duke of Infantado and the Count de Espana; if a general, by Don Jose de la Cruz; and if a magistrate, by Don M. N. Gazeli, and Don J. M. Hevia, of the royal council: all which will succeed to the others in the order here expressed. "It is also my will that the duties of secretary of this council shall be discharged by Count de Ofalia, or, in default of him, by Don F. de Zea Bermudez."

As is well known, Carlos has long been the acknowledged head of the ignorant and bigoted part of the nation, whose hatred of liberal institutions has been cherished and inflamed by the great mass of the clergy. He has besides many friends in office, and many partisans among those corps of royalist volunteers which were organised expressly to resist the constitutional party, and who have been disbanded, we believe, only in Madrid and one or two other towns. Even some of the ministers, whom Ferdinand could not be persuaded to dismiss, are suspected of being partial to Carlos; and in Spain, where men have served so many masters during the numerous revolutions of the last thirty years, official oaths and public declarations are but feeble securities against treachery. From some symptoms in the late management of the kingdom, it was supposed that the queen would chiefly seek for support to her own regency and her daughter's succession, among the liberals, many of whom she had restored from exile. It would now, however, appear that her majesty has seen reason to attempt the conciliation of the clerical and absolutist party, even at the hazard of losing friends on the other side. This is shown in the following extract from a manifesto published by the queen regent:—

"Religion and monarchy, the primary elements of the political existence of Spain, shall be respected, protected, and maintained by me in all their vigour and purity. The Spanish people possesses, in its innate zeal for the faith of its fathers, the stronger guarantee that no one will dare to require obedience from it unless the sacred objects of its reverence and adoration are respected. My heart rejoices in co-operating with this zeal of a nation eminently Catholic, and in giving it the assurance that the immaculate religion which we profess, its doctrines, its temples, and its ministers, shall be the first and the most sacred objects of the care of my government. I experience the liveliest satisfaction in considering that it is a duty for me to preserve whole and entire that royal authority which has been confided to me. I will maintain most religiously the form and fundamental laws of the monarchy, without admitting dangerous innovations, however respectable they may appear in their origin, for we have already unfortunately experienced their disastrous effects. The best form of government for a country is that to which it is accustomed. A stable and compact power, founded upon ancient laws rendered respectable by custom, consecrated by ages of duration, is the most powerful instrument for increasing the welfare of nations, which can never be done when the supreme authority is weakened, when the ideas, the customs, and the established institutions, are attacked—when the existing interests are disturbed for the purpose of creating new ones, and giving rise to fresh exigencies—when the different classes of society are put in array one against the other, and society is thrown into confusion. I will transmit the sceptre of Spain to the queen, to whom the laws allot it, without any diminution of its power; in a word, such as the laws have made it.”

It is probable that the minister Zea Bermudez, who belongs to the absolutists, is the counsellor of this course of conduct.

Meanwhile, Don Carlos has entered Spain from the side of Portugal, and been proclaimed king by his partisans in the Biscayan provinces. The Marquis de Valdespina, a man distinguished for his bigotry and devotion to the pretender, entered Bilbao at the head of a considerable body of the priesthood and peasantry, who assembled from the neighbouring country. He is now said to be at the head of several thousand fanatics. The liberals have been roughly treated by them; upwards of three hundred have been imprisoned, and others obliged to fly; contributions in money and provisions are levied upon them without mercy by the insurgents. It is also stated that at Vittoria the Carlist flag has been hoisted, and the feeble garrison expelled. General Castagnos, the commander of the government troops, marched towards Bilbao, in the hope of quelling the revolt, but found the insurgents too powerful for him, and retreated. It does not appear that the revolt has extended beyond the Basque provinces; though Navarre and part of Catalonia are considered to be insurrectionary districts, and Old Castile and Estremadura by no means well affected to the new government. Valentia, Andalusia, La Mancha, Murcia, and all the provinces along the coast of the Mediterranean, are decidedly opposed to the claims of Don Carlos, and contain large bodies of liberals. The insurrection, on being made known at Madrid, excited no alarm.

The government of the queen regent, and the succession of her daughter, were at the earliest opportunity recognised by Louis Philip, and also, it is said, by Austria, but in the latter case with many reservations. Don Carlos probably looks for support to the absolute sovereigns of the east of Europe, though the disinclination already shown by these monarchs to move their armies seems to put military aid from that quarter out of the question. It was expected that Bourmont, and other French Carlist officers who lately retired from Don Miguel's army, would enter Spain for the purpose of assisting Carlos; but an army of 50,000 French has been placed along the Pyrenees by the French government, with orders to enter Spain for the protection of the queen, in the event of any such aid being rendered.

PORTUGAL.

AFTER the unsuccessful attack made by the army of Don Miguel upon Lisbon, on the 5th of September, an attempt at negotiation was made by Don Pedro. Colonel Hare, a British officer, was dispatched by Lord William Russell to Bourmont, and is believed to have made some considerable offers to Don Miguel, as proceeding from his brother, for the purpose of inducing him to give up the contest. Miguel was offered a “bridge of gold” for his retirement from Portugal, his property to be held sacred, and an amnesty to his officers. But all negotiation was ultimately found unavailing.

Accordingly, on the 14th, Marshal Bourmont hazarded another attack upon Lisbon, and met with another severe repulse. His troops advanced under cover of the night, and attempted to carry the fort of St John, but found Terceira, Saldanha, and the other constitutional chiefs, at their posts; and were driven back with considerable loss. It is said that Miguel caused General Lemos, who commanded a division of his troops in this affair, to be tried by a court-martial, and shot. His soldiers marched to the attack with great reluctance; and their conduct was so devoid of spirit, that the French officers appear to have been convinced that the Miguelite cause was hopeless. On this ground, according to the most probable accounts (for we have no certain intelligence on the point), they counselled a retreat into the interior, and an abandonment of all attempts upon Lisbon. This advice Don Miguel rejected; and Bourmont, Clouet, Larochajacquin, and the other French officers composing his staff, immediately gave in their resignations. Clouet and some others applied to Admiral Parker for permission to go on board the African steamer, and embark for England. This permission was granted, and the admiral sent a barge to convey them on board; but they subsequently altered their plans, and agreed to accompany Bourmont and Larochajacquin into Spain—with the intention, it is surmised, of being in readiness to join any insurrection that the Carlists might get up in the south of France. Bourmont's post was given, in the first instance, to a Portuguese officer named Santo Lorenzo, but subsequently to General Macdonald, a person now heard of for the first time, and whose real name is supposed to be Hamilton, being of an English family, though born in Spain, and brought up in the Spanish army in South America.

Donna Maria arrived in the Tagus, accompanied by the Duchess of Braganza, about mid-day on the 22d of September, on board the Soho steamer. Pedro, accompanied by Admiral Napier, immediately went on board a vessel to meet them; and the Lisbon official paper dutifully announces, “that it is not possible to describe the reciprocal feeling of love and respect which this august family manifested on this occasion.” The Soho anchored in the Tagus amidst salutes of artillery from the British, French, and Portuguese squadrons, and the forts on both sides of the river, and the acclamations of vast crowds of people who lined the banks. The Tagus was covered with boats filled with devoted and curious subjects of the queen. There was a grand dinner on board the Soho in the evening, at which Don Pedro gave as a first toast, “The Queen and the Charter.” The British Minister visited the queen on board the steam-boat. On the morning of the 23d, she landed, and immediately proceeded to the patriarchal church, where “Te Deum” was performed, and the sacrament administered to her majesty. Don Miguel spared a day from his almost constant employment of hunting, to view the entrance of Donna Maria into the Tagus, from the palace of Ajuda.

A council of state has been appointed at Lisbon, with the Duke of Palmella for its president, and the Marquis of Funchal as one of the members. This must give the liberal party some assurance that Don Pedro, if successful, will establish a popular government.

The latest accounts represent the relative state of the contending parties to have experienced such a change, that the constitutionalists were designing to attack Don Miguel on the 12th October. Within Lisbon, the fortifications of which are now very strong, there were 22,000 men, while 2200 were at Peniche, all of which would be available against the opposite force, now reduced, principally by desertion, to 14,000.

ITALY.

In this country the insurrectionary spirit has of late been more actively at work than usual, though no specific point of outbreak can be indicated. Numerous arrests took place in September at Pisa, Genoa, Leghorn, Florence, and Vienna; and the liberal spirit is considered so formidable, that a confederation of the princes, under the Emperor of Austria, is about to be formed to meet it. A camp of 60,000 troops is established at Brescia, and another of 90,000 (said to be the largest ever known) at Mantua, to be ready to act against any demonstrations of resistance that may take place.

TURKEY.

Two dreadful conflagrations, which in August had scourged the Turkish capital, are only alluded to in a part of our impression of last month. By the one, two thousand, and by the other, four thousand houses, are said to have been destroyed, though some accounts by Belgrade and Vienna represent the damage as less extensive. It seems now certain (though at one time denied) that the second calamity was connected with an insurrectionary or dissatisfied spirit in the people, and that the Sultan was obliged to take some measures for his personal safety. The reforms of this prince, especially in the army, and his close and humiliating alliance with Russia, are exciting great discontent amongst his subjects.

A treaty between Russia and the Porte has been negotiated at Constantinople. It is dated the 8th of July, and signed by Seraskier Achmet Pacha, on the part of the Porte, and Count Orloff and M. de Bouteneff, on the part of Russia. It declares that there shall be a perpetual peace, friendship, and alliance, between the contracting parties, for reciprocal defence against all attacks; that, Russia being desirous of maintaining the independence of the Ottoman empire, his Imperial Majesty engages to afford to the Sublime Porte such auxiliary forces, both by sea and land, as circumstances may oblige Turkey to require, his sublime highness to decide on the number of such forces which he may desire. Provisions for such auxiliary forces are to be provided by the party demanding such aid.

But the following supplementary article is the one which is by far the most important to foreign powers:—“The Sublime Porte, in pursuance of the said principles, will close, in case of need, the Straits of the Dardanelles; that is to say, it will not permit the entrance of any foreign vessel, even under any pretence whatsoever. The present separate article shall be regarded as if inserted word by word, and comprised the said treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, and shall as such be equally maintained and observed. It cannot be supposed that England, France, or the United States, will permit the execution of this title, which proves, more than any of the others, perfect subserviency of the Ottoman government to Russia.

The Sultan lately assembled a number of the legal and ecclesiastical authorities, and addressed them in a very stern manner. He said that he was aware of their opposition to his reforms; but if he found them refractory in future, he would apply to his allies, and would send thousands of soldiers to keep them in order.

To turn to circumstances of a more lively nature, it may be mentioned, that “preparations are going on at Constantinople for the marriage of the Sultan Salyha, eldest daughter of the sultan, now twenty-years old, to Halil Pacha, one of the imperial favorites. This young man was originally a slave; having taken the fancy of the Seraskier Pacha, afterwards his adopted son, and being presented to the sultan, became a pacha, ambassador at St Petersburg, and is now master of the ordnance. He last year capdun pacha, or lord high admiral, but his cowardice and incapacity prevented the capture of a great part of the Egyptian fleet. It is a dangerous honour to be the husband of any branch of the sultan's family; for if the lady become dissatisfied, she can soon procure a new one on the removal of the head of the first. There are odd descriptions given of the courtship, such as the lady's drawing her dagger, and threatening her wooer for his insolence in asking the hand of a descendant of the prophet, who she is to be appeased by the presentation of a harem-scheriff of the sultan, warranting the act. However, on all future occasions he must carry her slippers, and ask her leave to enter the room where she sits, to obtain her permission to sit down, and he must carry into the nuptial bed from the foot. He is to have no other wife in her palace; all preceding ones are divorced, and all concubines are dismissed prior to marriage. A palace is now preparing on the Bosphorus for the ‘happy pair,’ where they are to live month together, and then the husband is to go to distant employment, and the lady becomes emancipated from father and husband's power.”

FRANCE.

PREPARATIONS for new disturbances are making in the south of France, and the movements of the Duchess de Berri are beginning to again matter of interest. It is said that a new design on the coast is contemplated by this princess, and that three of her friends have been making surveys, in order to ascertain the most eligible place for her landing. If this lady be at all like the following striking picture, which is given by General Dermoncourt, by no means improbable that she may attempt such an enterprise:—“Marie Caroline, like all Neapolitan girls, has received scarcely any education. With all is nature and instinct. She is a creature of impulse; the exigencies of etiquette are insupportable to her, and she is ignorant of the very forms of the world. She allows her feelings to carry her away, without attempting to restrain them; and when any one has inspired her with confidence, she yields to it without restriction. She is capable of supporting the greatest fatigue, and encountering the most appalling dangers with the patience and courage of a soldier. The contradiction exasperates her—then her naturally flushed cheeks become flushed; she screams, and jumps about, and threatens, and weeps, by turns, like a spoiled child; and then again, like a child, the moment she gives way to her, and appear to do what she desires, she smiles, is instantly appeased, and offers you her hand. Contrary to the general nature of princesses, she feels gratitude, and is never ashamed to own it. Moreover, hatred is foreign to her nature; no gall has tinged her heart, even against those who have done her the most injury. Whoever sees her for an hour becomes well acquainted with her character; who sees her for a whole day, becomes acquainted with the qualities of her heart.”

A great Carlist pilgrimage took place lately at Prague, for the purpose of congratulating the de Bourdeaux on his attainment of the age of sixteen, which in France is considered the period of the majority of princes. On this occasion his relatives chose to be absent, not liking, it is said, even these nominal and shadowy honours going themselves.

Meanwhile, it is very certain that Louis Philip lost all his former popularity; a fact not to be wondered at, when several of his acts are considered in connection with the well-known character of the French people. For instance, the editor of the Tribune paper has just been condemned to five years' imprisonment, and to pay a fine of twenty thousand francs, for a libel on the government; being the eighth condemnation and the eighty-first prosecution which that journal has undergone! Indeed, the mild and temporising conduct of the late Bourbon sovereigns, relative to the press, is contrasted with the unsparing rigour of which this is a specimen, and hardly help concluding that less liberty is now en-

LONGEST HISTORY AND

the French than before the revolution. About the middle of the past month, there occurred an event which, if it had happened under the Bourbon dynasty, could have been denounced from one end of Europe as an act of the most flagrant tyranny. At the request of the Austrian government, Louis Philippe "has caused the arrest, at Paris," says a London paper, "of a very old friend of European liberty, Buonarrotti, Marquis de Canossa, the only surviving descendant of Michael Angelo," and who, having fled from Italy, had taken refuge in a capital which is unhappily but naturally supposed to be the asylum of freedom. A letter has been published in England, treating subscriptions for the defence of the aged patriot.

The ex-Dey of Algiers has been carrying on intrigues with the exiled branch of the Bourbons, and is believed with some of the continental powers, in order to disturb the French in their possession of Algiers. He has kept up an active correspondence with his adherents in Africa, and with the Beys of Tunis, Tripoli, and Constantine; and to his proceedings the continued hostility of the tribes in the neighbourhood of Algiers is attributed. It has been ascertained that he has lately purchased an Austrian vessel of heavy tonnage, and a quantity of arms, with which he no doubt intended to make a descent on the African coast; but the French envoy at Leghorn gave information to his government of all his intentions, and a brig of war was sent to watch him. He has since sailed for Alexandria, being duly warned of his danger by his Bourbon friends.

CONGRESS OF SOVEREIGNS.

His assemblage of crowned heads sat during the seven days previous to the 18th of September, when it broke up, and the sovereigns departed to their respective homes. The British papers have been supplied with very imperfect information on this subject. The King of Prussia, it seems, did not eventually come forward; and nothing is known of the proceedings of the other sovereigns, except that they spent the most part of every day in hunting and festive amusements. A desire of the Emperor of Austria to be invested with the new title of Protector of Italy, is reported to have been among the points discussed. It is also said that an agent, a Count Claum, was dispatched to the King of the Netherlands, that nothing in the way of military aid could be afforded him. There is very little reason, indeed, to suppose that any systematic plan of resistance to the progress of liberal opinions and liberal government was taken into consideration, far less resolved upon, at the congress of Munchen-Gratz.

King Leopold's ministry have made a long communication to the Belgian Chamber of Deputies on the state of the negotiations with Holland. It details clearly the mode in which the King of Holland has contrived to embarrass and finally break up the Conference, by his refusal to apply for permission to the German Diet to make the arrangement required by the Conference with respect to the partition of the Duchy of Luxembourg. In the meanwhile, the Belgians retain a greater extent of territory than they could be entitled to were the decrees of the Conference, which they are ready to submit to, enforced; and, what is of far more consequence, they are for the present free from paying their share of the interest of the national debt, all of which is borne by Holland. There appears to be some chance of a collision between the Dutch and Belgian troops. The fortress of Maesricht, garrisoned by the Dutch, cannot be approached except through a territory declared to be neutral and inviolable, and which the King of Holland has no right to march his troops through, until he has removed the obstructions which still impede the navigation of the Maese. But the term of service of a portion of the garrison has expired, and they have become mutinous, and insist upon being relieved. The question is, whether the King of Holland will, under these circumstances, attempt to replace them with fresh troops. Should he determine to do so, the Belgians, who have moved a considerable force in that direction, will oppose him; and the French also would have a right to interfere, as they are parties to the convention by which the territory in question is declared to be inviolable and strictly neutral. General St Cyr, the commander of the French army of the North, arrived in Brussels (Oct 15), in order to make arrangements with the Belgian government relative to their future proceedings.

King Leopold and his queen have postponed their intended visit to Paris. It is said that his ministry represented to Leopold, that this close and familiar intercourse with France was extremely disagreeable to the English government.

Experiments are now in progress in Belgium, under the immediate care of King Leopold, for the general introduction of steam-carriages into that country.

The Archduchess Maria Louisa has ceded to Madame Letitia, the mother of Napoleon, the whole of the property of the late Duke de Reichstadt, including the legacies left him by his illustrious father. Madame Letitia has since executed a formal act, granting the arms of Napoleon to the museum of France, and the fortune of her grandson to the French hospitals. —French paper.

The government of King Otho is meeting with great difficulties in Greece. The shareholders of the old Greek bonds have been apprised that they may expect nothing from this new government.

The City of Waterford steam-vessel, having a valuable cargo on board, was wrecked, Sept. 22, off Peniche, on the coast of Portugal. The passengers landed, and were kindly treated by the officials of the monster Don Miguel.

A conspiracy to overthrow the Colombian government has been detected at Bogota. The night of the 23d July last was fixed upon for making the attempt. The plot was discovered, and out of seventy conspirators, sixty-five were arrested. A Colonel Montoya was shot in pursuing one of them. Preparations were immediately made for the trial of the plotters; and on the 28th of July all was again tranquil.

A fierce civil war, and a scourge almost as terrible, the cholera, are both raging in Mexico. An insurrection has broken out against the authority of the president, Santa Anna, headed by Generals Arista and Duran. The armies on both sides suffer dreadfully from the cholera: that of Santa Anna lost 2000 men out of 4000 in the course of a few days, and the sufferings of the insurgent forces are equally heavy. At the date of the last accounts, all warlike operations were suspended, owing to the prevalence of this terrible disease.

An earthquake of considerable violence took place in the neighbourhood of Washington, North America, on the 27th of July.

Calcutta papers bring accounts of a dreadful hurricane on the Hooghly, on the 21st of May. Letters from Diamond Harbour state that the whole country, as far as can be discovered, both up and down the river, on both banks, was strewn with corpses. Mr Campbell, from Mud-point, who had fortunately reached Diamond Harbour, stated that out of 4000 people in the vicinity he had quitted, only 1000 had escaped drowning, to die of thirst, unless speedy relief was afforded to them. A letter dated Shikapore Jaugor, on the 22d May, says—"All is gone, no bunds, no tanks, no people. I think about sixty men, as many women, and about twenty children, are left out of 950 souls; but cannot say yet correctly. As near as I can judge, from the height of the bungalow, there were seven feet of water over the land. It broke in at about a quarter before nine A.M., and did not begin to decrease until one P.M. Men, women, and cattle, are lying dead in all directions." Three large vessels, the Lord Amherst, the Robert, and the General Gascoyne, were driven ashore, but it was hoped that their cargoes would be saved.

IRELAND.

The Marquis Wellesley landed at Kingstown (Sept. 25), and next day made his entry into Dublin. The Marquis of Anglesea left Ireland the day after his successor's arrival. The Marquis Wellesley seems to have been well received, and has already given a favourable impression of his government. At a banquet, to which he was treated by the Lord Mayor (Sept. 30), and where 500 guests were present, he informed the company, in replying to the toast in which his health had been drunk, "that the commands of his gracious, benevolent, generous, and patriotic sovereign, were to steer, free from every distinction, a plain course, one that should be in the high region above all those animosities which had raged in this country, and distracted Ireland for years. That was the principle of his government. (Cheers.) It was his anxious hope that he should be able to maintain the dispensation of impartial justice to all, and the strict, pure, and vigorous administration of the law. In the patriotic breast of his sovereign, there was no animosity, there were no traces of party spirit, of any distinction, or of any description. His sovereign was prepared to receive the loyalty of all, in his pure open bosom, and to cherish it in his pure and open heart. (Cheers.) The injunctions of his sovereign to him were, to admit of no distinction of any kind, and to let no distinction interfere with the strict and faithful discharge of the government of a great, a loyal, and a faithful people. (Hear, and cheers.) These were the principles upon which he started, and by these principles he (the Lord-Lieutenant) would adhere. This was his determination, such was his fixed resolution; and as he could answer for his own intentions, he would say, that by no other motive would he be influenced; and certainly by no party motives should he ever be swayed." (Cheers.)

The commission appointed to inquire into the abuses in the municipal systems of Ireland, have terminated their labours at a number of the more important towns. They are said to have detected a singular perversion of the corporation funds in Drogheda, to which there belonged estates of immense magnitude, a considerable number of them having been given in trust for charitable purposes. "The corporation, however, as they admit, have always acted upon the principle that the estates were given for the support of Protestantism, and for division amongst themselves. The corporate rule was, to lease the lands at one-fourth of their value to corporators. If honestly managed, we are informed the corporate revenues of Drogheda would amount to at least L.25,000 a-year. Under the system of chicanery that has prevailed, the revenue does not exceed L.3000."—Dublin Register.

The spirit of outrage does not appear to be yet set at rest in Ireland. In the county of Tipperary, the incendiary and the midnight murderer are again at work. Barnyards are laid in ashes, houses levelled to the ground, and the inmates barbarously assassinated. In Kilkenny, illegal inmates are served on blacksmiths and other artisans, cautioning them against working under certain prices, and prohibiting them from doing business with the customers of other tradesmen. Near Sligo, a gross assault has been committed on some unoffending Protestants; while in the county of Donegal a serious attack has been made by the peasantry on a body of police, consisting of about sixty men, sent by order of the government, with a commissioner to investigate the alleged oppressions as regards tithes in the northern parts of Ireland. In the parish of Leter M'Awad, they were waylaid by upwards of a thousand people, who assailed them fiercely with stones, until they were compelled to fire upon them, when one of the assailants was shot through the head, and six of them dangerously wounded. Agitation is more likely to increase than subside, as the usual period for collecting the O'Connell rent is approaching; and in order to bring his fellow-countrymen into that state of excitement most favourable for an appeal to their pockets, the agitator has addressed an epistle to the people of Ireland, in which he speaks of the apparent tranquillity as but a momentary calm, and symptomatic of any thing but "an oblivion of recent wrongs." "In the meantime (he exclaims), hereditary bondsmen! confide in yourselves. Be up and stirring. Begin the war of tithe petitions. Prepare for the war of repeal petitions!" These hints show that O'Connell is not disposed, as has lately been alleged, to drop the subject of repeal, and join the ranks of the Ministry in assisting the new viceroy to govern Ireland.

A remarkable instance of desperation for a little money lately occurred at Dublin. A young man, who had been married a few months ago to a young lady, married an old one some time after on account of her having a few pounds of fortune; thus at once committing bigamy, and submitting to one of the most disagreeable things in life, for a trifle.

ENGLAND.

RETURN OF CAPTAIN ROSS FROM HIS ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

THIS enterprising officer arrived at Hull (Oct. 18), after an absence of upwards of four years, and when almost all hopes of his return had been abandoned by his friends. Notice that he was on his way back, on board the Isabella, Hull whaler, Captain Humphreys, was communicated to Edinburgh on the 14th, by a letter from Captain Lyall, of the Clarendon, who had recently had intercourse with the Isabella, and had just touched at Peterhead. The news was immediately spread over the country, and it is rarely that any public intelligence occasions so universal and so earnest a feeling of pleasure as this seems to have excited. On the day above stated, Captain Ross landed at Hull, with Captain Humphreys, and several of his own officers, on board the Gazelle, Rotterdam steam-packet, having left the Isabella at the mouth of the Humber. The following account of the expedition was that day gathered from the mouth of the enterprising navigator, and published in the Hull Advertiser:—

"Our readers are aware, that, in 1829, Captain Ross fitted out his expedition with a view to determine the practicability of a new passage which had been confidently said to exist, particularly by Prince Regent's Inlet, and that, in consequence of the loss of the foremast of his vessel (the Victory), and other untoward circumstances, he was obliged to refit at Wideford, in Greenland. The accounts of his departure from thence, on the 27th July 1829, formed the last authentic intelligence received of the expedition, until the commander and crew were picked up by Captain R. W. Humphreys, of the Isabella, of Hull, Captain Ross's old ship. By Captain Ross's account, it appears that the first season—that of 1829—was the mildest that had ever been recorded, and the sea was more clear of ice than had been experienced during any of the former voyages. On the 14th of August, he reached the spot where the Fury's stores were; landed without difficulty, and there he found the provisions, &c., but not the wreck, which had totally disappeared. Having supplied all his wants at this depot, he advanced to the southward round Cape Carey, from whence the west coast led him in a S.W. direction to the latitude of 72 deg. N. Here he was, for the first time, seriously impeded by the ice; but after examining an inlet, he proceeded to urge his way to the southward, as near the west shore as the shallowness of the water would permit, and occasionally landed to take possession of the newly-discovered region for the British crown, with the usual ceremony. Owing to the rapidity of the tides and currents, the stubborn quality of the ice, and the rocky character of the coast, the voyage was perilous in the

* It may be necessary to explain to the reader the circumstances which led to Captain Ross's expedition.—In the year 1818, the British government fitted out two expeditions to the North Pole. Captain Buchan, commanding the Trent and the Dorothy, was directed to attempt a passage between Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla, over the Pole into the Pacific; and Captain Ross, commanding the Isabella and the Alexander, to attempt the north-western passage from Davis' Straits and Baffin's Bay into the Frozen Ocean, and thence into the Pacific. Ross reached 77 deg. 40 min. lat., and more accurately determined the situation of Baffin's Bay, which, until then, was believed to extend 10 deg. farther to the east than it actually does. Although he sailed up Lancaster Sound, he did not advance far enough to ascertain that it was open, not having arrived there until the 1st of October, when danger from the ice obliged him to quit the coast. Lieutenant Parry, who had accompanied Captain Ross, was sent, in conjunction with Captain Lyon, in 1819, on a second voyage into Baffin's Bay, and having penetrated so far as to gain the first prize offered by Parliament (L.5000), and having made the most western point ever reached in the Polar Seas, he was entrusted with the direction of the Hecla and Fury on a similar expedition in 1821. These ships returned in 1822, without achieving the principal object for which they were dispatched. In 1824, Parry and Lyon were again sent out for the discovery of a north-west passage, in the Hecla and Fury. After wintering in Prince Regent's Bay, the ships sailed southwardly, and, in consequence of storms and icebergs, it became necessary to abandon the Fury, and, with her crew on board the Hecla, Parry returned to England in October 1825. The Admiralty sent Parry, in the Hecla, in 1827, to reach, if possible, the North Pole. Having journeyed thirty-five days over the ice, beginning at 61 deg. 12 min. 51 sec., he was compelled to retrace his course. So far the exertions of the British government. The land expedition under Franklin it is unnecessary to notice. Piqued, probably, by the real or supposed neglect of government, Captain Ross, in the spring of 1829, undertook an expedition, on his own resources, with the view of effecting a passage into the Polar Sea, and to reach Baffin's Straits along the northern coast of the American continent. From this expedition he has now happily returned.

extreme. Having experienced several almost miraculous escapes from shipwreck, they ultimately succeeded in reaching the 70th deg. of latitude, in a direction nearly due south of Fury Point, where their course was arrested by an impenetrable barrier of ponderous ice. In a harbour which they found at this extreme point, they wintered. In January 1830, they opened a communication with a most interesting tribe of natives, who had never before held intercourse with strangers. Friendship being soon established between the adventurous tars and these primitive people, the first winter, which was not more than commonly severe, was spent very pleasantly. Having learnt from the natives that the East Sea was divided from the West by a neck of land, this point was examined, and all hope of effecting a passage in that direction completely extinguished. Commander Ross (nephew of Captain Ross), who was sent to survey the coast of the West Sea, leading to Cape Turnagain, succeeded in getting within 150 miles of it, and left off within a short distance of where Captain Back expected Fish River to join the sea. They also determined that the land was continuous to that which forms Repulse Bay. During the autumn of 1830, the voyagers waited in vain for the ice to dissolve, as it had done the preceding year. Although they used their utmost exertions, they had not succeeded in retracing their course more than four miles, when they were arrested, in a very dreary position, by the approach of a winter unparalleled in severity—the lowest temperature being 92 degrees below the freezing point. The summer proving no less rigorous for the season, little hope was entertained of a release, and a farther progress of fourteen miles was all they could accomplish.

"In October 1831, the ship was laid up in the harbour, in which she at present lies moored, and where the party endured the rigours of another winter, not less severe than that of the preceding year. Their provisions being consumed, they had now no alternative but to abandon the vessel, and to proceed to the spot where the Fury's provisions still remained—a direct distance of two hundred miles, which was increased by one-half, in consequence of the circuitous route which the ice obliged them to take. They accordingly left the Victory in May 1832, and after a journey of uncommon labour and hardship, they reached Fury Beach in the month of July. During this journey, they had not only to carry their provisions and sick, but also a supply of fuel; without melting snow, they could not procure even a drink of water. They repaired the Fury's boats, and attempted to escape; but it was September before they reached Leopold's Island, which they have fully established to be the north-east point of America. Here they waited with inconceivable anxiety for a disruption of the ice, but in vain. It presented one impenetrable mass extending across Lancaster Sound, and intercepting the progress of the fishing ships, which could advance no farther than Admiralty Inlet, where some remained so late as the 17th September in the same year. Winter set in, and no choice was left but to retrace their steps, and spend another inclement season in canvass huts covered with snow. Their sufferings at this time, aggravated by want of beds, clothing, and animal food, must have been of the most acute description. Captain Ross says they can never be completely submitted to the public, for he could not expect it would be believed that human beings could undergo such poignant misery for so protracted a period. We find that the carpenter perished, and several others of the crew were so much reduced, that they had to be carried to Batty Bay, where the boats had been left.

"The spring and summer of the present year afforded the desolate party more cheering hopes. The ice opened on the 14th of August, and on the same day that Captain Humphreys, in the Isabella, tried to reach Leopold's Island, they arrived there. The former could not cross the ice, and was driven by a north-west gale to the southward, up Prince Regent's Inlet. The party remained until the gale had departed; and having crossed when the Isabella was to the southward, they passed to the northward of her, and having gained the south shore of Lancaster Sound, they nearly reached its entrance before the Isabella overtook them. It is impossible for any description to do justice to the feelings of either side on meeting. None but those who have been in a similar situation, can form any idea of what passed in the minds of men rescued from such misery by the hand of Divine Providence; nor can the feelings of him who has been selected as the instrument of mercy, be fully appreciated. The party were not more reduced by their sufferings than might have been expected. In consequence of kind and truly British treatment, they may be said to have completely recovered. The circumstance that Captain Ross was rescued by the ship he commanded in 1818, cannot fail to be considered an extraordinary, as well as a happy conclusion of the voyage, the result of which has been, as far as the endeavours of the explorers were directed, of the most conclusive nature, namely, establishing that there is no new passage south of 74 deg. north. The country discovered, which is larger than Great Britain, has been named Bothea, after Felix Booth, Esq., who was sheriff of London in 1829, and acted as a truly patriotic and public-spirited citizen in assisting Captain Ross, when fitting out the expedition. The true position of the magnetic pole has been discovered, and much valuable information obtained for the improvement of geographical and philosophical knowledge. Captain Ross had a good opportunity of verifying his former survey of the west coast of Baffin's Bay, which every master of a Greenland ship can testify is the most correct. Only three men died during the voyage, two of whom were men whose constitutions were unfit for the climate. On the whole, it may be truly said that this expedition has done more than any that has preceded it; and be it remembered, that Captain Ross and his nephew were volunteers, serving without pay for the attainment of a national object, in prosecuting which they have lost their all."

It was at half-past nine o'clock in the morning of Friday the 18th (October), that Captain Ross landed at Hull, with his officers and Captain Humphreys. The gallant adventurers immediately proceeded to the Vittoria Hotel, while, the news having spread, multitudes of people flocked eagerly about them, partly to gratify curiosity, and partly to offer congratulations. Captain Ross was dressed in seal-skin trousers, with the hair turned outwards, over which he wore a faded naval uniform; and the weather-beaten countenances of himself and his companions bore evident marks of the hardships they had undergone, although they appeared to be in excellent health. They were speedily waited upon in their hotel by some of the most respectable merchants, and, before the hour of eleven, the mayor and aldermen waited upon Captain Ross, in procession, and conducted him to the mansion-house, where he partook of a refreshment. The president and members of the Philosophical Society presented their congratulations, as did the warden and several of the elder brethren of the Trinity House, and a deputation from the Commissioners of Pilots. The bells were also set a-ringing, and the colours hoisted on nearly all the shipping in the harbour. On Saturday evening, Captain Ross arrived in London, where, it is needless to say, his reception has been most enthusiastic. He has been invited to attend the Lord Mayor's dinner on the 9th inst.

A letter has been received from Captain Back, dated Norway House, Jack River, June 19, 1833. He had met with some difficulty in procuring provisions, and this had (fortunately) delayed his progress. He had found it necessary also to spend more money than he anticipated, and hoped that an additional £1000 would be raised for him. It is confidently expected that accounts of Captain Ross's return will overtake Captain Back in time to prevent him from encountering any inconvenience in his proposed search for that individual. He will now confine himself to the scheme of discovery which he had united with that object.

ASSESSED TAXES.

THE discontent of the inhabitants of London under these taxes, a large proportion of which is raised from them, has now reached the point of determined and almost universal resistance. Associations, for the ostensible purpose of procuring by legal means the repeal of these imposts, have been formed in every quarter of the metropolis (that connected with Marylebone numbers two thousand householders); and meetings are frequently held, at which sentiments loudly reprobative of the taxes, and of the government which has failed to take them off, are expressed. The most singular feature in the movement is, that the brokers have generally acceded to the views of their fellow-citizens, and determined to abstain from purchasing any property that may be seized for payment. No fewer than fifty-two brokers belong to one of the associations. Placards, stating that no assessed taxes are paid here, are common in the shop-windows of the metropolis; and at the meetings which daily take place, a determination to suffer executions for goods rather than pay, is frequently and enthusiastically proclaimed. The Marylebone association having requested their representative, Sir William Horne (attorney-general), to preside at a meeting, was answered by that gentleman in the following terms:—

"As I observe that the meeting is called, according to the placard, 'To take into consideration the proper means to be adopted in consequence of the decision of his Majesty's Ministers respecting the assessed taxes,' I feel (connected as I am with his Majesty's government, and after the vote which I have felt it my duty to give upon the late motion) my presence could not effect any useful purpose. Let me, however, add, as I do most truly, that no man disapproves of the house and window tax more than myself, as bearing most heavily and hardly upon a large class of the most meritorious inhabitants of this borough; and that in the vote I gave against their abolition, I did so only because I felt that their immediate abolition was impossible, without a most dangerous diminution of the existing revenue, unless a substitute could be provided to supply the deficiency; and as the only substitute seriously proposed was a property or income tax, or both, I felt then, as I do now, that by a premature vote upon the subject, I might not only embarrass the public, but probably injure instead of benefit the inhabitants of the borough."

An aggregate meeting of the various associations took place on the 16th, at the Yorkshire Stingo, New Road. The large room in the tavern, which holds two thousand persons, was speedily filled, and the gardens were also crowded. The report of the committee of management was read and approved; and the following resolutions were carried unanimously:—

"That this association having had recourse to every measure consistent with their duty as good citizens to obtain relief, without effect, are now compelled to declare that they can no longer pay in money those iniquitous imposts, the house and window taxes; and that they will neither buy nor sell goods that may be taken from those already borne down by the non-fulfilment of a former Minister's pledge to the nation, that the entire repeal of these taxes should take place two years after the ratification of peace.

"That, notwithstanding the votes and professions of the present administration, when out of office, to repeal these taxes, they have rendered them more galling and oppressive, by causing the elective franchise to depend upon their payment within a limited period; thus marking and degrading an industrious portion of the community, and punishing their poverty as a crime by depriving them of their political rights."

"That this meeting, impressed not only with the injustice of continuing these taxes, but also with the misery that enforcing their payment inflicts upon all individuals in arrears, feel it an imperative duty to extend to their members all the assistance in their power; and they hereby express their admiration at the public spirit of the auctioneers and brokers who have so honourably declared their determination of acting no longer as agents and assistants in so distressing their fellow-men."

"That an address to the King, embodying the foregoing resolutions, be prepared by the committee, and signed by them on behalf of this meeting, praying him to convene the Parliament forthwith, to take into consideration the best means of averting the evils which appear to us likely to endanger the existing institutions of our country, should these taxes be any longer enforced."

"That the managing committee be empowered to communicate with and call upon the householders of all the principal cities and boroughs throughout the kingdom, in such manner as may appear to them most advisable, in order to procure their assistance in calling for the immediate repeal of these obnoxious taxes."

"That in order to protect such members as are now, or may hereafter be, prosecuted by the local authorities or others for endeavouring to obtain the repeal of these taxes, the householders of the metropolis are respectfully called upon to assist, by subscribing such sums as may be convenient to them, when required, in aid of the object of the association; and that a committee be appointed to carry out the preceding resolution."

[The Ministerial press censures these associations in a very emphatical manner; and we have scarcely observed any newspaper in which they are openly defended. Even the Examiner could only remark that the true way to obtain a repeal of the assessed taxes was to choose a better Parliament. The Tory papers, however, are loud in twitting the Whig ones with the new instance of resistance, which, however disagreeable to Ministers and their friends, is only, according to the Conservative prints, the result of the less which was taught the people two years ago for the purpose of carrying the reform bill, and keeping the Ministers in power. In the meantime, without regard to the opinions of the press, the inhabitants proceed from one degree of boldness to another; and it is beginning to be considered a settled point, even among the Ministerial papers, that the assessed tax must be taken off, and a property and income tax imposed. Either alternative must be painful; but the can be no doubt that a tax raised directly in money though generally more inconvenient in payment than an indirect tax, is a lighter burden to the people, proportion to the sum pocketed by government, than one of the other kind; the expense of collection being less, while the additional cost required by produce upon all taxed articles to cover the trouble and risk is saved.]

TRADES' UNIONS.

THE West Riding of Yorkshire, and other manufacturing districts, have of late been the scene of a very violent contention between employers and employees. It was stated in our last that the workmen in the West Riding had formed such a strongly compact and formidable system of combination, that the masters had found it necessary to memorialise government on the subject. A meeting of the principal manufacturers of that town and its vicinity was held on the 28th September, when an answer to their memorial was read, to the effect that the government could do nothing further than take the most active measures to repress disorder and punish crime. A series of resolutions was agreed to, stating "that the Unions had dictated in a most unwarrantable manner to the merchants and manufacturers; that they had interfered with workmen not in the Union, by abusing and intimidating them, and even treating them with violence and outrage; and that, in consequence, sentiments of hostility, suspicion, and distrust, were engendered between the masters and their workmen; that the committee of the Trades' Unions carried their interference to such a length as to control both the masters and the men, and that they absolutely interdicted the masters from having any part in fixing the wages to be paid to their own workmen, and obliged them to turn off or set on such workmen as the Union thought proper to dictate to them, and to pay them such wages as the committee directed, under pain of having their workmen, in every department of their works, withdrawn from their employment, and their manufactures shut up, at whatever loss or inconvenience; that they obliged the master to pay the same wages to his workmen as to good, and took from the men of skill and industry the advantages to which they were fairly entitled." The resolutions further stated, "that the masters did not wish to interfere with legitimate and well-regulated Unions of operatives, for the purpose of obtaining a fair price for their labour, but they objected to the tyrannical control of a Union committee which took out of their hands the management of their own capital, and the direction of their own works." These resolutions were carried unanimously, and a bond was also adopted, and signed by many who were present, by which the masters bind themselves in a penalty of £500, that they will not employ a workman who shall not, within fourteen days after he is required, sign a declaration that he is not a member of the Trades' Union, or who shall have been dismissed from any other master for refusing to sign such a declaration.

October 5, a working shoemaker, named Priestley, who had not joined any of the Unions, was sent for by the committee at the Cross Keys Inn, at Huddersfield, and, on his entering the room, was plunged twice into a puncheon of cold water, to the imminent danger of his life. He was ill for several days after, and two of the men concerned in the outrage were fined £5 each.

Another meeting of master manufacturers was held at Halifax, where the Leeds bond was adopted, and similar measures are in progress over all that district of country. It appears that persons employing about 2000 horse-power of machinery, or about 30,000 working people of all ages, have acceded to the bond, while others who have not signed, express their determination to enforce its objects by all means in their power.

These proceedings appear to have staggered the Unions a little. About the middle of October, representatives from the various provincial committees came to a resolution of addressing a communication through their secretary, to the chairman of the Leeds meeting, inviting the individuals concerned in the affair to appoint a deputation to meet a deputation the same number of the Trades' Union, to discuss the points at issue between the two parties coolly and deliberately, with a view to the reconciliation of all existing differences, and pledge themselves to abide by an impartial decision. It is also stated that various Individuals have left the Union at Liverpool, and returned to their work. The master-builders at that place have in many instances got new hands from France, and cannot again receive their former workmen. Thus, the combination ends in a derangement of the demand and supply of labour at different parts of the country. A convocation of delegates from all the Unions was lately held at Manchester: five hundred were present, whose expenses, amounting to £500, were paid from a general fund.

RECENT CONDUCT OF EARL GREY.

EARL GREY has lately been very much censured by ultra-liberals for new instances of partiality in his relations. A prebendal stall of Westminster, which he has bestowed upon his brother the Bishop of Hereford, and the comptrollership of the Irish household, which he was said to have given to another brother, Sir H. Grey, formed the subjects of a fresh attack. The ministerial newspapers, however, allege that the stall is necessary to furnish a pro-income to the bishop, as with it he will only earn £3500, five hundred pounds less than the minimum arrived at for the Irish bishops; while the story of the comptrollership is not true. Defences are also forwarded for his lordship, on the score that he has yet done nothing equal to what Tory ministers used to do; to which it is replied that no individual Tory minister ever bestowed so much patronage upon relatives in a given time, or even during his whole administration, as Earl Grey has done; while, say the ultra-liberals, even if this excuse were founded on truth, it would still be invalid, in so far as Earl Grey's administration was set up as an improvement on former ones, and not as an imitation. So far as we are able to estimate the public sentiment on this subject, we would say it stands thus: the Tories congratulate themselves on seeing a professedly liberal minister transcending, in this point, all that was ever done to their own charge; the ultra-liberals execrate the mark of a partial and exclusive spirit; and the ministerials would like as well if they were spared the trouble of defending it.

INVESTIGATION RESPECTING THE LOSS OF THE EARL OF WEMYSS SMACK.

THE loss of life, noticed in our last as arising from the stranding of the Earl of Wemyss smack, at Brancaster, in Norfolk, on the morning of the 1st of September, has continued to excite much attention during the last month, in consequence of an inquiry into the circumstances, instituted under the direction of Lord Melbourne, by Mr Hare and other magistrates of the district. The magistrates sat for the first time at the Old Arms, Docking, on the 28th of September, and the first person examined was Captain Nesbit, the commander of the vessel, whose evidence, supported by that of his mate, bore that the water did not enter from the skylights, which he says were tarpauplined at the time, but from a leak dashed out in the bottom, by the agitation of the vessel under the influence of the rising tide. The evidence of Mr Henry Gooch, one of the passengers, bore that the disaster arose from a mistake of the captain as to the tide. Captain Nesbit thought it was ebbing, and that, if the passengers waited, they would get ashore without inconvenience. Assured of this by the captain, the passengers waited, till at four in the morning Mr Gooch became convinced that the tide was flowing instead of ebbing, and immediately sent intelligence to that effect to the captain, who, on consulting an almanack, found at length that such was the case. The evidence of Mr Gooch proved the extreme carelessness of the captain and mate. The latter was told to put a tarpaulin over the broken skylights; but it was not done, and the first sea filled the cabins with water, which caused the death of the ladies and children. The evidence of the Rev. Mr Holloway, who interested himself most actively in the whole proceedings, gives a most unfavourable impression of the conduct of the captain. At eleven o'clock on the morning of the calamity, after attending to the comforts of the surviving passengers, Mr Holloway went to the cabin, whom he found intent on having his breakfast, and apparently indifferent about the fate of his passengers. Mr H. asked if it was true that he had lost his passengers: he replied that "he had lost a few." He then asked the captain, "Had he ever heard of a British sailor eating his breakfast with the coolness and collectedness of a butcher under such circumstances?" He inquired where the ladies were; the captain said that he had left them in the cabin, which was full of water. Understanding that the vessel was on dry land, he asked the captain, "How could that be?" He replied, that a sea had struck the vessel about eight o'clock, carried away the skylights, and filled the cabin with water. He then asked him if he had made any attempt to recover them. The captain said, "No; it was of no use; they had been dead nearly four hours." Mr H. then said to the captain, "It appears that the ladies were drowned at eight o'clock, and no attempt was made to rescue them; and you and your crew coolly came on shore, without even inquiring whether they were dead or not—is that true?" The captain said, "It is too true; I have already told you the ladies are drowned." Mr H. then, under great excitement, exclaimed, "Was it possible that such a fate could exist in the shape of a British seaman?" Mr H. then detailed other circumstances connected with the state of the vessel on that day, and the bringing ashore of the bodies, some of which, even at five in the afternoon, he found still warm. He subsequently questioned the captain as to the state of his sails, and found they had not been sea-worthy. The farther evidence of the reverend gentleman went to show the neglect of the property by the crew, and the callous indifference shown for the fate of the sufferers.

Several individuals of maritime professions gave evidence respecting the state of the vessel during the night, and on the succeeding day. The most material facts elicited were, that the water in the cabin could not be got out till scuttling had taken place, (which shows that it did not come in from below), and that at no time could the passengers have got ashore without a boat, as the vessel, even at the lowest ebb of tide, was in nine feet water.

The constable of Brancaster and the postmaster said, that a Scotchwoman had been taken into custody on a charge of plundering the ladies: she had been a passenger on board the Wemyss. She was searched, but no property was found upon her; and Mr MacNaughton, the agent of the vessel, gave her a sovereign to go out of the way.

Several witnesses gave testimony respecting a box belonging to Mrs Pyne, one of the passengers, which was found on the beach with the padlock taken off. The box had been given to Mr Reeve, son-in-law of the lord of the manor, who was stated to have been seen riding to shore with it, and then returning without it.

Mr Nathaniel Pyne, of Grosvenor Place, London, came to Brancaster on the 6th September. He saw both the captain and mate of the Wemyss at the Ship Inn. They gave him the same account of the storm, and the circumstances attending the wreck, as they gave in their evidence; except that the mate said the skylights were not even covered, as there was no time to cover or batten them down.

Mr Joseph Newman Reeve, whose name repeatedly occurred during the inquiry, was then examined. He was commissioned by his father-in-law, who is lord of the manor, to render every assistance in his power to the sufferers, and he went to the beach for that purpose. When he got on board, several of the bodies were seen floating in the cabin, and a number of men were endeavouring to get them out. In allusion to a charge of brutality which Mr Ashurst, the solicitor, had made, he begged to say that he took charge of the property of the bodies to protect them from revolting indignities—such as having their fingers cutoff to get the rings off them. Hearing that there were some rings found upon the persons of the drowned, he came forward and said to those who had them, "Allow me to take charge of them." Some were put into his hand, and others he took off. He used every delicacy in placing the bodies on the deck. He could have done no more for them if they had been relatives of his own. One of the ladies—the stout one, Mrs Pyne—had a reticule in her possession; he took charge of that. Some gentlemen were standing around him, and asked him to open it; he did so; the wind was blowing very hard; he put it into his pocket; he thought it would be wrong to examine the contents then. After he left the vessel, the first place he went to was the church; he there saw Mr Holloway, the minister; in a few minutes after he had entered, he told him that he had a reticule of Mrs Pyne's. He had it then in his pocket. He wore a short jacket; the bag was wet in his pocket. He raised the jacket on one side towards Mr Holloway, and unsnapped the reticule without taking it out of his pocket; but so, as he judged, that Mr Holloway saw the direction of a letter contained in it. The letter contained the address of Mrs L. Pyne. He thought that it was addressed to St George's Terrace, Bayswater. He subsequently went into town to the Ship Inn, where he saw the captain: he told him that he had found a reticule belonging to one of the passengers, and that he should be very glad to restore it to the owner. The captain said, "Very well, sir." He then went home and examined the reticule, which he found to contain some biscuits, four Exchequer bills of £100 each, and a purse containing £48 in bank notes and gold. He wrote a letter to Mr Pyne at Bayswater, informing him that he had possession of the reticule. He afterwards delivered it to Captain Nesbit, in the presence of Mr Mingay, and several of the passengers. He also gave up several articles of jewellery, a necklace, rings, and ear-rings. Mr Gooch, one of the passengers, then made to him the following observation:—"Well, sir, that is all very well, and we don't for a moment doubt your veracity; but what a pity it was that you did not cause the bag to be opened in the presence of some person; supposing the contents might have been £4000 instead of £400." He replied, that it would be a very poor reward for his services.

Hannah West, Mrs Pyne's servant, was then examined. She assisted Mrs Pyne to pack up previous to her departure in the Wemyss. Among the baggage, was a tin box, the same which was then produced to the witness. Her mistress told her that the box contained brilliants and jewellery worth two or three thousand pounds. A roll of bank notes, and some plate, were also placed in the box, which was tied up, and secured by a padlock. She was certain that her mistress did not open the box before she went on board. Before she went, having occasion for money, she gave an order upon her agent, rather than open the box to take out money. She saw the tin box, and a work-box also containing some money, deposited in the cabin of the Wemyss.

Hannah Pike was employed in laying out the bodies of the passengers. Mrs Pyne's ear was inflamed by the hole where the ear-ring was worn being torn down, but not torn through. She observed the same with respect to another lady.

The attention of the magistrates being now chiefly directed to the conduct of Mr Reeve, that individual was subjected to a long and rigid re-examination. He re-asserted, in the strongest manner, that he had done all he could to prevent any improper treatment of the corpses when laid out on the deck; and also said, that the persons who crowded to the vessel, and assisted in getting out the cargo, were orderly and decent in their behaviour. He did not explain the inconsistency of this statement with his declaration of the necessity of stripping the bodies of the valuables in question, lest they should be stolen by the bystanders. It did not appear that he exerted himself in any way to procure refreshment or shelter for the survivors, or decent attention to the dead bodies, after he had obtained possession of all that was valuable upon them. He was closely pressed to explain how it happened that the nine £5 notes, which he said were found in Mrs Pyne's reticule, were quite dry, while every thing else in the reticule was completely saturated with water; but he gave no satisfactory explanation of this, though he thought that a letter was wrapped round the notes, which being in the middle of the reticule, might not have been so much wet: some gloves, however, and articles of much stouter texture, were quite shrivelled up by the effects of salt water. He was reminded that one of the witnesses had stated that he was seen riding on horseback from the vessel to the shore, with a box, and that he was afterwards seen riding without it; and he was asked if this was true? He replied, "Certainly not. I am quite clear that there is no foundation for that statement." It never occurred to him to call in a witness to be present when he first examined the contents of the reticule; although, when he delivered it with its contents to the captain, he required the signature of six witnesses.

Mr Reeve signed his examination; and the magistrates, after conferring together, asked Mr Ashurst what course he meant to pursue? That gentleman, after consulting Mr Pyne for a few minutes, stated, that Mr Pyne felt himself called upon to charge Mr Reeve with feloniously taking the reticule from the person of his late wife or daughter-in-law, and with brutal behaviour in tearing their ornaments from their persons on the deck of the vessel, while they were yet warm; also with feloniously taking a box, the property of Mr William Pyne, or some person or persons unknown.

In support of the charge, several witnesses were called; from whose evidence it appeared, that Mr Reeve took possession of a bag, which fell from Mrs Pyne's arm as she was lifted out of the cabin, and which was brought up out of the water by a boat-hook. He took this bag, walked aside, and took something out of it, which he put in again, and afterwards threw the bag in the companion-way. Subsequently, a similar bag, with a half-pint bottle in it, was handed over the ship's side, and taken ashore. Mr Reeve was also seen examining the contents of a third bag, without a clasp, and different from that which he took from Mrs Pyne, or the one last mentioned. The upper part of this bag contained biscuits; but there was a purse also in it, out of which Mr Reeve took a piece of paper with some writing on it. There was a card in the bag, with the name of Mrs or Miss Roche upon it. The purse contained a sovereign and some silver. One of the women employed to lay out the bodies of the ladies in the church, found a bag similar to the one which contained this purse and Miss Roche's card, upon the person of Miss Roche. The string of the bag was under the tape of the petticoat, and was drawn through its own loop. The outer part of the dress was much disordered, and was torn from back to front, in the centre, just in that part where the string of the petticoat passed round the body. There was no purse in the bag then, but the card and other articles were there. A police officer stated, that he went to the house of Mr Sims, Mr Reeve's father-in-law, where Mr Reeve resides, with a search-warrant; he told him that he believed that he had a second bag in his possession: this Mr Reeve denied; and he searched the house, but could not find it.

Two witnesses swore to having seen a box, thirteen or fourteen inches long, nine or ten inches wide, and three inches deep, in Mr Reeve's possession. It was handed to him by a man who stood in the water: he took it with him to the place on the beach where the preventive service men were taking care of the goods. He was afterwards seen without the box, and shortly after with it again.

At this stage of the inquiry, Mr Ashurst made a statement against the prisoner, laying great stress upon the circumstance of his having had three bags in his possession, and arguing that he had fastened Miss Roche's bag to her petticoat after having stolen the purse and its contents; but, according to the report in the Times, he said nothing about the box, which was supposed to contain Mrs Pyne's jewellery.

The magistrates finally ordered Mr Reeve to find good bail for his appearance at the assizes. The investigation was now (October 10) closed; but on the 15th, Mr Alexander Roche, brother to Miss Roche, one of the unfortunate passengers, appeared before the magistrates to prefer a new charge of felony against Mr Reeve. Several witnesses were examined in support of this charge; but no additional fact of interest was elicited, except that Mr Roche felt certain that his sister had at least eight guineas in her purse, to pay for her own passage and that of her nephew, who was drowned with her. Mr Reeve asserted his innocence, but made no defence.

While the warrant was preparing, Mr Reeve, looking significantly towards Mr Holloway, said that this inquiry was set on foot by persons who had better attend to their own affairs. Mr Holloway defended himself from the insinuation of having acted in the business from any personal ill-will to Mr Reeve. He also said, that he had evidence in his possession which implicated other persons.—Informations were then laid against several parties not yet in custody, and whose names are not given: the charges are of a very serious nature.—Mr Reeve was conveyed to Norwich jail, in a post-chaise, in custody of the constable; with leave, however, to call at his place of residence.

LOSS OF THE AMPHITRITE.

THE loss of this convict vessel on the shore at Boulogne, when out of 136 persons only three were saved, was the most remarkable disaster experienced during the severe gale of the 31st August, which literally "strewed our coasts with wrecks." Captain Chads, R.N., was dispatched by the Admiralty to institute an inquiry into the conduct of the consul, William Hamilton, Esq., who was loudly blamed by popular report for remissness on this occasion. A report by Captain Chads, dated September 18, fully exonerates that gentleman from all charges brought against him; states that he had been engaged that day in inquiries respecting other vessels; that he was not apprised of the stranding of the Amphitrite till eight in the evening, when he immediately repaired to the beach, and that he remained till two in the morning, rendering such assistance as was in his power; the destruction of the vessel being then inevitable. Notwithstanding this official exoneration, it is stated that public opinion at Boulogne still throws great blame upon the consul.

The conduct of the French custom-house officers, who, from some point of form, prevented prompt assistance from being rendered to many of the sufferers as they were washed ashore, has also been visited with severe and universal reprobation.

The gallant Henin, who swam to the vessel, and gave advice which, if received, might have saved many lives, has been decorated by his sovereign with the star of the Legion of Honour. A gold medal has been bestowed upon a pilot named Huret, and silver medals upon nine sailors, who upon the same occasion went out in a boat to give relief. Another pilot, named Testard, being already a member of the Legion of Honour, has merely received the commendation of the Minister of Marine. Henin has also been honoured with the silver medal of the Royal National Institution for the Preservation of Life from Shipwreck, along with 250 francs; and Huret and his crew have received a similar sum from the same body. The British government sent L.100 by Captain Chads, to be distributed among these brave men.

A large sum has been raised by subscription in France for the three men who survived the wreck. One of them, Towsey, who is a person of better extraction than the rest, has received L.5 from Sir James Graham, with a promise of a second-mastership in some other vessel. The other two men, Owen and Rice, have emitted a paper, giving a very interesting account of the convicts, who, it will be recollected, were all females. Some were dreadfully wicked, others modest, quiet, and even pious. The most striking point in the description is the mixture of good and bad, and the exposure of the children to the hearing and seeing of every thing odious. It may be difficult for the government to provide against this evil; but it is certainly much to be lamented that both in this, and in other situations for criminals, there is not a separation of the comparatively good from the comparatively bad.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

A LARGE public meeting took place at York (Oct. 3), for the purpose of considering the propriety of erecting a monument to the late Mr Wilberforce. The Lord Chancellor, who is spending the vacation at Brougham Hall, attended the meeting, and in a long speech pointed out the propriety of erecting a beneficial institution instead of a monument, or as a monument, if the funds collected should be found sufficient. "If he were asked," his lordship thus proceeded, "what sort of an institution he should recommend, he would only say there were numerous classes to whom some foundation would be a blessing. There had been for many years at Liverpool an institution for persons who from their birth had been afflicted with blindness, which had been extensively useful in its results, though wholly insufficient for the wants of so populous a district. In Yorkshire there had never been such an institution, though in no county was it more wanted. But he confessed that his own views went beyond such a limited institution, and he was not without sanguine hopes that a fund might be collected in Yorkshire, where had begun, and had been carried on, and brought to a successful issue, the abolition of the African slave trade, and where also had originated that spirit which had at length forced on measures for the extirpation of negro slavery—not assuredly until the eleventh hour, and when it could no longer be delayed even for a moment—a fund which would enable Yorkshire also to effect the good work, not of extirpating slavery—for, thank God, we knew it not in this country—but of extirpating ignorance, which, unhappily, we did know to a horrible extent, and the bitter fruits of which we were tasting, and should continue to taste. (Applause.)—And then he trusted, when ignorance was conquered, the execrable but legitimate offspring of ignorance would also be triumphed over—he meant discord, intolerance, and vice. (Loud cheers.) If we were told that Parliament had the power to attain this noble end, he must say that his hopes in such a quarter were not very strong (and he averred he spoke with all reverence and affection for that body), when he found the supplies for educating the people were voted at so late a period, and to so limited an extent—late, because fifteen years had elapsed since the publication of the report which recommended a grant—and limited, since that grant was bestowed to the amount only of L.20,000, at a time when L.20,000,000 were given—justly, he did not deny—fitly, he would say nothing about—with his full concurrence, certainly his full approbation—as a compensation for the abolition of negro slavery." The Lord Chancellor's proposal was agreed to.

It would appear, nevertheless, that the Ministry has been taking the subject into consideration, as a circular has been issued from the office of the Home Secretary to the different parochial officers in the country, to make out the following returns:—"The number of schools in each town, parish, chapelry, or extra-parochial place; which return, after stating the population of the said town or place according to the last census, shall specify—1. Whether the said schools are infant, daily, or Sunday schools—2. Whether they are confined, either nominally or virtually, to the use of children of the established church, or of any other religious denomination—3. Whether they are endowed or unendowed—4. By what funds they are supported, if unendowed, whether by payments from the scholars or otherwise—5. The numbers and sexes of the scholars in each school—6. The age at which the children generally enter, and at which they generally quit school—7. The salaries and other emoluments allowed to the masters or mistresses in each school; and shall also distinguish—8. Those schools which have been established or revived since 1818—and 9. Those schools to which a lending library is attached."

For the administration of the L.20,000 voted by Parliament, the Lords of the Treasury (Aug. 30) came to several resolutions, the most remarkable of which are, that no portion of the fund shall be applied to any purpose but the erection of school-houses, and nowhere unless the half of the necessary sum has been raised by private subscription, and already expended. Their lordships also resolved that petitions from populous places should have a preference. A successful application has already been made from the town of Wolverhampton. The school to be in consequence erected will contain from 700 to 1000 scholars, to be admitted without regard to sect, party, or profession, and educated on the plan pursued by the British and Foreign School Society.

The Quarter's Revenue.—The revenue for the quarter ended 10th October 1833, is L.11,840,310; and, for the corresponding quarter of 1832, L.12,093,586. The decrease on the quarter is L.253,276. The income for the year ended 10th October 1833, is L.43,028,392; and, for the year ended 10th October 1832, L.43,408,812. The decrease on the year is L.380,420. The decrease in the quarter has fallen almost entirely under the head of customs, and the increase has taken place chiefly in the excise. The deficiency of the former is L.423,680, and the compensating increase on the latter is L.103,121. In the revenue for the year the chief deficiency is in the excise, counteracted by a small improvement in the customs. From the amount of taxes reduced or repealed within the year, it was expected that a greater falling off would have been manifested. The quarter's stamp revenue exhibits an increase of L.23,694, notwithstanding the total repeal of the duty on insurances on farming stock, on small receipts and on pamphlets, the reductions of sea policies one-half, and of the advertisement duty from 3s. 6d. to 1s. 6d.

Earl Grey has lately, within a few days, conferred the following favours on his relations and connections. His youngest son is made aide-de-camp to the new Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. A Mr Bulteel, brother to one of his sons-in-law, is preferred to the vicarage of Gorington, in Dorsetshire.

The Devonport Journal states that a piece of mechanism, called a steam-bridge, has commenced plying between Morice Town and Torpoint, performing the passage in four and a half minutes. The weight of the machinery is forty-five tons, the draught of water two feet three inches; the chains weigh ten tons each.

October 15, during a storm of great violence, the chain pier at Brighton was seriously damaged—it is said by lightning, though great doubts as to that are intimated. Several of the suspension rods on the east side of the second and third bridges of the pier are said to have been struck by the fluid, which caused several parts of the structure to give way, and the platform of the third bridge to tumble down. The whole fabric, it is stated, will be required to be taken down.

The dreadful practice of incendiarism has again commenced in England. Every weekly paper mentions from three to six cases, some of them very severe. As the practice has now for several years commenced regularly at this period of the year, it must have a stated and regular cause, which we suppose to be the reduction of the wages of agricultural labourers, which always takes place about this season.

The Duke and Duchess of Cumberland have left England for Germany. Previous to the departure of his royal highness, his butler put an end to his own existence, under the influence, as appeared upon the inquest, of offended pride working upon a weak character. The duke showed a great anxiety at the inquest to make this painful circumstance clear to the public.

Alderman Farebrother is the Lord Mayor elect of city of London.

A school of medicine has just been established at Nottingham, to which the Duke of Newcastle has given a princely donation of L.500.

The accounts, not only from this district, but from nearly all parts of the country, agree in stating that great a degree of confidence in all departments of trade has not existed for some time.—Birmingham Advertiser.

On the 19th September, the Rev. W. Maclean, of the Scotch church, Birmingham, was inducted to pastoral charge of the Presbyterian church in Douglas Isle of Man. The church to which Mr Maclean was inducted is the only Scotch church in the Isle of Man which contains a population of 40,000 inhabitants.

Drury Lane and Covent Garden theatres were opened the former on the 5th, the latter on the 7th October, under one manager; and matters are so arranged that they are only open on alternate nights, and that one company serves for both.

The remarkable powers of the race-horse were strikingly displayed at the last Kendal races, when Sir John Boswell's colt was so frightened, it being his first appearance in public, that his first bound from the course, which was elevated, was ten yards, his second eight, and his third seven and a half—making 25½ yards at three bounds.—Carlisle Journal.

It is said that the west end of London was observed to be more completely deserted this autumn than at any period during the present century.

Sir J. Herschell is about leaving his residence at Slough for the Cape of Good Hope, to make observations on the fixed stars in the southern hemisphere. His waggons were employed in removing his telescopic transit instruments, and apparatus.

On Thursday (Sept. 19), there was a very pleasant fête at Eltham, Kent, in honour of the Rev. Mr Broome, who has been for fifty years the vicar of the parish, during which time his conduct has been so truly that of a pastor, in the highest acceptance of that term, that the flock determined to celebrate a jubilee, upon the occasion of his completing his fifty years' labour among them. As early as five o'clock in the morning, the bells rang merrily peal; and throughout the parish, flags decorated with flowers and other emblems were displayed. In the grounds attached to the vicarage, the inhabitants of the parish and neighbourhood assembled in great numbers. Here three tents were pitched; one for the gentlemen composing the committee, and two for the children of the National Schools, besides other places of refreshment. The schools and inhabitants having assembled, a procession was formed, headed by the vicar, during the progress of which the bands played the national anthem. When every thing was prepared, fifteen hundred of the inhabitants sat down to dinner, besides sixty-two girls and seventy boys. After dinner had been disposed of, Mr Mills proposed "the health of the Rev. John Kewward Shaw Brooke, who has been for fifty years the beloved vicar of this parish. May he yet be spared to many years in health and happiness." The toast was followed by a salute of twenty-one maroons, the company waving their hats and handkerchiefs with nine times ni.

The following is a list of the houses which have lately failed in India, with the sums for which they stand indebted:—

John Palmer and Co. Calcutta, about	L.5,000,000
Alexander and Co. ditto	3,500,000
Mackintosh and Co. ditto	2,500,000
Colvin and Co. ditto	1,000,000
Shotton and Co. Bombay	250,000
	L.12,250,000

To which, if there is added, as the consequence of them, that of Fairlie and Co. London	1,800,000
Rickards and Mackintosh, ditto	950,000

The amount will be L.15,000,000. The amount of distress occasioned to private families in this country, and others, by these failures, is incalculable.

The Corporation of Leicester refuses to produce certain documents, or to submit to personal examination, required of them by the commission for inquiring into the affairs of the municipalities. Other witnesses are stated, however, to have "deposed to the sale of corporation lands, which, estimated at one-fourth of their present value, amounted to L.34,800, of the appropriation of which no one knows any thing."

Relative Value of Railway Shares.—The Stockton and Darlington shares, costing L.106, 13s. 4d., are at L.2 10s. The Liverpool and Manchester railway shares, costing L.100, are at L.210. The Liverpool and Manchester railway shares, costing L.25, are at L.52. The Liverpool and Birmingham shares, on which L.10 has been paid, are selling at L.11, 10s. The London and Birmingham shares, on which L.5 has been paid, are selling at L.7, 10s. The two latter are only in progress.

The quantity of Bank of England notes now in circulation amounts to L.20,329,290. The quantity last year was nearly two millions less, L.18,360,890.

Eleven thousand pounds weight of a substance called "British leaf," consisting of elm, sloe, apple, poplar, willow, and rose leaves, and manufactured to answer a beverage instead of tea, were lately seized by the police, who claimed, that, being an imitation of that article, it should be destroyed by order of the Lord Mayor. Several witnesses were examined at the Mansion House, some of whom, including Mr Burnett, professor of botany in King's College, stated that the stuff was unwholesome, and that it contained prussic acid. Doctor Birkbeck, and Mr Daniel, professor of chemistry in King's College, on the contrary, stated that there was nothing deleterious or unwholesome in the mixture. The Lord Mayor ultimately decided that the whole of the "British leaf" should be destroyed. The proprietor, Mr Heale, signified that he should appeal to Parliament.

here has been for some time a considerable difference of opinion between the inhabitants and Common Councilmen of Langbourn Ward, on the subject of the most worshipful representative in the Court of Aldermen (Sir John Key). The Common Council agree with the inhabitants that Sir John Key is unfit for the office he still holds, but thought they were not the proper parties to move in the matter. The disgust of the inhabitants, however, was so strong at the daring effrontery of the aldermen, that the Common Council considered it prudent to interfere, lest they might come in for a share of the general feeling when St Thomas's Day came round. They accordingly met, and unanimously agreed to a resolution, that the conduct of Sir John Key was highly disgraceful, and such as incapacitated him from exercising the office of a magistrate; and they, therefore, on behalf of the ward, requested him to resign his seat forthwith. On the next morning this resolution was presented to Sir John Key by one of the Common Council (the tenth being out of office, but cognisant of and approving the proceeding), accompanied with the expression of their regret at the unavoidable necessity of the step they had taken, and their opinion that it was advisable for him to comply with this resolution at once, rather than wait for a public meeting. Sir John, to the amazement of the delegation, stated that his resigning was quite out of the question; that nothing he had done could be considered dishonourable, or as affecting his magisterial character; and that he should retain his gown until he was compelled (if that were possible) to vacate it. He added, that he was much surprised at the extraordinary conduct of the Common Council, some of whom he understood had made use of very strong language respecting him. To this one of the deputation replied, that if Sir John alluded to him, he was perfectly correct; that he had designated him as a scoundrel, an opinion which he believed was entertained by eleven out of twelve persons in the city of London. Sir John reiterated his determination to remain in his magisterial office; and the Common Council, having again warned him of the probable consequences of his obstinacy, the interview terminated. It is now understood that such steps will be taken by the ward on the 21st of December (St Thomas's Day), that the honourable magistrate will be compelled to retire.—Morning Post.

A plan, sanctioned by government it is said, is about to be acted upon, which, it is hoped, will tend materially to abate pauperism, and eventually to improve the condition of the lower classes. It is intended to open in every parish an establishment for granting annuities, on terms especially favourable to the industrious part of the community. A person paying, from the age of fifteen, 9d. per week, will, by the time of completing his 60th year, be entitled to an annuity of £20 per annum for life—if he pays 1s. 6d. per week, he will be entitled to receive the annuity of £20 from the age of thirty-five or forty. A person of the age of thirty, paying 1s. 6d. per week, or £67 in one payment, will be entitled to an annuity of £20 per annum for sixty. In all cases, if the party die before the period at which the annuity is to commence, the whole of the money he has paid will be returned to his relatives, &c.; and if the sum returned should be under £20, no administration is necessary. If the party after he has been in receipt of an annuity of £20 per annum, in addition to all arrears being paid, his relatives, &c., will be entitled to the sum of £5.

STRAY FACTS.

Britain contained one hundred and forty cities towards the close of the first century of the Christian era. From Richard's Itinerary, which refers most probably to a period between A.D. 138 and 170, we find there were in Britain two MUNICIPAL—York and Verulam; nine COLONIAL—Colchester, Richborough, London, Gloucester, Bath, Caerleon, Chesterford (near Cambridge), Lincoln, Chester; and ten CITIES with the Jus Latinitatis—Aber, Inverness, Perth, Dumbarton, Carlisle, Salisbury, Lancaster, Catarick, Slack, and Blackrode.

In 1830, the navy cost £5,594,955. In 1833, the vote was £4,658,134; nearly a million less.

Mrs Hannah More, who died lately, had realised the sum of £30,000 by her writings. She has left £10,000 to charitable institutions.

Decandolle, the distinguished naturalist, holds that trees do not die of old age, in the real sense of the word, "by which he seems to mean that they would live ever, if provided with an unlimited supply of nourishment, and not destroyed by storms, or some of the many accidents which trees are heir to. In our own country, there are oaks, elms, and yews, still flourishing in all the parts of the forest, which have probably been the contemporaries of David and Solomon! Decandolle thinks that the yews of Fontaine Abbey, near Rippon, Yorkshire, may have stood 1200 years; those of Crowhurst churchyard, in Surrey, 1450 years; the yew of Fortingal, the entrance of Glenlyon, Perthshire, 2500 years; and that in Braburn churchyard, Kent, 3000 years!

In 1767, there were not 30,000 persons employed in cotton manufacture; now, in consequence of inventions which the workmen at the very time of their introduction endeavoured to destroy, there are at the very least 1,000,000.—Imperial Magazine.

There are 16,000 officers in the British army, being for every six men. The French have about the same number of officers to four times the number of men.

15. At Perth, the Rev. Jedediah Aikman, for 41 years minister of the South Congregation of the Secession Church in that place. Lately, at Cluny estate, in St Thomas in the East, Jamaica, John M'Pherson, Esq. the nephew and heir-presumptive of the chieftain of that clan. The old gentleman, in defiance of musquitoes and every thing else, continued to wear the phibag, composed of the tartan of his clan. So universally was this gentleman respected in the quarter, that a holiday was granted to all the negroes to attend his remains to "the narrow house;" and a poor old Highlandman, who could scarcely crawl to his kinsman's grave, produced his bagpipe, and played the "M'Pherson's Lament," in style which was responded to by every Cent present, by doffing his bonnet.

SCOTTISH BANKRUPTS.

POPULAR EDUCATION IN EDINBURGH.

WITHIN these few years, the education of the middle and lower classes of Edinburgh, on the plan of popular lectures in the evenings, has risen from a state of comparative insignificance to one of considerable local distinction. The first established institution of this nature was the School of Arts, intended for the instruction of mechanics and young men generally belonging to the trading community. It possesses a useful library, and apparatus for certain philosophical experiments. Lectures are given on mechanical philosophy, chemistry, mathematics (for which there is a junior and senior class), natural philosophy, &c. The fee for each of the classes is five shillings. This institution has hitherto been well attended; though it is understood, from the circumstance of its being under the government of functionaries not belonging to the class receiving instruction, to be less efficacious and popular than it would otherwise be. Besides this establishment, an Artizan's Reading Room, and Mechanics' Library, there are other and more recent institutions, worthy of being brought under notice.

The first of these is the Edinburgh Association for Useful and Entertaining Knowledge, which, according to the printed reports of the body, originated in a popular course of lectures on phrenology, delivered by Mr George Combe during the summer of 1832. Towards the conclusion of the lectures, several individuals attending them expressed a strong desire for a more extended course during winter, along with some other subjects of natural science. In accordance with the arrangements then entered into, lectures on geology and chemistry, the former one night, and the latter two nights of the week, were delivered in the Waterloo Rooms by Dr John Murray; and on phrenology, one night of the week, in Clyde Street Hall, by Mr George Combe. From the abstract of receipt and expenditure, there appear to have been sold 251 geology tickets, 142 visitors; 229 chemistry tickets, 387 visitors; 225 phrenological tickets, 700 visitors. About one-third of the students were ladies, and the whole auditory consisted of respectable people belonging to the middle and commercial classes of society. The session commenced early in November, and continued until the end of April following. The attendance was full throughout—in so much so, that occasional visitors at 6d. per night had often to go away disappointed of gaining admission.

During the summer months of May, June, and part of July, a course of popular lectures on botany was delivered in the Waterloo Rooms, on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, at half-past eight o'clock evening, by Dr Drummond of Belfast. Notwithstanding the general prevalence of the influenza epidemic, the technicalities indispensably necessary to be encountered, and the rather inconvenient period of the year for persons engaged in business—to say nothing of its evening rural attractions—191 tickets were sold, and 162 visitors admitted to this engaging and instructive course. In so far, therefore, the progress of the association has been brilliantly successful. There is every reason to expect that its future proceedings will be alike judicious in their details, and gratifying in their results.

The next association formed for the purpose of diffusing useful knowledge, is the Edinburgh Mechanics' Institution, which commenced its first or trial session in September last. Its object is to furnish instruction to journeymen mechanics, shopmen, and apprentices, at the lowest possible cost, in such branches of practically useful knowledge as are not comprised in the usual curriculum of the School of Arts. Its programme, accordingly, embraces English grammar, logic, and botany, with occasional lectures on geography, astronomy, and mechanical inventions. A class for English reading and recitation has been formed, as also another for arithmetic, the latter upon the plan of mutual instruction. The meetings are held on the evenings of Monday and Thursday, at half-past eight, in Skinner's Hall, High Street. A night in the week is set apart for discussion, original essays, and instructive extracts. These meetings have been described to us, by an eye-witness, as extremely interesting. The members, mustering upwards of a hundred workmen, propose, by clubbing one penny a-week each, to begin the formation of a library, which will likely be aided by donations from well-wishers. Four gentlemen, three of whom are professional teachers, give their gratuitous and zealous services as regular lecturers. The origin of this institution may possibly be traced to an article in No. 55 (28th Nov. 1829) of the Edinburgh Literary Journal, entitled, "Outline of a Mechanics' Institution for Edinburgh." The committee of management is very judiciously composed of working men. Approving of the Mechanics' Institution, both in its principle and practice, we heartily wish it success. We recommend it to the special attention of advanced students of our University and School of Arts, and to all who would improve themselves by the most effective method—that of instructing others.

In following up our account of the above institutions with a few general remarks, we would beg to press upon attention the very great importance to all establishments of a similar description and object—of regular annual reports of their proceedings. The task of compiling such reports would be a pleasure to some, and no great difficulty to any, forasmuch as all that is required is a plain and simple narrative of facts. So much of the success of popular institutions depends upon their managers, that we need also scarcely recommend the utmost care and caution in their selection, more especially of the working functionaries who have to perform the responsible duties of secretaries, treasurers, librarians, conveners, or the like. With regard to the creation of patrons, presidents, and vice-presidents, the policy may in some cases be very good; in others, exceedingly questionable. As a general rule, we should prefer seeing members of committee taking "the chair" by rotation. Above all, what we would guard against with becoming jealousy, is the enervating encumbrance and condescension of consequential "down-draughts," desirous of seeing their names in print, without doing any thing to merit that distinction.

These institutions, it would appear, afford sufficient materials for the formation of one great Polytechnic School, equal to that of Paris, without the dread of its political tendencies. How far it might be practicable or expedient to conjoin two or more of them, is a question we are not prepared to answer. Time will show this. And it may be as well, probably, that each go on, in the meanwhile, as it best can, in its own way, until matters arrive at a state of greater maturity. As they are, they present us with the gratifying spectacle of the love of our universities made accessible and of easy acquirement to all who seek after knowledge. In conclusion, we would suggest that the popular educational institutions should afford the utmost facility to the general attendance of the public, without reference to enrolment or the sale of season tickets. There are thousands of idlers in all classes of society, who at present loiter away hour after hour on the streets, or in attendance on places of amusement in no respect beneficial either to their mental faculties or bodily health; many of whom would take a pleasure and derive no small benefit in devoting their occasional spare time to hearing lectures on natural philosophy, provided they knew that they were at liberty, on paying a small sum, to gain admission. The attraction of all such individuals so situated should be a leading principle in the conducting of institutions calculated to be of extensive benefit to the community.

THE EDINBURGH THEATRE.

THEATRICALS appear to be in a sadly declining state in Edinburgh. Mr Murray, the clever and respected manager of the Theatre-Royal for many years past, stated, on the 18th October, in reference to a newspaper paragraph recommending a reduction of prices, that that was rendered impossible, on account of the necessity of large receipts for the gratification of first-rate metropolitan performers, who could not otherwise be induced to visit us. In this statement, Mr Murray speaks of the severe reverses he has met with, and of the possibility of his retiring from the field altogether. This event, should it take place, will be no subject for wonder, as it is understood that, for more than two years past, Mr Murray has been experiencing a constant loss, and is rapidly diminishing the hard-earned gains of his earlier life. Indeed, we conceive that this is the only practicable escape from the dilemma in which Mr Murray is placed. That the prices (5s. 3s. 2s. and 1s.) are too high for the pockets of the present day, is proved by the simple fact, that these sums now purchase a third, or a half more of almost every necessary of life, amusements included, than they did fifteen years ago, when the same prices were exacted, and that incomes are almost universally reduced in proportion. The prices taken at the Surrey Theatre in London (boxes 2s., pit 1s., gallery 6d.) are much nearer what would be necessary, in our opinion, to draw the same crowds that went fifteen years ago. If these prices, or something like them, will not suit the circumstances of the Edinburgh Theatre, or if a larger one cannot be substituted in order to gratify both stars and public, then it is a clear case that the Scottish capital must want the amusement of the stage. There are other causes, however, some of which we have pointed out elsewhere, operating against the interests of the stage—the superior entertainment and the purer morality to be now derived from books—the advancing religious antipathy to theatricals—the change of the domestic habits of wealthy people, and their greater ability now-a-days to amuse themselves at home. In short, Thalia and Melpomene must fly to new and raw countries across the Atlantic, where the taste of man is less tutored, and his understanding more under the necessity of being addressed through the eye.

Sept. 21. The first locomotive engine hitherto started north of the Forth, and the first which ever passed through a tunnel any where, commenced plying on the Newtyle railway, Dundee. Its trips have been hitherto purely experimental.

—24. Two hundred and sixty of the electors of Mr. Oswald, M.P. for Glasgow (described as belonging to the Old Whig or Charles Fox party), gave a dinner to that gentleman, as an expression of their approbation of his firm, independent, and consistent conduct in Parliament. At the Glasgow Circuit Court, three men, Barlow, Faulds, and Ritchie, were sentenced to nine months' imprisonment in Paisley Jail, and to find security in L.30 for five years after, for assaulting the voters for Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, on the 24th of December last, on the Broadlee Road—particularly Mr R. Armour, farmer in Patishtoun.

—25. A fine new ship, named the Maria, was launched from the ship-building yard of Mr Lang, Dumbarton. The Maria is the property of a number of the enterprising merchants of Rothsay, and is to be employed in the China trade. The novelty of a Rothsay China trading company has attracted the attention of a number of our Glasgow merchants, who are determined to participate in the advantages arising from the opening up of the China trade. The draft of a very large ship for the China trade has been sent out to Quebec by a Glasgow company. This ship is to be one of the largest hitherto seen on the Clyde.—Trinity chapel, Paisley, was consecrated by the Right Rev. Bishop Walker, for the use of a congregation in the Scottish Episcopal Communion.

Oct. 1. In pursuance of his sentence at the late Circuit Court of Justiciary, Robert Tennant was executed in front of the Court House, Broad Street, Stirling, for the murder of William Peddie, on the road near Benneross, in the parish of Falkirk, on the 3d August last. After the execution, the individual who had officiated was pursued and pelted by a mob to the danger of his life.

—7. Three hundred and twenty of the electors of Mr. Ewing, M.P., gave him a public dinner in the Assembly Rooms, Levee Street, Glasgow, as an expression of their approbation of his Parliamentary conduct. The last and most extensive of the three Falkirk Trysts commenced. Compared to last year, the number of sheep brought forward was considered to be 20,000 less, and the number on the ground was computed at 60,000. At an early hour in the morning, sales went on at a very brisk rate; Cheviot wethers brought as high as 30s.; current prices from 25s. to 28s.; ewes, 17s. to 20s.; current, 18s. to 19s.; some inferior lots at 16s.; black-faced wethers, top prices, 25s.; current, 23s.; ewes, 12s. to 17s.; some inferior lots as low as 10s. By eleven o'clock, all the principal lots were sold, and by two o'clock every description, of any consequence, was cleared off. The market, in regard to prices, exceeded expectation, and were fully 1s. a-head better than the September tryst, and from 4s. to 6s. a-head, according to quality, above last year's October tryst. There was not such a show of fine wethers as at the September trysts, and there were more ewes in proportion. Very large purchases were made for Dumfriesshire and the English market. Next day the cattle market was held as usual. The number was supposed to be very nearly the same as last year, about 60,000. The weather continued highly favourable for the business of this great market. Sales commenced equally animated as in the sheep market on the previous day; the best Aberdeen and Angusshire breed of heavy three and four-year-olds, sold from L.10 to L.15; average prices, L.10 to L.12; two to three-year-olds, L.7 to L.10; best West Highland stags, three and four-year-olds, L.7 to L.10, 1s.; two and three-year-olds, L.5 to L.8; best queys, two and three-year-olds, L.4 to L.7; next best two-year-olds, L.3 to L.4. The prices realised for the large cattle were fully five per cent better than the September tryst, and from seven and a half to ten per cent above last year. Small queys and stots about 20s. a-head more than last year; all the best lots were quickly sold off, and very few of any description left over. Milch cows, a poor show, chiefly small cows, but any thing good in demand; prices generally from L.8 to L.11. There was a very good show of work-horses, but a dull market, and very few sales effected; prices asking for best work-horses, L.25 to L.35; current prices paying, from L.20 to L.25.

—8, 9, 10, and 11. The Caledonian Hunt and Edinburgh races run off at Musselburgh Links. The company was unusually numerous. During the four days, 15,000 persons were conveyed from Edinburgh to Musselburgh by the railway, without the slightest accident.

—12. An aurora borealis of uncommon brilliancy was seen in most parts of Scotland.

—14. A curious discussion took place at the board of the Edinburgh Commissioners of Police, relative to the propriety of granting lights to the pedestal of Mr Pitt's statue, just erected in the New Town. A number of the members expressed themselves as strongly disinclined to throw out even the trifling expense necessary for this purpose, on account of their detestation of the political memory of the person represented by the statue. The four requisite lamps were at length with some difficulty voted by a majority of the board. It was resolved at this meeting that the city lamps should henceforth remain unlit in clear moonlight, by which a saving of L.200 would be effected.

—15. A beacon light on Girdleness, in Aberdeenshire, was first exhibited. It consists of two lights on one tower.

—20. Dr John Murdoch was consecrated a bishop in the Catholic chapel of Glasgow.

—22. After a protracted routine of forms, the Rev. Walter Tait, minister of the College Church, Edinburgh, was deposed by his Presbytery. It is very remarkable that this sincere but infatuated individual was lately deposed as effectually, though a little less formally, from the office of pastor to the Carrubers Close congregation, his assumption of which character was the proximate cause of his losing his status as a minister of the Established Church. On the latter occasion, Messrs Carlyle and Anderson, the two individuals whose manifestations of the divine spirit have been chiefly noticed in the late proceedings, "went up," says the Scotsman, "to the rev. gentleman in the pulpit, and told him that the Lord had revealed unto them that their pastor was wavering in his opinions regarding the manifestations of the spirit, and the inspiration of themselves as prophets, and their command from above was to substitute another minister in Mr Tait's place. They then ejected their pastor from the pulpit, and declared him deposed. Anderson then tied a white handkerchief over his eyes, and proceeded in blind-harry fashion to search for a new pastor. It chanced that he laid his hands on Carlyle's head, and that prophet was declared to be the Lord's choice, and forthwith installed as the Angel of the Church in Carrubers Close." To this it is hardly necessary to add, that the congregation of Carrubers Close has of late been advancing nearer and nearer to the character of a public nuisance. Owing to the large crowds collected to witness the absurdities, policemen have lately been required at the door, for the purpose of preserving order. On Sunday, October 13, a number of persons having lingered at the door, "had ultimately the satisfaction," according to an Edinburgh paper, "of hearing a manifestation. Just as the congregation had risen to dismiss, and while some of them were descending the staircase leading to the door, one of the 'Prophets' (Mr Carlyle, we presume) was suddenly seized with utterance, and gave a startling yell at the back of the door. The other congregants outside trembled, and the strangers near them stood amazed, while the oracle proceeded as follows, in a loud screeching voice: 'Thus saith the Lord, there is a conspiracy among ye! there is a conspiracy among ye! there is a conspiracy among ye! Ye have conspired to exclude from this congregation the prophets of the Lord! ye have conspired to exclude Carlyle and Anderson, the Lord's prophets! There is darkness coming upon ye! there is darkness coming upon the land! Repeat ye! repeat ye, before the Lord smite the earth with his thunderbolt! Ye adulterers and adulteresses, repent and return to the Lord, lest he destroy you all! Immediately after this, the door was opened, and the congregation came out.' It would not, we fear, minister to any good end, to relate more of the outrages on reason and decorum committed by these unhappy people.

It was agreed, at a meeting of the freeholders of the county of Edinburgh, Oct. 1, that their present hall, erected in 1819 in the Lawnmarket, should be removed to some more eligible site, and in order to admit of a better opening for the bridge building across the Cowgate. Besides the sum of L.400, which the Improvements Commissioners are to give them for the site of the building, the removal is estimated to cost the county L.5500.

The children of the Orphan Hospital, Edinburgh, a hundred in number, were removed, about the middle of October, from the building so long used on the east side of the North Bridge, to a very elegant structure recently erected for them on a high and salubrious piece of ground near the Dean, and which forms a highly ornamental object in that part of the environs of the city.

Two excellent institutions, originating in humble life, have lately been noticed in the newspapers, and appear worthy of general imitation. The lamplighters and scavengers of Edinburgh have entered into an arrangement, by which, when any of their number dies, the expense of the funeral is discharged by a contribution of sixpence from the wages of each of the surviving members for that week. The business is managed by a committee of the men, and is said to be conducted with a general feeling of cordiality. The other institution has been formed by the operatives in the Edinburgh Rope Company's works at Leith. These men labour an extra hour every Monday night, the proceeds of which go to a fund, from which they receive supplies, under certain regulations, when visited with sickness, and are provided with the sums necessary to discharge the expenses of funerals.

The south side of Heriot's Hospital, hitherto of an inferior species of building to the rest, is now undergoing the process of being converted to fine ashlar-work. This alteration was rendered necessary by a change of the principal approach to the building, which was formerly to the north.

The building of a second Roman Catholic chapel has been commenced in Edinburgh, on the site formerly occupied by the chants' Maiden Hospital.

Dinners, in honour of their Parliamentary conduct, have been given, during the vacation, to the following gentlemen:—Mr. Ewing and Mr. Ewing at Glasgow, Mr. Gillon at Hamilton, Mr. Dunlop at Port Glasgow, Sir David Baird of Newbyth at Haddington, Mr. Colquhoun at Dumbarton, and Mr. Murray at Leith.

Steam-vessels are preparing on a large scale for the purpose of supplying the metropolis with cattle from the eastern part of Scotland.

The disposition which characterises the present age to its into all assumed rights, is shown remarkably in a resistance which has lately taken place in various parts of Scotland to the payment of a kind of tax, which used to be imposed at funerals, on behalf of the poor, in the shape of a fee for the use of a mortcloth on all, wherever the coffins on such occasions are covered, and which always hitherto furnished by the parish. A mortcloth costs a few pounds; yet, as nobody would think of buying one for his own family, the parish-officers have been enabled to levy a very heavy funeral to the amount of perhaps a tenth or twelfth of the whole value of the article. In some places, associations have been formed for the purpose of supplying the use of a mortcloth at a cheaper rate; and a law process is now pending, at the instance of the kirk-session of the parish of Crichton, to ascertain the right of private individuals to bury their relations with their own pall.

A statue of James Watt—the fifth erected to him in this country—has recently been placed in the Hunterian Museum, Glasgow College. The inscription, from the pen of the Lord Chancellor, is in the following simple terms:—"This statue of James Watt, Fellow of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh, and member of the Institute of France, is presented by his son to the University of Glasgow, in gratitude for the encouragement afforded by its professors to the scientific pursuits of his father's early life."

The trustees of Burns's monument, near Ayr, have lately granted a lease of that object of national veneration, and the beautiful grounds around it, for 150 years, to Mr David Auld of Ayr, a gentleman who, by a judicious patronage, enabled the sculptor Thomas to execute the admired statues of Tam O'Shanter and Johnnie, and, by presenting these statues to the trustees of the monument, was the means, if we are not mistaken, of adding largely to the funds of the trust, and in fact of finishing the monument. This temple, the work of Mr Hamilton of Edinburgh, is perhaps the most unexceptionably beautiful specimen of Grecian architecture in the country, on such a scale, and, with the classical and romantic scenery around it, forms a landscape of surprising interest. A large and thriving inn has recently been built in the neighbourhood; and throughout all Ayrshire, it has become the prime object of every kind of pleasure excursion, from a marriage fete to a solitary walk.

A flight of steps, leading to the western entrance of the ruined cathedral of Elgin, and two feet and a half in depth, has just been discovered, and is said to add greatly to the effect of that still architectural object.

Mrs Gibson, mother of Sir James Gibson-Craig, has vested £100 in the Town Council of Dundee, that the interest may be given to a minister of the established church for preaching a yearli sermon against cruelty to animals.

Several stone coffins, with inscriptions, have lately been found, partly under the foundations of Melrose Abbey. The Kelso Chronicle speculates upon them as the receptacles of early Christians, on account of one of them having a cross prefixed to the inscription—which is simply "Beatrix, spouse of Robert Fraser." There may be some reason to suppose an early origin for these coffins, from finding them under the walls of a building erected in 80; but the cross tells nothing to that purpose, as it is customary to place on the monuments of Catholics to this day. We question, moreover, if English would have been employed on a monument previous to 1136, or if there were then any persons of the name Fraser in Scotland.

CHOLERA MORBUS.

This dreadful and severe disorder re-appeared at Paris in the latter part of September, and cut off a few individuals, but has since made any advance. It is raging in Spain, where in some parts 100 persons perish daily. It has also re-appeared in London and in Edinburgh, but with no particular virulence. The village of Dumbane in Perthshire, and that of Thornhill in Dumfriesshire, have been visited by it, and it is prevailing to a considerable extent in the Isle of Man.

Postscript.

Accounts from Madrid, to the 12th October, represent the government of the queen-regent as actively employed in measures for the suppression of the Carlist insurrection. Fifteen thousand men have put themselves in arms in various parts of the country on behalf of Don Carlos; but there is no appearance of himself, and his adherents must therefore be less prepared to withstand the powerful forces dispatched against them by the queen. Meanwhile, several commanders of great rank and influence, who were expected to declare for Don Carlos, have given in their submission to the queen; and Louis Philip has set a special ambassador, to tender his assistance in maintaining her government, which therefore seems little immediate danger from the Apostolical party.

The queen-regent has greatly strengthened her own cause, and that of Donna Maria of Portugal, by acknowledging the government of that princess, and withdrawing the Spanish minister from her cortege of Don Miguel.

Don Pedro began, on the 10th October, to attack the offensive against the army of Don Miguel. After a well-contested action, the latter were driven from their strong position near Lisbon, abandoning their sick and wounded, their baggage, part of their heavy artillery, and a large quantity of stores and ammunition. Every symptom foretells a speedy end to the contest.

On Thursday, October 24, a successful resistance was made by the populace of London to a seizure of arrears of assessed taxes. A van full of goods had been taken from the premises of Messrs Brayne and Savage, two tradesmen in the west end of the town. As it proceeded along the streets, a mob collected, and the police being defeated, the goods were taken back, and deposited in a neighbouring cellar. The van was subsequently destroyed by the populace.

GOVERNMENT AND MANAGEMENT.

THE grand difference between past ages and the present, so far as state affairs are concerned, is, that formerly nations were governed, and that now they are only managed. Of old, it was not thought possible to carry on the affairs of any country, unless the people were under a close and vigorous rule, confined perhaps to a sovereign (whose power was in part sustained by the idea that it emanated from the Deity), or at most to a limited number of grandees, or an influential class. That dogma has now in a great measure passed away, except among enlightened nations. In the more civilised countries, society has reached such a point, men have become so habituated to respect each other's rights, and to obey the regulations imposed as laws for the general welfare, that something little different from a mere committee of their own number, similar to what is appointed every day in minor communities for certain public objects, is now conceived to be necessary for the conduct of the state. In short, a state may now be said to consist of a people who want their public affairs conducted: it formerly consisted of a sovereign and a dominant class, who had a people to rule.

To minds which love to reflect on the movements of men in their larger masses, and throughout long stretches of time, this change is one of great importance. In a very recent period, there have been no nations so generally civilised and enlightened as to be fit for emancipation from the superstition-supported rule of arbitrary monarchy. Philosophy has hardly ever ceased to describe the populace as a many-headed monster, fickle, besotted, and cruel, which nothing but the strong hand of power could keep in check. And there are still many who believe that an instructed people is more dangerous than one totally sunk in ignorance, and that the only condition upon which a nation can be prosperous and peaceable, is, that an enlightened few shall coerce and enjoy the industry of a darkened many. Such notions, however, since the revival of literature and the arts, and more particularly their extension in the north-western states of Europe, have been gradually undergoing the process of refutation, not so much by the exertions of philosophical writers, as by the silent proofs afforded by the course of events and the acts of men. Nations have improved, and their governments have been improved as a matter of course. Men, in more than one country, have shown that they could live well without coercion; and coercion accordingly has, with them, as a great measure ceased. That a government may occasionally improve a people, it would be difficult to deny; but the improvement of a government in consequence of the improvement of a people, is a process of irresistible necessity, and, in fact, the natural course of things.

In the ancient Gothic monarchies of Europe, the patriarchal principle is still retained, though in all instances in a form modified to suit the comparative intelligence of the people. In Great Britain, since 1801, the king has had no constitutional character save that of a chief magistrate, his hereditary right being limited by the satisfaction of the people with his administration. In France, and other countries, the same system has been more recently established; and its endurance in one instance shows that it may endure in others. This, however, is not the extent of improvement to which men are disposed to limit their views. Even after wilful rule has been abolished, there may still remain to those near the head of affairs a monopoly of employments, privileges, and other benefits, which may be dispensed less with a regard to the public service than to the gratification of an exclusive class of individuals: in short, management may be so managed, that it will still have a great deal of the unpopular features of government about it. In a commercial country like Britain, where the bulk of men are accustomed to reckon every thing with arithmetical accuracy, to weigh every advantage, every right, every atom, we may say, of what is profitable and good—such things cannot long remain. No man in such a community can long enjoy what he does not expressly and fairly purchase by his toil. Neither, in such a community, will it be possible to maintain any privileged institutions, which do not satisfy a very decisive majority that their privileges and their constituted character are advantageous to the commonwealth, as well as to those immediately connected with them. Such institutions are now weighed in a very different balance from what they ever knew before—the balance of a mercantile, unenthusiastic, rigidly just, and, some would add, cold and selfish spirit; and if they be found wanting, we do not see where lies the countervailing force which may save them. In short, if no reaction be produced by the rise of some great accidental evil from the new spirit, it is evident, or ought to be so to all minds which look beyond the passing day, that the public affairs of this great empire will in a little time be placed upon a system of management, in no respect different from a commission of local police.

A prospect of this kind naturally excites alarm and distrust in some minds, and perhaps an exuberance of expectation in others. Men are, or conceive themselves to be, so deeply interested in the results of such a change, that few contemplate it in a cool and philosophical manner. Some throw themselves in its way, and others attempt to urge it beyond its natural pace, for reasons referring only to the happiness of the individual and the interests of a day, and perhaps founded on delusive principles. To one abstracted from temporary feeling, it must appear as simply a partial approach, made for the first time in human history, to that perfect artificiality of the social condition which is in reality the perfection of the designs of nature—for the low intelligence of the numerical majority has been the sole cause and excuse for the absolute dominion heretofore exercised by one order of human beings over another. How strange to reflect upon the countless generations which may pass before man solves a certain problem in his own nature. It would almost appear as if our three thousand years of written history were only a part of one little cycle of the progress of the race.

Foreign History.

PORTUGAL.

A CHANGE of considerable importance has taken place in the relative situations of parties in this country. On the 10th of October, the army of Donna Maria commenced offensive measures against that of Don Miguel. Don Pedro divided the constitutional forces into three columns, which advanced in different directions to attack the fortifications and entrenchments of the Miguelites on the neighbouring heights. The troops of the usurper fought courageously, and their artillery committed great havoc among the assailants. At one time, the right column was thrown into confusion by a charge of cavalry, which drove a Portuguese regiment upon the Irish brigade, and caused a temporary retreat with the loss of some prisoners. They soon, however, rallied, and succeeded in pushing the enemy from their positions, at the point of the bayonet. The result of the operations on this day was highly favourable to the Pedroites. They carried every position they attacked, and passed the night in the enemy's quarters. Owing to the nature of the ground, which was most favourable for defensive operations, their loss probably exceeded that of the Miguelites.

When daylight broke on the 11th, the enemy had disappeared from the neighbourhood, and were found in full retreat by way of Lumiar, a place about four miles distant from Lisbon. Don Pedro's troops soon came up with them, and there was some severe fighting between their advanced-guard and the rear-guard of the enemy. After passing through Lumiar, the latter quitted the high-road, and proceeded to the village of Loures, upon the heights in the rear of which their main army was stationed, supported by artillery. They took advantage of the absence of the Pedroite artillery to make two attacks, which, however, were repulsed with loss. The army of Don Miguel afterwards continued the retreat, which was conducted without loss till it reached Santarem, where a decided stand was made, while Miguel himself retired to Elvas. The constitutional army, though superior in force, sat down before this strong position, where it has remained for several weeks, without any collision either of an offensive or defensive nature with the troops of the enemy.

Troops continue to be enlisted in this country, and sent out to Portugal, for the army of Don Pedro. There is a recruiting station at Edinburgh, and another at Glasgow, from which port vessels occasionally sail with these reinforcements. The indifference of the actual people of Portugal to the merits of the contest, is represented as having experienced no abatement.

SPAIN.

IN Madrid, and all except the northern provinces of Spain, the authority of Donna Isabella the Second, as residing in the queen-regent, is obeyed without disturbance. The opposition in the provinces alluded to, Old Castile, Biscay, Catalonia, and Navarre, is of a nature which cannot be described as otherwise than formidable, though it is not true (what is stated in our last) that Don Carlos himself has appeared among his adherents. The Carlists, directed by a strange mixture of guerillas and monks, do not appear anywhere in a largely collective form. They keep in small skirmishing parties all over the country; and as the queen's troops necessarily branch out also into detachments, the insurgents, even though occasionally defeated, contrive to cut up a considerable number of their enemies, and are never put down so effectually in one place, but what they quickly re-appear in as great strength in another. A victory of some moment was gained over them in the latter end of October, by General Saarsfield; but nevertheless, he found himself unable to proceed, as he had intended, to Vittoria. The royal troops appearing to be too few in number to protect the country or put down the insurrection, the people are obliged to arm in their own defence; and hence there is every reason to conclude, that, without the interference of France, a civil war of the most sanguinary kind will overspread the country.

That this interference will take place, is still a doubtful point, though a large army of observation has now been completed along the line of the Pyrenees. Soult is said to be zealous for it in the French cabinet, and to have brought over his brethren to his own views. On the other hand, a British minister is said to have spoken of such a thing as an act of madness. The interference is clearly not justifiable, upon the usual principles that have hitherto actuated the liberal governments; but if there be no danger from Russia, Prussia, and Austria, it may be made notwithstanding.

The queen-regent has been assuming a moderate and conciliatory course of policy. She has acknowledged Donna Maria in Portugal, and withdrawn her representative at the court of Don Miguel. A change favourable to the liberals took place in the cabinet about the middle of October. Count D'Oñalía, who was Minister of the Interior, retired from that office, and took the one assigned to him by the will of Ferdinand—that of Secretary to the Council of Regency. His successor in the Ministry of the Interior is Señor Xavier de Burgos, said, by the correspondent of the Morning Herald, to be "a man of considerable statesman-like acquirements, and a decided liberal." The result was, that the Madrid Gazette of October 24 contained some decrees of a liberal tendency. One proclaims a partial amnesty to the liberal exiles; another relates to the internal government of the country, and prescribes the adoption of a system resembling the one which prevails in France. If this system is worked with vigour, it will bring about vast improvements. A third decree nominates two commissions, formed, it is said, of honourable and enlightened men, for the purpose of revising the regulations of the corn-trade; a fourth refers to the state of the police, and defines its duties. The new minister, Burgos, is the author of these decrees. They were sanctioned, however, by Zea Bermudez, whose supremacy in the cabinet is still undisputed. There has also been a decree for a commission to inquire into the laws respecting the press, for the avowed purpose of granting it greater freedom. Even Don Carlos, however, in a late proclamation, found it necessary to hold out some symptoms of liberalism; a clear proof of the increasing strength of that party.

The ceremony of proclaiming the new queen in the capital immediately followed the promulgation of the decrees; and it speaks well for the state of feeling in Madrid, that they should have produced the intended effect of disposing the inhabitants to receive her with favour. No doubt, the hearty cheers and energetic vivas with which she was greeted, must be partly attributed to the influence of a considerable sum of money thrown among the populace; but this is not the way in which the countenance of the more intelligent was to be procured.

The next measure of the government was one of necessary vigour—the disarming of the royalist volunteers. This body consisted of cavalry and infantry, and amounted to about four thousand men, all Carlists. The tax by which they had been supported was abolished on the 24th October, and on the 27th the disarmament was accomplished. The cavalry made no resistance, but quietly gave up their arms; a division of the infantry offered resistance, and defended themselves in their quarters for upwards of two hours, though vigorously attacked by several battalions of the garrison troops, supported by artillery. In the course of the skirmish, they fired upon the unarmed inhabitants. The "better sort of people" crowded the streets, and loudly testified their joy at the disbanding of this force.

SWEDEN.

SWEDEN is one of those countries which are isolated from the sympathies of Europe by a peculiar language, studied by nobody either for profit or pleasure. Swedish books rarely cross the Baltic or German Ocean; and probably three Swedish newspapers serve all Britain. Hearing little of the country, we too readily take for granted that the political atmosphere is calm, because the sound of the winds that trouble it does not reach our ears. It is scarcely to be supposed, however, that a people so high-minded and intelligent, whose boast it is that every peasant can read, should not participate less or more in that movement towards political amelioration which pervades western Europe. Accordingly, we learn from a letter in the Times, that, beneath the quiet outward aspect of the kingdom, there is an under-current of discontent, which is silently gathering force, and may soon lead to important consequences. The eclat of uniting the whole Scandinavian peninsula under the Swedish sceptre, gave Charles John strong claims on popular affection; but this, after all, was a mere sop to the pride of the people, and could not make them permanently blind to their real grievances. They are poor, heavily taxed in proportion to their means, and miserably misrepresented in their old clumsy crazy Diet; and they suffer besides from an unsound currency, and an erroneous system of commercial legislation. With so much to amend, it would have been wonderful if the echo of the French and Belgian revolutions, and still more perhaps of our reform bill, had not awakened the Swedes from their lethargy. The letter, which is dated from Stockholm, 17th ultimo, speaks in emphatic terms—

"This country is approaching to a crisis, and to such a one as the spirit of the times must operate on the elements of which it is composed. The symptoms are strikingly displayed by a general uneasiness, and a strong spirit of inquisitiveness about business of public importance, and the doings of public characters; but without finding as yet its proper vent, exhausting itself in dissatisfaction and invectives about persons and things at home, and following with an anxious curiosity the spirit and course of affairs abroad. In the meantime, there appear a few persons who give indications of a more determined opposition to the body of bureaucracy, which oppresses the country and its sovereign with an overwhelming weight, and which is perhaps more difficult to break down than a real aristocracy. Of such there is none at all now to be found in Sweden, as all the avenues to power, or emanations from it, are, from the remotest to the highest step, occupied by the ruling influence; and thus the very road to a gradual reform is obstructed at every step, and by a strongly-united interest, extending through the clergy and laymen to almost every family in the realm. The unfitness of our antiquated form of national representation, and of our unwieldy institutions, where every branch of administration and of business is subject to corporations, is grown, however, too evident; and its tottering state is indicated by the freedom of speech displayed on the subject, sturdily by the lower and middling classes, by the younger employes themselves, and the doubts and waverings of the leading ones, who feel their situation safe neither on the score of principle nor of public opinion, and its influence on the whole system. Nevertheless, they do all they can to keep up the idea of the present state of things being the best possible."

The writer goes on to say, that the press is poor in purse and spirit; that it is saucy and libellous when it intends to be independent; and that it is decidedly under the control of the bureaucracy, or government officials. The country generally is labouring under financial difficulties. A new Diet is to meet in January, from whose proceedings much is expected. The letter concludes with the remark, that the Russian legation at Stockholm "is particularly active and enterprising, and full of intrigue."

HOLLAND.

OCTOBER 21, the States-General of Holland met for the dispatch of business, according to a fundamental law of the kingdom. The king assured them that he had done all in his power to bring the negotiation on the Belgian question to a conclusion, but "that the spirit of concession and desire of terminating the controversy on his side were met with new difficulties;" and he held out no immediate prospect of a final arrangement. On the 24th, however, his minister made a communication to the assembly, importing, that, within a few days past, a prospect had opened, not only of the settlement of the points in question (the garrison of Maestricht and the navigation of the Meuse), but also of the arrangement of the general question, through a mission from the sovereigns of Russia, Prussia, and Austria. In replying to the king's speech, the States-General emitted one hint, somewhat at variance with his Majesty's policy, viz. that retrenchments were necessary.

BELGIUM.

THIS country is thriving under its new political arrangements. During the first nine months of 1833, its revenue exceeded that of the corresponding period of last year by two millions of francs. It will be all the better for this state that Holland continues obstinate; for, in the meantime, the whole interest of their mutual debt is paid by the latter. The Belgian government has just concluded a commercial treaty with the United States, on terms so very advantageous to the latter, and likely to be so disagreeable to British merchants and manufacturers, that Lord Palmerston has thought proper to remonstrate. At the opening of the two chambers at Brussels, Nov. 12, the king announced a reduction in the army, and that the country throughout was in a condition of prosperity and improvement.

FRANCE.

BESIDES the rumoured interference in the concerns of Spain, the marriage-visit of King Leopold and his Queen to Louis Philip, which took place at the end of October, is the only event that has lately excited particular attention in France. The King of the Belgians obtained for himself great temporary unpopularity, by appearing at a ball decorated with a badge which was suspected to be one of the orders awarded for the victory of Waterloo. It was found necessary, in order to keep matters smooth at a review of the national guards, which Leopold was to attend, to announce officially that he would not appear in this order, which, it was at the same time stated, had no reference to Waterloo, as the King of the Belgians was not present at that engagement. The review accordingly passed off as a joyous fete, 25,000 men turning out on the occasion.

The French have succeeded in taking the important town of Bugeia, on the African coast, after a sanguinary conflict with a most formidable tribe of barbarians, the Kabales. The battle lasted with scarcely any cessation from seven o'clock in the morning of the 29th September, to the evening of the 2d October. The combatants even fought during the night, as the moon was at the full, and the weather was remarkably fine. The coast is thickly covered with olive and other trees, almost to the water's edge; and the Kabales being concealed among them, kept up a most harassing fire on the French. At length, however, they were compelled to retreat, and the invaders took possession of all the forts and strongholds. It is said that the port affords the finest anchorage on the coast of Africa.

TURKEY.

THE Turkish empire appears to be in a very precarious state. In almost every province there are insurrections, which the government cannot suppress.

The sultan, now the humble vassal of Russia, is exhausting his treasury in making presents to his imperial master, while Mehemet Ali not only refuses to pay the Syrian tribute stipulated at the last peace, ventures to remonstrate loudly with his sublime highness for his alliance with the northern autocrat, demands fresh cessions of Asiatic territory, under pretext of guarding his newly-acquired dominions against farther aggressions from the north. Russia has an army of 40,000 men in the provinces beyond the Danube; she has already taken the Wallachian regiment into her service as part of her own army, and is trying matters with a high hand in the affairs of the East. She is actually in possession of the Dardanelles, so that the improvidence or impolicy of the European powers may be said to have laid the Turkish empire prostrate at her feet.

AMERICA.

A PARTY in New York have been endeavouring to organise societies to effect the immediate abolition of slavery in the United States. The southerners exerting themselves in opposition to the project, have succeeded in preventing a meeting of the abolitionists, which was to have taken place on the 2d October. The latter, however, will not be discouraged by opposition; and we foresee that a great contest is about to commence between them and the slaveholders. The zeal and perseverance of the opponents of slavery in this country, are fully equalled by a numerous and influential body of men in the United States. They who recollect the fierce contention which arose on the discussion of the Missouri question, and had an opportunity of observing the ultra fanatical spirit by which the inhabitants of the slaveholding states were then influenced, will admit in this estimate.

At the last election of a President of the United States, the successful candidate, General Jackson, to encounter the powerful and active hostility of the National Bank. In the session of 1831-32, the houses of Congress passed a bill, by which the charter of the bank was renewed; but the President declared his firm determination never to sanction the continuance of that or any similar institution, and resolved to put his veto on the bill. As the charter expired in 1836—that is to say, before the second presidential election—General Jackson would terminate—it was the aim of the bank proprietors to defeat his last election; they appear to have been little scrupulous as to the means employed to compass their end—at least we are to believe the President, they made use of the funds at their disposal in a most extraordinary manner to influence the late elections. General Jackson has published an exposure of their proceedings, a communication which he made at the end of September to his cabinet, the ostensible object of which was to justify the withdrawal of the government deposits from the bank—another measure which, like his on the renewal of the charter, wears a somewhat arbitrary appearance.

It must be confessed, however, that the bank of the United States appears to have afforded its powerful enemy a good excuse for crushing it. In the department alluded to, some singular and discreditable revelations of its electioneering activity are made. President says, "Although the charter was approaching its termination, and the bank was aware that it was the intention of the government to use the public deposits as fast as they accrued in the payment of public debt, yet it did extend its loans from January 1831 to May 1832, from 42,402,304 dollars to 70,420,000 dollars, being an increase of 28,025,766 dollars in ten months. It is confidently believed that the leading object of this immense extension of its loans was to bring as large a portion of the people as possible under its power and influence; and it has been disclosed, that some of the largest sums were granted on very unusual terms, to conductors of the public press. In some of these cases, the motive was made manifest by the nominal or insufficient security taken for the loans, by the large amounts discounted, by the extraordinary time allowed for payment, and especially by the subsequent conduct of those receiving the accommodation."

It was not, however, merely by loans that the bank directors bribed the press directors. A sum of about eighteen thousand pounds was directly applied to the purchase of pamphlets and newspapers, and for securing the insertion of articles in the reviews. A considerable amount was also paid over in cash to the zealous advocates of the new charter. We have not only carried on bribery in this country in no more open style, but the Yankees have completely distanced us. Only think of twenty-eight millions of dollars (six millions sterling) being "lent" to individuals for the sake of influencing an American election!—Satanator.

A formidable conspiracy against the government of King Otho has lately been discovered. It was organised under the direction of Colocotroni, who has been seized and imprisoned. Martial law has been declared throughout the kingdom of Greece.

The French colony of Algiers appears to be rapidly improving; for the import duties, which in 1830 produced but L.5910, last year produced L.25,470. The revenue is derived from a small import duty of 10 per cent. if imported under the French or Algerian flag.

IRELAND.

Accounts from various parts of Ireland, especially Queen's County, and Tipperary, prove that the coercion bill has not worked the wonders which its supporters have attributed to its operation. The papers are filled with details of outrages committed by the peasantry, who have taken up their old weapons as winter approaches. At one quarter-sessions, in one county, there were two hundred trials, and seven convictions, for acts of violence. This state of things will scarcely be attributed to political agitation, for the country has been free from it for months: it is caused by evils which no severity of legislation can cure—the want of food, fire, and shelter. The government in Ireland appears to have lately been proceeding upon a rigidly impartial system. Orders were issued to put down every thing like an attempt at Orange processions on the 4th of November, the birth-day of King William the Third. A man, having been proved guilty of encouraging a mob to burn one of his brother magistrates in effigy, had been deposed from his magisterial office. Colonel Blacker, another Orange magistrate, has been dismissed for similar reasons. Some of the clergy have lately taken measures for the recovery of tithes, in defiance of the late act. They seem to be animated by a wish to cause as much litigation and expense as possible to those in arrear. Several very bad cases of ejectment have lately been mentioned. In one case, 281 persons, being Papists, were turned out of Lady Ross's estate, in the county of Longford; in another, the whole Catholic tenantry of the Synge estate, in the county of Clare, have been served with the processes preliminary to turning out. The object of these measures is to make room for colonies of Protestants. Mr O'Connell of course thrives in the atmosphere. He agitates with nearly all his spirit for the repeal of the Union, which, there is no longer any denying, is an object deeply seated at the hearts of a great part of the Irish people. His tribute has this year (Nov. 10) been collected in an unusual spirit, and amounts to above L.12,000. Some marked instances, the money was given solely in preference to his services in the repeal cause. The O'Connell tribute is now spoken of under the agreement of the "national debt of Ireland."

ENGLAND.

STATE OF MANUFACTURES.

The evidence lately taken before a committee of the House of Commons, respecting the state of manufactures, presents, upon the whole, a very agreeable picture. According to Mr Bates, the managing partner in the cotton house of Baring and Co., "Every thing in the north of England seems to be increasing, resembling much a new country; in Liverpool, there are whole streets building, and every thing has the appearance of a town about it; and I see a great difference in going through Manchester, and that part of the country; in Yorkshire, there seemed to me to be occasionally the villages just out of the hands of the mason, consisting of beautiful little cottages. . . . To my mind, there never was so secure and healthy a state of things; whether you look to the present state of things, or to the probable state of things for several years ahead, supposing that every thing remains tranquil, and that there is nothing to shake public confidence." In the cloth districts of Yorkshire, it is stated by Mr Hughes, an extensive wool-broker, that there is no manufactured article at present than there has been in any year within the memory of the oldest person living. The silk business is also much larger now than it ever before, and in a better condition than previous to the depression in 1825: in the year 1824, we exported to the value of L.442,596, but we now export more than a million. In regard to general business, it appears, from good evidence, that more bills are now put through banks than at any former period; that though there is a reduction of profit, there is also a reduction of risk; that, in short, things are now upon a more healthy footing than formerly. "There is," says an eminent writer, "an absence of speculation; there is a regular and fully adequate to the supply; there is no accumulation of stocks on hand, and yet no forced means resorted to for the purpose of disposing of those stocks. In order to make trade profitable, it must be followed by a great industry, great economy, and a proper proportion of skill and judgment; but when so followed, it is successful. The habits of trade that were contracted during the late war were extremely unfavourable to success. They were speculative; large profits were suddenly made; and till those habits are laid aside and often, and better habits contracted, the complaints and murmurs that we hear of may not altogether cease; I am sure that those who pursue trade now with industry and economy cannot fail to do well." In regard to money, numerous testimonies show that it is superabundant in the hands of capitalists, inasmuch that it can be borrowed upon any thing like reasonable security at 5 per cent.

While such is the general condition of trade and manufactures, it is not clear that the workman is so well as formerly. Mr Kirkman Finlay, indeed, says: "The wages in the establishments with which I am connected, and I believe generally throughout the country, are quite the same now as they were many years ago; the employment at such establishments is regular and constant; it never varies; the prices do not vary. Every body is paid according either to the work done by the individual himself, or according to the work done in the particular room in which he may work, according to the nature of the employment; and, therefore, the wages in such establishments being quite the same as they were many years ago, when the prices of provisions were a great deal higher than they now are, it follows, as a natural consequence, that the labourers must be much better off now, in such employment, than they were at any period I can name for many years back."

Other witnesses, however, state that workmen have to labour for a longer period to gain the same wages as formerly; that they do not now use so much animal food as they once did; and that their comforts are every where abridged. We rather think that wages cannot have every where kept up as high as they were in the time of the war. Evidence of this kind perhaps obtains more credit than it deserves. Almost all the witnesses who represent the state of the working classes as indifferent, as well as those who give a more favourable account, concur in the opinion that trade is generally in a sound and healthy condition. Now, as the Spectator shrewdly remarks, trade cannot be exactly in that state, if the workmen are not in a condition of constant and equable content; for otherwise, they are apt to become restive, and to cause grievous loss to their employers by combinations. The reduction of wages, granting that they are reduced, must be connected with the reduction of profits; and if the reduction of profits be the result of superabundant capital, and an exquisite system of mechanism and management, it follows that an advanced state of things, like that which obtains in Great Britain, is not favourable to the labouring man, whose interest it obviously is, if he be able, to fly to some ruder territory.

NATIONAL JUSTICE.

The English, to be among the most civilised nations on the face of the earth, are remarkable for the narrowness of their sympathies. They think that no country in the world ought to thrive but England—that there is nowhere any people entitled to humane consideration but only the English. Hence, while they have fought for centuries to emancipate themselves and improve their own condition, they have been perfectly insensible to the unfortunate condition of a country divided from them only by a narrow channel—insensible! we ought rather to say they have deliberately acted all along as the oppressors of that country. The result of the erroneous institutions and unhappy state of society in Ireland, produced by the English, has been a discontent among the Irish people, which the English have been glad to appease by allowing them a great number of preferences and exemptions. The Irish pay less taxes than the people of England and Scotland; they are allowed to have a superior banking system; and they are permitted to cultivate land free of poor-rate. What is the consequence?—that the Irish send over to England vast quantities of agricultural produce, which, being raised cheaper than the corresponding produce in England, is sold cheaper, and of course depresses the English markets. Mr Poulett Scrope has just published a pamphlet, from which it appears that this is one of the material causes of the distress of our agricultural population. The imports from Ireland, he shows, are rapidly increasing; that of wheat having been 699,809 quarters in 1817, and 2,605,734 quarters in 1832, while cattle, pigs, &c. are in proportion. Not only are our markets brought down by the Irish in this manner, but the wages of our labouring population are also depressed by the immense importations which are constantly taking place of labourers from that country, where human beings are raised (to use an American term) at a relatively cheaper rate than in this island, and in much greater numbers. The discontents of Ireland, in short, are not only the bane of the country itself, but of Great Britain also; and it may be said that every man in the latter country is now suffering in a greater or less degree for the evils imposed by his ancestors, and still cruelly and absurdly maintained in part by himself, in what is mockingly termed the sister island.

The case is now perhaps sure of a speedy remedy. If John Bull can be made to see that his injustice is decidedly against his own interest, his sense of right and wrong will not long remain obscured; his native generosity of disposition will soon come to his aid. The Scottish nation was once in nearly the same predicament; but when once John saw that sister Peg was likely to give him a good deal of annoyance, he patched up a marriage with her incontinent.

DINNER TO LORD DURHAM.

OCTOBER 23, Lord Durham dined with the electors of Gateshead. A care not very flattering to the Ministry was taken to establish that this mark of public honour was designed for his lordship personally, and not as a reflective approval of the high personages with whom he was lately connected in office. The strain of the meeting proved in the issue to be liberal, but not ministerial. Lord Durham gave an account of the formation of the reform bill, which deserves to be placed on record in this place as material of history. In reference to the compliment paid to him by the chairman, that he had a great deal to do with the passing of the reform bill, he said he would affect no mystery about the matter. "I will not conceal from you," said his lordship, "that, immediately after the formation of the government, Earl Grey did entrust to me, personally, the preparation of that measure. (Loud and continued cheers.) I was assisted by the advice of three of my colleagues—Lord John Russell, Sir James Graham, and Lord Duncannon; and with their co-operation the first reform bill was submitted to the cabinet and to the sovereign. Of that measure I shall say no more, than that, if it was not entirely perfect, it was, at the same time, free from many of those imperfections which attended the passing of the second reform bill, and which, from accidental circumstances, it was impossible to guard against. I allude, in particular, to the L.50 tenants' clause, which was forced upon the supporters of the bill by the then Tory House of Commons, and afterwards inserted in the second measure, although contrary to the principles on which the first was framed—or, at least, upon which I framed it—namely, that independence should be the security for a vote; and that, no matter how small the property was, provided the voter should exercise an independent suffrage, he should be entitled to vote for his representative. (Loud applause.) It is needless for me to tell you, that circumstances, to which I cannot and dare not farther allude, prevented my attending in my place in Parliament during the discussion of the first measure, and from having any thing to do with the formation of the second." When the second bill came before the House of Lords, he supported it, he said, with all his ability, as a great renovation of the constitution, though aware of all its imperfections. "I know," continued his lordship, "that much remains to be done—many imperfections to be remedied—especially with regard to rating. If we find that the non-payment of rates should tend to disqualify those who have the right of voting, that part of the measure should be altered and amended. Also, with regard to registration and the expense of elections, those are points which require to be reconsidered, and with respect to which you have nothing to do but to instruct your representatives to attend them, and they must be carried. (Cheers.) And here allow me to observe, that in these days we must not blame individuals, or Ministers, if they have not carried the principles of that bill into execution. The power rests with yourselves now to instruct your representatives to carry any measure upon which you, the respectability and intelligence of the country, have set your hearts, and they will be inevitably carried."

He paid a high compliment to Earl Grey, to whom he ascribed all the merit of having carried through the bill. In allusion to a remark of Mr Rippon, that the present state of affairs was of a very serious description, he said, "I believe and admit that a spirit of restless discontent is abroad, which requires great prudence, great skill, great discretion and statesmanship, to allay; but my opinion is, that the best mode of allaying it—and the only mode of allaying it—is for the crown and the government to go cordially along with the people. (Loud and continued cheers.) I know of nothing that the intelligence of the country—and when I speak of the people, I speak not of any thing but the intelligence and education, not the property, but the intelligence and education of the country—I say I know of nothing which the intelligence of the country has set its heart upon, and which it ought to possess, that it will not eventually obtain. (Cheers.) I therefore say, it is the duty of a wise statesman to examine the objects the people have in view, and what they are determined to obtain; and when he is satisfied of their justice, he should not wait to be forced into the adoption of such measures; he should not do it upon expediency or compulsion, but grant it freely and cordially; for, believe me, the boon granted upon compulsion, however the object may be obtained, loses half its grace, and very often all its value."

LORD DURHAM AND THE PRESS.

LORD DURHAM has lately excited much regret among his political admirers, and a contrary feeling in his adversaries, by a prosecution he has seen fit to institute against the Durham Advertiser, and the Standard and John Bull newspapers, the first for originating, and the two latter for copying, a paragraph, in which he was represented as having lately, in consequence of some annoyance he experienced at the village of Philadelphia, which is his own property, ordered it "to be swept from off the face of the earth." It is represented for his lordship that his private character has been assailed by the Conservative press with unjustifiable rancour, and that the paragraph in question was calculated to bring him into odium with the pitmen on his property. Notwithstanding a retraction of the paragraph by the Durham Advertiser, which represented the statement as having originated in that misinformation to which all public journalists are liable, Lord Durham (Nov. 13) caused a criminal information to be taken out in the King's Bench against all the three papers above mentioned. This mode of prosecution has given additional regret to the political friends of Lord Durham. It has been adopted, they express no doubt, to avoid the chance of a shilling being awarded by a civil jury; but, "as an avowed champion," says the Spectator, "of the most liberal faith and practice in politics—as one of the creators and leaders of enlightened public opinion—he has no right to employ, and thus to keep in countenance, a form of legal process, by which the most virtuous may be treated as the most criminal, and the voice of public opinion may become as mute as he found it in his own country when he began his political career in 1813."

MINISTERIAL POSITION.

DURING the recess, the Ministers and their friends have been much more quiet than they usually are on such occasions. Very few congratulatory meetings of any kind have been held in their honour; and at all those which did take place, the addresses have been of an apologetic tone in reference to past transactions, rather than of promise of future improvements in the social state of the empire. The Whigs, indeed—we remark the fact as curious material for that history of which our work may become one of the sources—are now the most conservative in their tone of all the political parties. They appear in a dilemma between the democratic spirit which they have done so much to raise, and the influence which the House of Lords is enabled by the King to retain (by a Tory majority of about 50, it is said), for the defeat of every measure which that spirit might urge them to bring into Parliament. The Tory and ultra-Liberal newspapers unite in giving them all possible annoyance, sometimes by means not altogether fair or candid; while it is perfectly clear that the people at large are gradually becoming less and less solicitous about keeping the authors of the reform bill in power. If the Ministers could calculate upon rousing the popular spirit to as great a height about the reforms now wanted as it was about the reform bill, they might probably venture to beard the House of Lords; but they must be sensible of the danger of being left stranded between a neap-tide of public feeling, and the inflexible resolution of the King to let them take their chance with the present House of Lords. To keep their places, therefore, a deference to the Tories, and a repression of the ultra-Liberals, are absolutely necessary—and hence their present line of conduct. The Ministry, in fact, stands in the predicament of a Tory Ministry, though not perhaps inspired at heart with what is called a Tory spirit. The supreme power obviously lies with the Tory majority in the House of Peers, as supported by the King; and if the Ministers are disposed to act with a deferential regard to this body, they must of course be considered as Tory Ministers, or at the least as the Ministers of the Tories. The so-called Conservative party will probably in time become aware of this, and, unless forbidden by political hatred, yield their support to the Ministers. On the contrary, should they continue to act in such a way as to cause a change of Ministry—the change being of course from Whig to Radical—we should probably see the popular spirit again roused to a sufficient pitch to put the House of Peers under coercion, and carry all those farther reforms of our national institutions which the Whigs now hesitate to undertake.

ASSESSED TAXES.

THE agitation upon this subject in London was brought to a kind of bearing on Thursday, October 24, when executions were put into the houses of Mr Savage, of the Mechanics' Institute Tavern, Circus Street, New Road, and Mr Brayne, picture-dealer, Crawford Street, Marylebone, for arrears of assessed taxes. About nine in the morning, Hemp, a sheriff's officer, attended by several of his men, took possession of goods of Mr Brayne, consisting of pictures and articles of furniture, for assessed taxes, amounting to L.12, 12s. 8d. Goods to double that amount were carried away in a van by the sheriff's officer and his subordinates, who refused to give any inventory of what they had taken, or to state where they intended to deposit them. The broker was loudly hissed and hooted by several hundred people who had assembled. The officer and his men next proceeded to the house of Mr Savage, to distrain on his goods for arrears of assessed taxes, amounting to L.35. Mr Savage said the officer might take what he thought proper. Some of the best goods on the premises were at once laid hold of; but, on the van being brought up, Mr Savage protested against the illegality of the proceeding, and called in six brokers to value the goods seized. A considerable concourse of people assembled in Circus Street, to witness the process, and loudly expressed their disapprobation at the seizure. The police on duty hastened to the spot, and prevented any resort to violence at that time. About 11 o'clock, a large banner bearing the words "The people of Marylebone," was placed in the middle of the street, the crowd continuing to increase. At 12 o'clock, the van with the goods drove off, and it was followed along the New Road by several persons. At the corner of Baker Street, upwards of 1000 people had assembled, but no one endeavoured to arrest the progress of the vehicle. At length a woman rushed through the mob, and, seizing hold of the horse's reins, exclaimed, "What! are ye Englishmen, and yet suffer these things to be done? see what a woman dares do!" and instantly turned the head of the animal. A loud cry was then raised—"On to Savage's!" The officers fled, and the van was taken back to Mr Savage's, where the furniture would have been restored to him, if he had not peremptorily refused to receive it. It was deposited in a neighbouring warehouse. When the van was emptied, the owner endeavoured to get it away, but it was demolished by the mob with hammers and stones.

So much alarm and excitement was occasioned in the metropolis by this outburst of popular violence, that it was deemed prudent to keep the Coldstream battalion of guards under arms, at the King's Mews Barracks, for the better part of the ensuing night. A reward of L.100 was, moreover, offered by government for the apprehension of any of the offenders.

At an aggregate meeting of the associations, held on Nov. 1, a petition was got up, praying the King to assemble Parliament immediately, to take the question of the assessed taxes under consideration. Lord Melbourne received this document for the purpose of presenting it to his Majesty.

These associations, it is stated, do not comprise above 2000 individuals, out of 103,000 who pay house and window duties in the metropolis. It is also stated that the arrears of the house and window duties in the metropolis are not so much by L.7000 as they usually are at this time of the year. Nevertheless, a general opinion seems to prevail that the Ministers will be obliged to yield to the agitation on this point.

[The newspapers, with hardly a single exception, and none so prominently as the time-serving Times, reprobate the resistance to the law, which has given so painful a character to this question. The Conservative prints only modify their reprobation by pointing to the means resorted to or permitted by the government and the Whig press for carrying the reform bill, as the example and sanction assumed by the people on the present occasion, and as depriving the Ministry of all right to complain. It is certainly somewhat unfortunate that the recent extension of the franchise, as well as various other grand points in what is called the history of freedom—such as the revolution of 1688, the liberation of America, the French and Belgian revolutions, &c.—have all been carried, not by the boasted right of petition, which is generally held to be so omnipotent, but by violence, either actual or threatened. A distinction, however, is to be expected from the good sense of the British people, between a struggle of almost universal and one of comparatively trivial consequence; and, accordingly, we already see that the outrages in London nowhere meet with approbation. The law is sided with in all quarters, and is therefore in none of that danger which is apprehended—though certainly a repeal of the house and window duties after the late violence, will not be in its favour.]

THE ARCTIC NAVIGATORS.

OCT. 19, Captain Ross arrived in London, and had the honour next day to dine with the King, who, at his approach, instead of permitting any of the usual ceremonies, threw open his arms to receive him. The discoveries made by the navigators, their sufferings, and their unexpected deliverance, have conspired to excite a public interest in them beyond any thing of the kind we can remember; and the government can hardly be more liberal in rewarding them than the people at large seem to desire. October 22, at a meeting of the committee for managing the arctic land expedition, a letter from Captain Ross was read, in which he expressed, in the warmest terms, his gratitude for the humane and generous sympathy which dictated the formation of that association. In the course of a few days after the arrival of the navigators in London, Commander Ross, nephew of Captain Ross, was promoted to the rank of captain: this was the individual who approached within 150 miles of Cape Turnagain, and discovered the situation of the magnetic pole. October 29, Captain Ross had nearly lost the papers which contain the memorials of his adventures. In returning from the Admiralty, where he had been showing them, he left them in the cabriolet which carried him, and it was not till the police had been sent in search of them, that the owner of the vehicle was able to discover to whom they belonged, or had it in his power to restore them. The navigators, it appears, have suffered a good deal since their return from the comparative heat of our climate; and one of them, John Ayres, the cook, aged 53, died, November 5, from the effects of a change of diet. One of the Minor Theatres in London has got up a play on the adventures of Captain Ross: the gallant officer went to see it, and appeared much amused at the personation of himself. At a recent meeting of the Geographical Society, the annual medal was awarded to Captain Ross. The discoveries of the hardy navigators are stated to be of great service to the whale fishery, new seas having been discovered in which those animals (now so scarce in the more accessible seas) are to be found in great numbers.

The King and Queen removed at the end of October to Brighton.

It is reported that a marriage is contemplated between Sir Henry Hallford, M.D., and the Princess Sophia, and that Parliament will be applied to on the subject. The Princess is sixty-five years of age.

In the last session of Parliament, an act was passed, upon the recommendation of the law commissioners, giving authority to the sheriffs of the different counties, by order of the superior courts, to try cases on action for less than L.20, and incidental to this the further power of appointing courts to be held in any places in the county for that purpose. By this, the great expense attendant upon taking witnesses to the county town will be obviated, the delay occasioned by the suitor being obliged to wait for the assizes prevented, and a debt may now be recovered within three weeks of the time of the demand for payment. In acting upon this important alteration of the law, the sheriffs of Devonshire, Kent, and some other counties, have already divided the counties into divisions where causes are to be tried.

The Court of Aldermen have rejected Mr Scales, who was returned by Portsoken Ward, as an alderman, and preferred Mr Johnson. The inhabitants of the ward have resolved to carry the case before the King's Bench.

The office of storekeeper in the Stationery Office, held for some time by young Key, is at length filled up, Huntley Gordon, who was once private secretary to Walter Scott, and who has recently been in the superintendence of the newspaper department in the Stationery Office, has been appointed to the situation.

A mission of St Simonians has made its appearance in London, for the purpose of endeavouring to gain converts to their peculiar views of social life. They address the public fortnightly at the Burton Rooms, Burton Crescent, but as yet seem to have only met with curiosity and ridicule.

The Reverend Dr King, of London, has lately found the Honourable and Reverend Mr Spencer's example by embracing the doctrines of the Catholic church. After two years' incessant searching after the truth, he has made his profession of faith before the Right Reverend Dr Baines.—Wexford Independent.

The revered poet Wordsworth is become nearly blind. His eyes have for some time troubled him, and he is compelled to remain in a dark room.

OCT. 26.—A gentleman, who insisted on the concealment of his name, presented L.1000 to the London University, through a London banking-house.

Nov. 1. Dr Bowring, who has been for some time on a commercial mission both in Belgium and France, returned to London. Dr Bowring's labours were of course directed to the promotion of a more liberal commercial intercourse between this country and our neighbours, by endeavouring to induce the latter to diminish their restrictive duties on the importation of foreign commodities.

—2. At Bath, two hundred and five tenants of allotments let out by the Bishop, were regaled at a palace with their annual substantial entertainment of solid English fare, roast beef, plum-pudding, &c. The lordship attended, for a short time, the convivial party, and proposed as a toast, "Success to the allotment system," which was drunk with nine times nine; after which, "Good landlords and good tenants," was drunk with the times three. Mr Emery, the steward, then handed his lordship the whole of the rents, and proposed a good health, which was drunk with acclamations; after which his lordship retired. The whole of the evening was one of true old English hospitality.

—3. About a quarter past four o'clock, in consequence of the unusual height to which the tide rose in the Thames, the lower parts of the houses on the bank of the river, Bankside, Holland Street, the lower part of the Strand, Abington Street, Stangate, Lambeth, and Vauxhall, were inundated to the depth of several feet. The water flowed up the sewers with such violence, that many of the drains were burst open; and the flood then poured into the houses in such torrents, that even doors were securely fastened were burst open, and considerable damage was occasioned. In some of the houses, where the kitchens were occupied as sleeping apartments, the inmates narrowly escaped with life, some of the inmates being awakened by finding themselves in water, which reached above their bedsteads. At Lambeth Palace, the corridors were filled to the depth of between eight and nine feet, and along the Bishop's Walk, where a very strong iron railing has been erected, the tide poured in with such force, that the iron-work was snapped asunder in many places, and the stone and brick-work, together with a great portion of the bank, swept away into the river. The oldest waterman on the river does not recollect the tide rising so high before.

—5. A numerous party of gentlemen dined together, and presented to Sir Peter Laurie, the retiring Lord Mayor, a piece of plate, value 300 guineas, "not only as a mark of personal regard, but also as a testimonial of their approval of his unremitting zeal and accurate discrimination in the discharge of arduous and important duties, of his vigilant and temperate administration of justice, and of his maintenance of the splendour and dignity of the chief magistracy."—It was elicited, at an examination in the Marlborough Street police-office, that not long ago, a lady, from curiosity, or from some other less pardonable motive, having a strong desire to see the interior of a gambling-house, had the consummate art, as well as indelicacy, to disguise herself in male attire, and to obtain the entrée of the establishment. She was soon marked out by the confederates, who, however, had not any suspicion of her sex, and having been prevailed upon to sit down to the table, she in a very short time was stripped of upwards of L.1500.

—9. The new Lord Mayor (Farebrother) was installed, and went through the usual ceremonies.—At the Lord Mayor's dinner, the King's health was drunk with a decorous modicum of applause; Queen Adelaide's with hearty cheering; Lord Brougham had not much reason to complain; but his Majesty's Ministers were toasted with marked coolness. The favourite waltz, Grace the Duke of Wellington, whose health was drunk with uproarious delight.

—11. An aged farmer, named Bodell, near Plumstead, was poisoned by arsenic infused in his coffee. His grandson, John Bodell, has been apprehended on suspicion of the crime, and a verdict of wilful murder returned against him by the inquest.

—15. In the Bail Court, Sir James Scarlett applied to Mr Justice Littleale for a writ of habeas corpus, directed to the keeper of the Norwich Jail, to bring up Mr Joseph Reeve, in order that he might be admitted to bail in that court. Mr Reeve is the person who was committed on a charge of felony by the magistrates, and inquired into the circumstances attending the wreck of the Earl Wemyss. The present application was grounded upon an affidavit by Mr Reeve, in which he asserted in the most positive terms, his entire innocence of the offences charged against him, and enters into a minute account and justification of his conduct with regard to the passengers and their property on board the ship. Sir James Scarlett said, that the evidence respecting the purloining of Miss Roche's reticule "was such, that none but very ignorant and very prejudiced country magistrates could have given it credence." The habeas corpus was granted.

was immediately granted, with a certiorari to the magistrates to return the depositions.

Sir James Mackintosh.—The historical manuscripts of Sir James Mackintosh, as far as they relate to the revolution in England in 1688, have been arranged and will shortly be published. The introduction is complete, and the characters of some of the great Whig leaders of that momentous period are drawn with a brief but felicitous touch, acuteness, and discrimination. Some important original information, gathered from the archives of noble families, will be published in an appendix. This posthumous work, in its object and the circumstances attending its publication, bears a close resemblance to the historical fragment of Mr Fox.—Inverness Courier.

It is in the contemplation of several gentlemen in Birmingham to provide ground as near the centre of the town as possible, for the recreation of all classes of the inhabitants in the games of cricket, racket, and quoits, and such other games as may conduce to health and amusement. The plan is patronised by Earl Denbigh, Earl Dartmouth, Earl Howe, Sir G. Skipwith, Sir Edward Willmot, Mr Bolton King, Mr Congreve Russell, the members for the borough, the municipal officers, &c. The cadets of Sandhurst College lately had a disagreeable collision with the people of Bagshot. Among the crowd assembled at a recent visit of the King to the college, some persons refused to take off their hats during the playing of the royal anthem. The cadets knocked off the recalcitrant hats, and afterwards went to Bagshot to follow up that self-judged punishment for an imaginary offence. An affray took place on the streets, during which a young gentleman broke several of the heads to which his hats had remained so disloyally attached; and for each of which they have, upon a compromise, been obliged to pay five pounds.

Our inspector under the factory bill lately met the manufacturers in Taunton. They represented to him in strong terms the utter impracticability of the measure. The provisions, they say, are so vexatious, that masters will be unable to escape the numerous penalties to which they are made liable. A general notice has been given of a reduction of wages; which has, of course, occasioned much discontent among the workmen.—Sherborne Herald.

Incendiarianism continues, but to no very alarming extent, throughout the country.

The combinations of workmen throughout the country have made so little noise during the past month, that we conclude they are generally given up. Those connected with the various branches of the building trade in Manchester are considered at an end. Nearly nine-tenths of the members of the Trades' Union have totally repudiated the association, and are stated to be loud in their condemnation of the despotism and rapacity of the leaders or directors. The master builders, much to their credit, have taken their repentant journeymen into employ again; and there is an evident desire "to forget and forgive" on both sides.

The damages at Brighton pier are estimated at L.2000; 1000 has been subscribed towards the repairs, which are now proceeding.

The poor-rates at Malmesbury have been nearly done away with, by making small allotments of land to the poor: there is one farmer in the parish who saves L.100 per annum by the reduction. There was a large tract of common land in the neighbourhood belonging to the parish; the overseers applied to Parliament, and obtained a bill which enabled them to allot it in small portions to those who required parochial aid; and the consequence is, that those who were paupers are now small farmers, and are doing well as such.

Mr Hill, M. P. for Hull, in a late address to his constituents, said that newspapers were a great means of the diffusion of knowledge, by the publication of parliamentary debates and other political matters of interest; and he was convinced that those newspapers which stated facts and fair arguments, in a plain and honest manner, could exercise far more influence over the working man (when he had access to them) than those which contented of frothy declamation, or trashy stuff, calculated to excite the passions of the people against those above them. From his experience, he would say there was no class so anxious for sound knowledge, none so willing to take pains, so little discouraged by difficulties, as those sneeringly called the "lower classes" of society. It was the idle and luxurious, those who would undergo no fatigue of body or mind, it was those who shrunk from the labour of such reading as required thought and attention; but the labouring man was not frightened at a little difficulty, and understood that which he deemed important.

The Poles, a monthly publication, edited in Paris by Count Plater, gives an account of all the ukases, and other measures of the Emperor Nicholas, against the Catholic religion in Poland. Among them are the following:—Prince Sanguszko, a Pole of high character, who had been condemned to work in chains in the mines for life, having requested that he might be allowed to return before he set out upon his march to Siberia, was told that he could have only a Greek priest, for that he was no longer any thing but a serf, and a serf could profess no other religion than that of his master. Five hundred of the Poles who are now working in chains at Konstadt, after having been promised an amnesty on condition of their returning to Poland from Prussia, here they had been prisoners of war, refused to work on Sunday, as they wished to attend divine service: they are divided into detachments, and barbarously flogged daily for nearly a fortnight.

The highest price of wheat flour, of the first quality, in Paris, is 48 francs per 150 kilogrammes, which answers L.1, 10s. 3d. the English sack of 280 lbs.; and the highest price of wheat flour of the first quality in London is L.2, 10s. per sack. It therefore appears that wheat flour is full 65 per cent. dearer in London than in Paris, and that with the sum of L.2, 10s. a man may buy 463 lbs. of fine flour at Paris, whereas with the same sum he can only buy 280 lbs. in London.—Times.—Since the publication of this paragraph, a proposal has been started for introducing French bread into England, there being no prohibitory duty.

Tithe Sale at Ripon.—On Saturday, Oct. 26, this town was thrown into a state of excitement by an announcement of the bellman, that the goods of William Darnbrough, a tailor in Blossomgate, were to be sold for the tithes due to the very reverend the Dean of Ripon. Between eleven and twelve o'clock, a large assemblage of people gathered together to witness this extraordinary scene, and the following articles, as marked in the inventory, were sold at the following prices:—Two tea-trays, three-halfpence; six chairs, twopence-halfpenny; five chairs, twopence; table, twopence-halfpenny; table, twopence-halfpenny; table, twopence-halfpenny; table, twopence; oak chest of drawers, twopence; corner cupboard, one penny; chest of drawers, twopence-halfpenny; clock, twopence-halfpenny; best bedstead, twopence; bedstead, twopence; feather-bed, twopence; shop-board, three-halfpence. Proceeds of the sale, two shillings and sevenpence! The different lots were knocked down amid the cheers and laughter of the multitude. William Darnbrough is a poor man, who has supported his family by working as a tailor, and by selling milk. His wife, who is a hard-working and praise-worthy woman, is about to be confined of her tenth child. In this case the claim alone, with the expenses, are equal to L.7, 6s., with only 2s. 7d. receipts, leaving a deficiency of L.7, 3s. 5d. against the dean and chapter!

Baltic Timber at Colonial Duty.—A vessel, named the Amity, from the colonial port of Halifax, is now discharging at this port her cargo of Memel timber, which is admitted to duty at 10s. per load! Had it been imported directly from the Baltic, it would have been liable to 55s. per load. But, to avoid this exorbitant tax, the vessel sails to some port in the British northern colonies, and this is all that is necessary to evade the higher duty, the new customs acts not requiring any certificate that the goods are the produce of the colonies. Had the Amity's cargo consisted of American produce, we should have imported an inferior article; but the loss to the revenue by the fraud is in this case L.900. Would it not, therefore, be wise to reduce the duties on Baltic timber in a fair proportion, so as to leave no inducement for its transport to British possessions, even in a financial point of view?—Hull Advertiser.

Magnetic Pole.—We understand that the position of the magnetic pole is now finally ascertained by our adventurous countryman Captain Ross, to whom science is already so much indebted. He has actually been on the spot where the dipping needle becomes vertical, or points straight downwards; while the horizontal needle, having, as it were, no longer any thing to point towards, remains indifferently in any direction given it. The situation of this pole, however, is not invariable; on the contrary, it must be constantly shifting, inasmuch as the variation of the needle at the same place is constantly altering. Thus, at London, in the year 1657, there was no variation, the needle pointing exactly north. In 1665, the variation was 1 deg. 22½ min. W.; in 1672, 2 deg. 30 min. W.; after which time it went on increasing, but in a very irregular manner—sometimes advancing rapidly, sometimes appearing almost stationary, or even, for a time, slightly fallen back—until 1814, in the August of which year the variation had attained the maximum quantity of 24 deg. 21 min. 12 sec. W. It then commenced to retrograde, in the same irregular manner, though, if any thing, more slowly than it had advanced, so that in 1821 it was still 24 deg. 11 min. 18 sec. W., and in 1823, 24 deg. 9 min. 48 sec. W. To account for this, it has been supposed that the magnetical poles revolve round the geographical or terrestrial pole in certain unequal periods, their motion being from west to east.—Athenæum.

THE WEALTH OF ENGLAND.

In a very able work lately published, in two volumes octavo, under the title of "England and America:—a Comparison of the Social Evils of both Nations," and which appears to be the composition of a native of the United States, we find the following striking picture of the wealth of England, as compared with that of the two great countries next to it in civilization:—

"An American citizen visits the continent of Europe, and, on his way home, passes some time in England. Here he finds the roads in every direction far better than any he has seen before, and he sees more of them on a given space than in France or America. The cross-roads are kept in far better order than those of any other country. By the side of nearly all the great roads, he sees, for the first time, a well-kept footpath. In many places, the footpaths across fields are as dry, and smooth, and trim, as walks in pleasure-gardens. All the carriages on the roads are stronger and lighter, more useful and sightly than those to which he is accustomed; and the vast number of those carriages strikes him with astonishment. The strength and beauty of the horses, the quality and neatness of their harness, and the very whips with which they are driven, excite his wonder. The uncommon speed with which he travels raises his spirits, and inclines him to look favourably at every thing. The mansions are palaces, the farm-houses mansions, the merest village of cottages has an air of peculiar comfort; whilst the number of those mansions, farm-houses, and villages, gives to the country the appearance of a scattered town. But then the towns: many of them are so extensive, the houses in them are so well built, the shops have such a display of rich goods, the streets are so well paved, and contain so large a proportion of good houses; these towns are so full of well-dressed people, that each of them might be taken for a city. Even the smallest towns appear like sections of a wealthy capital; and the number of towns, large and small, is so great, that, together with the great number of good houses by the roadside out of town, one seems to be travelling all day through one street. This, the foreigner imagines, must be the most populous road in England; there must be something peculiar in this part of the country which attracts rich people. By no means. He is told that, so long as fourteen years ago, the length of the paved streets and turnpike-roads of England and Wales, was about twenty thousand miles; and he soon learns that nearly all the great roads show marks of wealth like those which he has so much admired. He therefore supposes that the wealth of the country must bear a very large proportion to that of the metropolis; but on this point he is undeceived on reaching London. Here the crowd is so great, the objects which attract his attention are so many and so different, that, for a while, he is bewildered, and incapable of arranging his thoughts so as to draw conclusions from what he sees. At length he begins to observe methodically, and to compare his observations with those which he has made in other great cities. Until now, he has conceived New York or Paris to be the place in which the greatest amount of wealth was enjoyed by a given number of people; but he is now convinced that the inhabitants of London obtain a greater quantity of things necessary, useful, or agreeable to man, than the inhabitants of any other city in the world. The quantity of flour and meat consumed, in proportion to people, he finds not much greater in London than in Paris, and even less than in New York, where the working classes live better than in London; so also the proportion of looking-glasses he knows to be greater in Paris, and the proportion of rum drunk to be greater in New York, than in London; but he cannot doubt, that, on the whole, more good things are enjoyed in London, by a given number of people, than any where else out of England. It is not in his power, indeed, to compare the quantities or values of all necessary, useful, or agreeable things enjoyed in London, with the quantities or values of such things used in other great cities; but he is convinced of the superior wealth of London, by the same mode of observation which has satisfied him that the people of New York drink more rum, and the people of Paris own more looking-glasses, than the people of London. In London, one meets with every thing the immediate produce of agriculture; such as meat, bread, sugar, and tea, of the very finest quality. Of manufactured objects used in London, scarce one can be mentioned which is not brought to greater perfection than similar objects used in other capital cities; whilst the variety of such objects is yet more striking. The fittings and furniture of a third-rate house in London are of a better quality than those of a palace in France or Germany: the doors and windows answer their purpose better; the chairs are stronger, lighter, and more convenient to sit upon; the tables, if not more useful, are far more beautiful; the glass is more transparent, the knives cut better, the fastenings of all sorts, the corkscrew and the toasting-fork, are better suited to their purpose, and composed of superior materials. In every London house, excepting those of the poorest order, one finds many useful and agreeable objects, which are either scarce or unknown in Paris, New York, and Vienna. The inhabitants of London pay, it has been reckoned, about L.50,000 a year—being the fourth of L.200,000, which the nation pays—for what? for blacking advertisements—that is, for the facility of choosing between different kinds of blacking. The number of kinds of horses used in London, though very striking to a foreigner, is less remarkable than the fore-thought, pains, and skill, required for making each variety—the Lincolnshire dray horse, for example, the Cleveland coach-horse, the high-bred nag, the cob, and the trotting hackney—so obviously distinct from all the others. The variety of carriages, whether for business or pleasure, and the fitness of each sort for its peculiar purpose—whether that purpose be determined by the weather, by the fortune of him who owns the carriage, or the business of him who uses it—are equally deserving of admiration. At night, when other great cities are in darkness, all London is brilliantly illuminated; nay, the beautiful gas lights extend for some miles into the country in all directions. The pavements of London—but the list of examples might be continued through a volume. Still, the foreigner is less surprised at the quantity, variety, and perfection of useful and agreeable objects used in London, than at the great proportion of the people, who enjoy in abundance the most perfect of those objects. That the houses of the high aristocracy should be large, fine, and richly furnished, is nothing strange; but the houses in many quarters, which the aristocracy despise, are as large, fine, and well furnished, as those of the more aristocratic quarters. The best houses, for instance, in Bloomsbury, Finsbury, and Lambeth, and in such villages or suburbs as Highgate, Hornsey, Tottenham, Hackney, Peckham, and Clapham, though a lord would disdain to live in one of them, are as large, fine, and well furnished, as those of Mayfair, or of such aristocratic villages as Roehampton and Wimbledon. The shops, too, in many of those 'low' quarters, though stocked for the supply of persons engaged in some industrious pursuit, are as full and as rich as those of Bond Street or Regent Street. The number of carriages also, kept for pleasure in those despised quarters, greatly exceeds the number of such carriages kept by the high aristocracy in and about London. In the quantity and quality of good things which he uses, in his own dress and that of his family, in his table, furniture, and books, or in whatever mode of expense he may prefer, a prosperous lawyer or merchant is not far behind the richest duke; and the number of rich people in London who pursue an industrious career is very much greater than the number of rich lords. But it would be improper to measure the wealth of a society by the enjoyments of its richest members alone. Dividing the inhabitants of London and Paris into the same number of ranks, with respect to the consumption of wealth, every London rank enjoys more good things than its corresponding Parisian rank. A second-rate merchant in London spends at least twice as much as a second-rate Parisian merchant; a third-rate London advocate spends, perhaps, three times as much as a first-rate Parisian advocate; a fourth-rate London attorney spends six times as much as a second-rate Parisian notary; a physician in London, a surgeon, a dentist, a tradesman of whatever description, a servant, from the butler to the scullion, a mechanic in whatever line, a porter or a common labourer, spends more, and in most cases a great deal more, than one of a corresponding rank in the Parisian scale. But this is not all. In London there are more first-rate merchants, lawyers, and tradesmen, in proportion to second-rate ones; more second-rate ones in proportion to third-rate ones; and so on all down the scale. In a word, turn which way you will, London abounds with proofs of its enormous wealth.

Thus the foreigner is apt to fall into another error—to imagine that a very large proportion of the wealth of England is collected in London. He is undeceived again, by visiting some great provincial towns of different descriptions, such as Bath, Liverpool, and Leeds. Each of these resembles a large section of the metropolis; Bath being like Marlybone, Leeds like manufacturing Southwark, and Liverpool like the commercial Tower Hamlets. In point of size and general character, Liverpool bears some resemblance to Bordeaux or New York, and Leeds to Lyons; but in America there is no town like Leeds, nor, either in America or France, any town like Bath. England abounds with such towns as Bath—mere pleasure-towns, they may be called—such as Leamington, Hastings, Margate, Cheltenham, and Brighton; with more of the same kind, though of smaller extent—such as Tunbridge Wells, Worthing, Harrogate, Aberystwith, Southend, Lowestoft, and Sidmouth. Of towns like Leeds, while in the United States there is not one, and in France but few, there is in England a number without end—such as Macclesfield, Sheffield, Nottingham, Coventry, Birmingham, and Manchester. Of towns like Liverpool, though there be several in the United States, there are many more in the United Kingdom; while neither in the United States nor in France are there any towns of a mixed character, like Norwich and Glasgow. Again, neither in France nor in the United States are there any great provincial capitals like Edinburgh and Dublin. But, after all, that for which, in respect to towns, England is most distinguished—even more so than for the number and size of her pleasure-towns—is the vast number and great size of her smaller provincial capitals, which are neither seaports nor the seats of manufactures—such as York, Canterbury, Gloucester, Exeter, Shrewsbury, Reading, Colchester, and Bury St Edmund's. And now, further, let the wealth of any English town whatsoever be compared with that of a town of the same character in any other country. With a single, and, no doubt, very important exception, England has greatly the advantage. In the United States, every labourer, not being a slave, obtains more and better food, more and better clothes, as well as a better lodging, than a labourer of equal skill in England. Without any further exception, the inhabitants of English provincial towns enjoy a greater quantity and variety of good things, approach nearer to the inhabitants of the capital, in respect to the consumption of wealth, than people of a similar rank in the provincial towns of other countries. A merchant of Liverpool or Bristol, a manufacturer of Birmingham or Leeds, be he first, second, or third-rate, indulges in expenses for his house, his table, the education of his children, and the amusement of his family, which to think of only would frighten a Bordeaux merchant or Lyons manufacturer of the same rank. What a French provincial doctor spends in a year, would not keep an English provincial doctor in equal practice for three months. Country attorneys in England get and spend, on the average, ten times as much as French country attorneys. Common tradesmen in all English country towns, bakers, butchers, cheesemongers, and linen-drillers, as well as mechanics, such as carpenters, builders, and glaziers, live much better than a similar class of people in Paris; they have more rooms to live in; their rooms are better furnished; they, their wives, and children, are better dressed; they find it more easy to obtain comforts and indulge in luxuries. Surely there are fifty country towns in England which contain a good inn, that is, a comfortable innkeeper, for one French country town that contains a passable inn, held by a man who does not live so expensively as the keepers of most English alehouses. That English town is reckoned poor in which there are not some shops that would be considered good in the best quarter of London; and there are hundreds of towns in England in which you can purchase almost every thing that is commonly for sale in London. The number of booksellers' shops in the provincial towns of England, and the stocks which they contain, present a very striking contrast with the number and stocks of French booksellers' shops out of Paris. In the number and quality of horses and carriages kept for pleasure, English country towns surpass, very far indeed, French country towns of equal magnitude. Every town in England that at all bears the character of the capital of a district, possesses a circulating library, such as would be called good in Paris or New York; while most of such towns, as well as many small towns, and indeed rural parts miles away from any town, have the inestimable advantage of a book club. No English town containing 10,000 inhabitants is without foot pavements or gas lights, while many towns with less than 5000 inhabitants are as well paved and well lighted as the finest quarter of London. In their literary and scientific institutions, such towns as Liverpool, Leeds, and Birmingham, appear to surpass the metropolis, allowing for the difference of numbers; and, in this respect, they obviously excel beyond comparison French or American towns of like magnitude. Another proof of the general diffusion of wealth in England, is the large proportion of the sums invested by savings-banks which is subscribed out of London; the whole fund amounting to about £14,000,000, and subscribed by persons little above the condition of labourers. But, finally, the most striking proof of the wealth of the English, all over England, is the facility with which, in any part of England, funds are raised for any undertaking that offers the least chance of profit. It is to this point especially that I would draw the attention of Americans. Though thousands of millions have been spent in rendering England the most habitable country in the world; in making bad land good; in fences, farm-buildings, roads, bridges, canals, and docks; on the opening of mines, the building of manufactories and warehouses, not to mention houses; still it appears as if thousands of millions would be forthcoming for similar purposes, if there were but room for carrying such purposes into effect. Abundance of CAPITAL invested, and ready to be invested, is the most marked, nay, the peculiar characteristic of England. By guessing at what it would take to put France or one of the American states into the same condition as England, with respect to the improvement of land, to farm-buildings, roads, bridges, canals, wharfs, docks, manufactories, warehouses, and machinery, &c., we may form some idea of the degree in which the fixed capital of the English exceeds that of the French or Americans: and yet the French or Americans, who have invested so small a capital in comparison with that invested by the English, have far less than the English ready for investment. Money makes money, says the proverb; which, translated into the language of modern science, means that capital creates capital. In America, where there is so much room for the investment of capital, because so little capital has been invested, innumerable works, holding out the certainty of large profits, are projected, but, for want of capital, are not begun; while, in England, where, by reason of the vast masses of capital already invested, there seems but little room for the profitable investment of more, millions accumulate so rapidly, that funds are never wanted for even the most hazardous undertakings. How to obtain capital, is the question in America; what to do with their capital, is the puzzle of the English. In this difficulty, the English build Waterloo bridges, which yield no profit; send goods to be sold in distant countries at less than prime cost; squander millions on South American speculations; lay out immense sums in the purchase of foreign securities; and lend money, by tens of millions at a time, to North American states, South American anarchies, and European tyrants great or small. If the wealth of a society depend on the proportion which capital bears to numbers, then, it is clear, the English are the richest people in the world."

There are now 76 omnibuses in New York; besides these, there are 194 licensed hackney-coaches at the different stands; 2449 cabs; and 137 porters with either barrows or hand-carts.

The Journal of the Statistical Society of France gives a curious scale of the proportion of male and female births in Europe, taken from an aggregate of 70,000,000 of births. The following are the particulars:—For every 100 girls, there are born in Russia 108.91, in Milan, 117.61; in France, 106.55; in Holland, 106.41; in Pomerania and Brandenburg, 106.27; in Sicily, 106.13; in Austria, 106.10; in Silesia, 106.5; in Prussia, 106.94; in Wurtemberg, 105.69; in the duchy of Posen, 105.65; in Bohemia, 105.38; in Great Britain, 104.75; in Sweden, 104.62. The two extremes are formed by Russia and Sweden.

Savings Banks.—The idea of this excellent class of institutions originated with Jeremy Bentham in the year 1797. It was at first deemed a visionary notion. Mr George Rose, in 1799, made an effort to establish something of the kind under the patronage of government; but, in consequence of the antipathy of George the Third to other notions of Bentham, the scheme did not take effect.

SCOTLAND.

FIRST ELECTIONS UNDER THE BURGH REFORM ACT. THE Scottish Burgh Reform Act came into operation on the 5th of November, till which period the old Magistrates were enabled, by a clause in the bill, to protract their functions. By this bill, there will be a most extraordinary change in the system of municipal government in Scotland; and the effects, in general, will be far more obvious than those of the parliamentary reform act. During the past month, nothing else has engaged public attention but the elections; and as this is decidedly the most extraordinary political incident that has happened in the country for nearly a century, we now place upon record the names of those gentlemen in the chief towns, whom the people, for the first time, have had the power of electing to manage their affairs. Throughout, the elections were quietly conducted, without uproar, or any kind of mischief whatsoever. A little practice has shown that the act is defective, and ambiguous in some clauses; but that is of little moment, and may easily be remedied. As it is, the bill was little else than experimental, and its weak points will be strengthened as may afterwards seem fit.

Edinburgh.—In this city a remarkable indifference prevailed among the superior classes respecting the elections. In all the five wards, Whig committees were appointed several days before at public meetings, for the purpose of pointing out fit persons to represent the citizens in the Town Council: The Tories were nowhere, and the ultra-Liberals only partially, upon the alert. Ultimately the following gentlemen were elected:—

First District.		Votes.
Mr W. Tait, bookseller	*	262
Mr Spittal, merchant		250
Mr Aytoun, advocate	*	247
Mr Ralph Richardson, merchant	*	229
Mr R. W. Jameson, W.S.	*	229
Mr Sawers, baker		214
Second District.
Mr J. F. Macfarlan, druggist		257
Mr Robert Thomson, merchant		252
Mr Adam Black, bookseller		239
Mr William Purves, tailor and clothier	*	237
Mr Duncan M'Laren, merchant	*	179
Mr James Aitken, bookseller		141
Third District.
Mr Mackay, jeweller		306
Mr Gillespie Graham, architect		284
Mr Crooks, W.S.		265
Dr Sanders		251
Mr Ponton, builder		231
Professor Lizars		227
Fourth District.
Mr John Robertson, bookseller	*	282
Mr Thomas Grainger, civil-engineer		281

Mr Wm. Chambers, bookseller
Mr Thomas Blackie, spirit-merchant
Mr Mat. Wingrave, straw-hat manufacturer
Mr John Duncan, bootmaker
Mr John Craig, merchant, Great King Street

Fifth District.

Mr J. Donaldson, S.S.C., Prince's Street
Mr J. Smith, builder, Hope Street
Mr R. Alexander, merchant, Frederick Street
Mr P. Tennent, W.S., George Street
Mr J. Mackay, jeweller, Forth Street
Mr J. Ritchie, builder, India Street

Mr Mackay, jeweller, having been returned for districts, was pleased to sit for the third; so that it was another election for the fifth, when Dr Macan was returned. It was calculated that hardly a half the electors went to the poll.

A very awkward arrangement has been detected in the bill. It is provided that those who shall retire at the end of the first and second years shall be, not those who had fewest votes in their own particular ward, but fewest votes upon the whole. Hence, the whole of the representatives of the fifth ward will go out at the end of one year, while in the third none will go out, &c.

The new Council met for the first time on Thursday, November 14. The first business was the selection of Magistrates. Mr Spittal was appointed Lord Provost, after an ineffectual attempt by Mr Chambers to make him come forward previously to avow his sentiments on some particular questions; four votes on this mode of procedure, and twenty-eight against it. Messrs Thomson, Macfarlan, Savers, and Donaldson, were appointed Bailies; Mr Black, Treasurer; Mr Crooks, Captain of Orange Colours; Mr Purves, Baron Bailie of Canongate and Calton; and Mr Ritchie, Baron Bailie of Portsburgh. Mr Macfie, who had previously been chosen by the Guildry as their Dean, and Mr Banks, convener of trades, have also seen in the Council. The salary formerly paid to the Lord Provost was £1000. It was voted by a majority on this occasion that he shall only be enabled to draw necessary expenses to the extent of £500. A counter motion, to the effect that the allowance should be only to the extent of £250, was supported only by a minority of 13, which may be considered indicative of the number of practical reformers in the Council. In the list of those elected, the names of those who opposed this minority are marked with a *

Leith.—The councillors returned are:—

First Ward.

Mr Adam White, merchant
Mr Henry Johnston, banker
Mr William Taylor, soap-manufacturer
Mr Thomas Hutchison, merchant
Mr Robert Mathew

Second Ward.

Mr James Wishart, merchant
Mr James Scarth, do.
Mr George Thomson, do.

Third Ward.

Mr John Veitch, corkcutter
Mr James Nelson, cooper
Mr William Morrison, merchant

Fourth Ward.

Mr John Carr Beattie, merchant
Mr Robert Liddell, broker
Mr Frederick Schultze

Fifth Ward.

Mr John Mitchell, jun. general agent
Mr James Carnie, fisherman, Newhaven
Captain Liston

From these gentlemen the following office-bearers have been selected:—Mr A. White, Provost.—Messrs Wishart, Johnston, Veitch, and Schultze, Bailies; Mr G. Thomson, Treasurer.

Glasgow.—The new Council in this city is said to be of a still more liberal complexion than even that of Edinburgh. The following is a list of the gentlemen elected, and their respective amounts of votes:—

First District.

William Gilmour . 727 Robert Grahame . 16
William Craig . 652 Robert M'Gavin . 16
Hugh Tennent . 650 James Turner . 79

Second District.

Alex. Dennistoun . 491 Alex. Johnstone . 84
Wm. Bankier . 464 James Campbell . 78
John Ure . 422 John Small . 76

Third District.

Henry Brock . 581 James Beith . 107
Robert Hutchison . 479 John Douglas . 144
John Mitchell . 475 John M'Gregor . 144

Fourth District.

Henry Paul . 460 James Lumsden . 133
Henry Dunlop . 433 C. J. Tennent . 173
William Dixon . 402 David Hope . 140

Fifth District.

John Fleming . 516 George Ord . 136
Andrew M'George . 404 John Pattison . 131
William Mills . 396 Thomas Muir . 131

The election of Magistrates took place on the 14th November, when Mr Grahame of Whitehill was appointed Lord Provost, and Messrs Gilmour, Lumsden, Mills, Muir, and Tennent (since resigned), Bailies. A discussion had previously taken place relative to the propriety of giving up the insignia of office, and the cocked hats which, time out of mind, have been worn by the Magistrates of the western capital. It was ultimately resolved to give up the hats, but to retain the gold chains.

DECEMBER, 1833.

Forbals.—Henry Paul, Esq. Provost.—Messrs John Walker, Peter Adam, Patrick Neilson, and John Lindsay, Bailies.—James Dennistoun, Esq. Bailie of Forbals.

Paisley.—William Hardie, Esq. Provost.—Messrs Robert Pattison, Robert Hendry, William Jeffrey, and James Clark, Bailies.—Mr John Henderson, Treasurer.—Messrs Dunlop, Cochran, Drummond, John Dewar Watson, Jaffrey, Orr, Farquharson, Liset, Carlile Hardie, and Calderwood, Councillors.

Dumfries.—R. Murray, Esq. Provost.—Messrs Imp, M'Harg, and Harkness, Bailies.—Mr J. Barlow, Treasurer and Burgh Chamberlain.—Mr John Walker, Dean of Guild.—Messrs Thomas Hairstens, Turner; Captain M'Dowall; Deacon Mulligan, plumber; Deacon Dunbar, cabinet-maker; Samuel Blaind, draper; William Gordon, writer; Robert Tomson, merchant; James Dunwiddie, painter; John Anderson, bookseller; T. Lonsdale, ironmonger; Robert Scott, hosier; William Nicholson, chair-maker; Joseph Beck, coachmaker; George Kerr, cabinet-maker; Christopher Smythe, writer; Thomas Innelly, seedsman; Alexander Lookup, skinner; Benjamin Oney, clothier; Robert Kerr, tanner; (uncillors

Perth.—Ad. Pringle, Esq. Lord Provost.—Messrs Thomas Robt. Sandeman, David Clunie, John Graham, James M'Leish, Bailies.—The Councillors are Messrs J. Ballingall, Miller, Rutherford, W. Greig, Brown, Ed. Keay, Gray, Sidey, Pringle, H. Ballingall, Marshall, Martin, Murdoch, Macdougall, R. Greig, M'Cleish, M'Duff, Barlas, and Scott.

Dundee.—Alexander Keay, Esq. Provost.—Messrs Lamson, Symon, Wm. Christie, and Captain Kidd, Bailies; Mr Anderson, Treasurer; Mr Dron, Hospital Master; and Mr Brown, Kirk Master.—Councillors, Messrs William Lindsay, Robert Adamson, Alexander Christie, Alexander Lawson, Alex. Kay, William Boyack, Thomas Miller, Thomas Kidd, John McKay, John Bruce, William Christie, Peter Kindred, James Puller, David Keith, and William Ayes.

The Dundee Advertiser gives the following classification of the new Magistracy of that burgh. The Council consists of twenty-one members, viz.:—Supported Tories, 2; Whigs, 10; ultra-Whigs, 4; Radicals, 5.

Aberdeen.—The Magistrates are:—J. Blaikie, Esq. Provost.—Messrs Milne junior, Booth junior, Harp, and Lumsden, Bailies; Mr W. Allardyce, Treasurer; and Mr T. Bannerman, Dean of Guild. The Councillors are Messrs Williamson, Duffus, Dunn, Ise, White, Philip, M'Kinnon, Robb, Barron, Elmslie, and Allan.

Glasgow.—John Mackenzie, Esq. Provost.—Messrs John Fraser, John Thompson, Alexander Shepherd, and George Mackay, Bailies.

Portobello.—The election in the case of this Parliamentary burgh was a singular one. The town, as must be generally known, is a thriving sea-bathing place, and the permanent residence of a number of giteel families. Its population must be towards 3000; and yet, so well disposed are the inhabitants, and so little does even the vicinity of a large city affect it, that hitherto the town has existed in perfect tranquillity and happiness, without experiencing a wish for either magistrate, constable, or jail. There is not so much as a justice of peace in the town. A detachment of the Edinburgh police was tried some years ago; but on its being found that less security of peace existed under their protection than before, they were soon given up. Accordingly, a very small number of voters appeared at the election, and the gentlemen chosen declined to act, in consideration that, as the town had no common good, they must become a burden on the inhabitants. Finally, however, this objection was overcome, and the municipal body is as follows:—W. Iley, Esq. Provost; Captain A. Barclay and W. Swains, Esq. Bailies. Messrs Mowbray Stenhouse, Jackson, Douglas, Vallange, Stevenson, and Stewart, Councillors.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The benevolence of the present age has suggested that imprisonment for debt is a relic of barbarism which ought to be done away with. A kind of controversy has accordingly risen upon the subject; one set of reasoners being of opinion that, if traders had such recourse upon their debtors, they would become more cautious in trusting, and less apt to tempt individuals into purchases which their friends have afterwards to pay; while others represent that credit is some measure unavoidable, and that to deprive creditors of this pull upon their debtors, would be to strike a blow at all kinds of commercial intercourse. It is perhaps wanted on both sides to enable reflecting persons to judge between the two theories; and we therefore give all the publicity within our power to a document which lately appeared in the Scotsman, in which the results of sixty-four captions put into one messenger's hands, and fifty-five into another's, during a certain space of time, were very distinctly given from the evidence of those individuals.

Of the 64, the results were as follow:—

27 Debts wholly recovered, amounting in all to	L.506
8 Disposed of by searches to constitute bankruptcy, and parties not found, in consequence of having absconded from the country. No note kept of the amount of these debts.
15 Do. Arrangements made with agent or creditor, by payment or security, after notice of caption being given to them. No note of amount kept.
14 Do. Actual imprisonment.—Amount	330
64	L.836
2 Of those latter, two were voluntary, and for another purpose, viz. of enabling debtors to pursue cessio (or to take the benefit of insolvent act)—Debt,	L.12
2 Other two determinations to go to jail rather than pay, which they did in the jail,	29
So that we have, in point of fact, only ten captions out of sixty, or one-sixth actually put in force by imprisonment, and it may now be shown what was the result of the ten incarcerations which took place.
1 Was liberated after two days' confinement, by an arrangement, whose debt amounted to	95
1 After fourteen days, by do., debt,	41
1 After twenty days, by do. do.	30
2 After considerable confinement, by arrangement—united debts,	33
9	L.240
Amount under first head, as debts wholly recovered without incarceration,	506
	L.746

So that we have L.746 recovered out of L.836, by terror of caption and actual imprisonment, and which proportion would have been much greater, had it been possible to state the amount of the debts in the third branch, and arranged between the parties. Our informant cannot state how the remaining five of those incarcerated obtained their liberation, whether under the act of grace or cessio.

The fifty-five captions put into the hands of the other individual were disposed of thus:—

24 Captions.—Debts wholly recovered, and amounting, omitting shillings and pence, to	L.904
8 Do. Searches to render bankrupt to reduce preferences. Amount not known.
5 Do. Debtors not found; having left the country, &c. No note of amount kept.
18 Do. Incarcerated debts,	634
55	L.1538
1 Of these latter one was voluntary for the purpose of cessio, debt	L.10
8 Eight were liberated, after different short imprisonments, by arrangements with the parties' agents, either by full settlement or security, amount	492
Add sum above wholly recovered under the captions	904

"Now, here," says the investigator, "you have L.1396 out of L.1538 recovered to the creditors, which in all probability would never have found its way into their pockets, if warrants of incarceration for debt were unknown in this country. It will be no answer to say, that these individuals would have ultimately paid by allowing them time; for when it is borne in mind, the leniency of the law of Scotland, by compelling the creditor to give his debtor a certain delay (six or fifteen days, according to the nature of the constitution of the debt), every opportunity is afforded the debtor of making his arrangements. With these practical results before them, surely the most zealous advocate for the abolition of imprisonment for debt must pause before countenancing a measure that will be fraught with the most serious consequences to the whole community.

"I am far from being an advocate for actual incarceration for civil debts; but while I admit this, I must maintain, that, to abolish that law, would destroy mutual confidence and credit, and of course shake the commercial interests of this country to its very centre: it would increase pauperism to a fearful extent, and consequently poor-rates, and ultimately be the source of increasing crime, UNLESS, indeed, a substitute for the present law can be formed, which will have all the effects of the compulsor, without the immuring within four walls."

The Duke of Buccleuch.—This nobleman is decidedly the most unpopular in Scotland on account of his politics, but, on the other hand, the most beloved of all in his own circle on account of his character as a man and as a landlord. He has immense territorial possessions, and there is nowhere a tenantry more comfortable, more thoroughly secured from the evils that now press upon the agricultural interest, than his. The custom of the Buccleuch family for several generations has been to encourage old tenants, their children and representatives, to the utter disregard of the advanced rents which might be offered by other persons. Hence, there never has been any thing like oppression on the estates of this line of nobles. The rents always lag considerably behind the standard of the country; the tenants are easy in their circumstances happy, and, it may be added, less liable to fail in discharging their obligations, than many others who appear to be more productive to their landlords. No competition is allowed for farms. The previous tenant gets a new lease at a reasonable rate of rent; if he dies, it is granted to his widow, or to one of his children, for the benefit of his family. It is considered next to impossible for a new person to get a farm from the Buccleuch family. The complaint of Tityrus is never heard. Such practical virtues as these ought to be made known, in order to counteract the unfavourable impression which the duke's opinions upon a speculative question have occasioned. The duke is as yet a very young man; and, while his opposition to the reform bill could be nothing more, even in the estimation of his political adversaries, than an error in judgment, and excusable on account of his youth, his continuing the beneficent practices of his ancestors is, for the same reason, just the more praiseworthy. So much, in the mere desire to promote good feeling among all parties, we have been induced to say, in introducing the following anecdote of his grace from the Dumfries Courier:—"In the spring of 1832, Mr M'Turk of Kirkland lost several valuable horses, by a disease which puzzled the farmers greatly, and which, in violence and rapidity, resembled cholera; indeed, so much so, that to many it seemed identical with that fell scourge. The loss was most severe, but our friend suffered in silence. The Duke of Buccleuch, however, heard of it, and at the following rent-day, unasked and unsolicited, directed his chamberlain to make Mr M'Turk a present of £100 sterling. In making this fact known, we are merely doing an act of simple justice at the request of a mutual friend, unknown to the tenant of Kirkland himself, who is at this moment at a distance from home for the benefit of his health."

Vacancy in the College Church, Edinburgh.—The deposition of the Rev. Mr Tait from the College Church took place on the 22d October, and the Presbytery immediately called upon the Town Council to exercise their right as patrons in filling it up. The Council having expressed a resolution to do so at their meeting on the 29th, a public meeting of the inhabitants was held on the previous day, to get up a petition against the measure. It was represented at this meeting that the congregation being only about fifty in number, was not of such importance as to render haste necessary; that the vacancy ought to be supplied from some of the double charges; and, in fine, that as there was a greater number of citizens already than what congregations could be obtained for, the appointment of a new one would spoil an opportunity of making at least one step, without injury to vested interests, towards the proper settlement of the ecclesiastical question now pending in Edinburgh. The petition, which met with a slight opposition, was presented at the meeting next day; but the Council, with marked disrespect for the opinions of their fellow-citizens, proceeded to appoint Mr William Cunningham, assistant to Dr Scott of Greenock, to the vacant charge. The Scotsman newspaper asserts that this adds about £20,000 unnecessarily to the burdens of the city. The event had an obvious effect on the subsequent elections, and, if it had occurred sooner, might have caused a still greater effusion of radicalism into the new Council.

During the last year of the old Town Council of Edinburgh, the revenue exceeded the expenditure by £1416. This body was also censured, when about to be dissolved, with a mark of royal approbation, the King having, upon ascertaining the judicious manner in which it had managed the patronage of the University, given to it the right of appointment of the chairs of Medicine and General Pathology, and Medicine and Surgery.

Oct. 25. A public meeting of the inhabitants of Dunfermline was held in the Free-Masons Hall there, for the purpose of adopting measures to facilitate the total abolition of the corporation laws and abuses. Provest Russell was in the chair, supported by Bailies Malcolm and Russell. The following resolutions were adopted:—1. That every one ought to have the right of carrying his labour to the best market. 2. That the corporation laws are oppressive and unjust. 3. That this meeting had with pleasure the declaration of the provost and magistrates to the Parliamentary commissioners—that the restrictions and monopolies of the burgh have been the cause of much evil, and ought to be abolished. 4. That the guildry and incorporated trades be requested to co-operate with this meeting for this purpose. 5. That a memorial of grievances be presented to the commissioners at a public meeting, to investigate the burgh and corporation laws, signed by all who favour their abolition. 6. That a standing committee be appointed to correspond and co-operate with associations formed in other places, having the same object in view, and that they have a petition ready for signature against the opening of Parliament, and they are hereby empowered to call another meeting if they shall see cause. —27. The magistrates of Paisley—the old magistrates—gave a public testimonial of their liberality, by going in their official robes to a dissenting meeting-house. The new magistracy has, however, gone beyond the old, for it has resolved to go to no church at all, in an official capacity. Of the new magistracy in Edinburgh, ten declined attending the church in their official capacity; among those who did attend, were several dissenters.

—31. A lady, said to be one of the congregation of the Reverend Mr Tait, threw herself, in a state of phrenzy, over a window in Gardner's Crescent, Edinburgh.

Nov. 1. A gale of very considerable violence, and which was attended with some disasters at sea, took place on this and the following day throughout Scotland.

—3. Dr Chalmers, officiating in St George's Church, Edinburgh, took occasion, in one of the prayers, to introduce the following sentences, which we give as they appear in the Edinburgh Advertiser:—"In these days of restlessness and conflict, may Christianity nobly accredit itself to be the salt of the earth, the great cement, as well as sweetener, of human society! And may no weapon formed against the Church of Scotland ever prosper; but do Thou save it alike from the evils of a reckless and unprincipled patronage, and from the hostile machinations of those who, representing it as a bane and a burden on the commonwealth, are bent upon its overthrow. Endow its ministers with the spirit of wisdom, the spirit of a holy devotedness to the objects of their sacred profession, and, if need be, with the spirit, at once of uncompromising principle and unshrinking fortitude, that we may never consent to surrender the best interests of families, the Christian goal of our hitherto unprovided and neglected population, whether to the clamour of deluded, or to the insensate demands of ungodly men."

—6. A dinner was given in the Waterloo Rooms, Edinburgh, by 370 persons, to the two representatives of the city.

—15. The shop of Mr Symington, clothier, High Street, Paisley, and the whole of the building in which it was situated, besides a neighbouring house and some other property, were burnt. One man lost his life, leaving a wife and three children.—The proceedings for the election of a rector to the university took place at Glasgow. Mr Cookburn, Solicitor-General, the rector in office, and Sir D. K. Sandford, Professor of Greek, had equal votes.—A public dinner given by 300 of the electors of Dundee to their representative, Sir Henry Parnell. In returning thanks for his health being drunk, Sir Henry said he had given the ministers a general support, reserving to himself the right of differing occasionally. He thought that if the ministers acted with less deference to the House of Lords, by which, it was clear, this country would never be governed, they would preserve such popularity as would compel that house to give way. He also took occasion to argue his usual opinions as to the propriety, when taxes were to be reduced, of taking off those upon raw materials, which were the most detrimental to the manufactures of the kingdom.

It has been resolved to erect a House of Refuge in the city of Glasgow, the expense to be about £3000, whereof a large sum has been already subscribed.

At the beginning of November, the workmen employed in Craigheth quarry came upon another fossil tree in a part of the quarry much beneath the place where the former one was discovered; and already it has been laid bare to the extent of about nine feet. This remarkable fossil remains is believed by the naturalists who have examined it, to belong to the family of the Conifera or fir species. It is about three feet in diameter, or nine in circumference, and perfectly round or cylindrical; and in the bed which it occupies it is inclined at an angle of from 40 deg. to 50 deg. to the horizon. Its composition is the same as that of the fossil tree last discovered in the same place, consisting chiefly of lime, combined with a portion of iron and carbon. This fossil, considered both with reference to its present state, and the position where it was discovered, attests an extraordinary fact in the history of our globe.

SKETCH OF THE ENGLISH SUCCESSION.

THE writer of the present article recollects being told by the late Sir Walter Scott, that, in a private conversation with George IV. respecting the friends of the house of Stuart, his Majesty expressed himself in such a manner as to show a conviction in his own mind that he had now a hereditary as well as parliamentary title to the throne, seeing the descendants of James II. were extinct, and that he, therefore, calculated upon obtaining for himself all that zealous attachment which the Jacobites had formerly shown to the two pretenders. The question has been so long banished from the public mind, as one of no earthly importance, that a misconception of it might be excused even in the individual most concerned. If his Majesty would have probably been much surprised if Sir Walter had been so little of a courtier as to inform him, that, so far from his being the hereditary claimant of the throne, there was not the least probability, in the natural course of events, that he or any of his family would ever become so. Preferable claims might be set forward by perhaps half of the royal families of Europe, and even, we do not doubt, by several of the junior branches of his own house: Mr. Louis Philip of Orleans, who has so lately gained a parliamentary title to the crown of France, could present a better hereditary claim to that of Great Britain than his present Majesty! These facts, in our opinion, of not the least value historically: the succession of the house of Hanover is fixed upon a principle which sets hereditary title at defiance. It is curious, however, to trace out the individuals, who, but for certain political circumstances, would have had a title to the throne of these kingdoms. It is a moral interest wanting in the inquiry. We find, in some of those claimants, that they were in a manner self-excluded, by constancy to principles which all men hold sacred. A knowledge of the English succession may also help to awaken a taste in some minds for the more philosophical departments of history.

Ever since the year 1066, when the kingdom of England was conquered by William Duke of Normandy, one race has occupied the throne. The succession, it is true, has been frequently broken, in consequence of misgovernment and usurpation; but, nevertheless, till the revolution of 1688, no break had taken place, which was not sooner or later repaired by the re-accession of the main line. These breaks, in the early ages of the monarchy, were very frequent, and, in some instances, much bloodshed was the consequence.

The very first king after William the Conqueror was an usurper. The true heir was Robert, the eldest son; but, this prince being no favourite of his father, and in a distant part of Europe at the time, his younger brother William was enabled, by the destination of the king, as well as by his prompt appearance at Westminster, to assume the throne. At the death of William in 1100, his elder brother Robert was still living: but Henry, the youngest of all the brothers, being nearest to Westminster, was able to obtain the crown, to the exclusion once more of the rightful heir. He was crowned two days after the death of William, "by the mercy of God," as he expressed it in a paper issued next day. As Robert left no issue to perpetuate his claims, Henry eventually became the representative of the royal family. At his death in 1135, there was another usurpation—that of Stephen; but neither did it cause a permanent alteration. The line of Henry's descendants was maintained in the next king, Henry II., who was the grandson of Henry I., by his daughter Maud. From him to his son Richard I., the crown was transmitted without any interruption; but the next monarch, John, only obtained it by destroying a nephew who had a preferable title. From John, through Henry III., Edward I., and Edward II., the line was preserved unbroken; but it only reached Edward III., at the expense of deposition to Edward II. From Edward III. to his grandson Richard II., the line was also unbroken. Here, however, it experienced a breach of the most fatal kind. Richard II. was, in 1399, deposed by the military power of his cousin, Henry Duke of Lancaster, who became king under the title of Henry IV. Now, even failing Richard, Henry was not the true heir. He was descended from Edward III. by a fourth son, while the posterity of a third still existed in the persons of Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, and of his sister Anne Duchess of York. Henry, nevertheless, fixed a dynasty, which continued during two subsequent generations—Henry V. and Henry VI. During this interval, the Earl of March died without issue, and the claims of his line became centred in the family of his sister, whose son, Richard Duke of York, was at length stirred up to dispute the title of the reigning monarch. Then began the celebrated contest between the houses of York and Lancaster, during which a hundred thousand men are said to have been slain, merely on account of an usurpation of no importance to the people, which had taken place half a century before. It was the fortune of the Duke of York to die in battle before he could make good his right. But his son Edward, in 1460, succeeded in displacing Henry VI., and in cutting off his posterity, so that the house of Lancaster became extinct. This Edward IV., the first prince of the house of York, died in 1483, leaving two children, one of whom was proclaimed king under the title of Edward V. It is well known, however, that the young prince had not reigned much more than two months, when he and his younger brother were smothered in the Tower by the order of their uncle, the Duke of Gloucester, who became king under the title of Richard III.

During Richard's reign, the real heir of the crown was the princess Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward IV.; and even although this person had been out of the way, there would have still interposed the two children of the Duke of Clarence, Richard's elder brother. Richard reigned two years, in despite of the imperfections of his title; and it was not to the true heir that his crown ultimately fell. The friends of the house of York found themselves obliged, in order to oppose the usurper with any effect, to coalesce with the remains of the Lancastrian party, who now looked to Henry Earl of Richmond as inheriting the pretensions of that branch of the royal house.

As this Henry of Richmond became the founder, in some measure, of a new dynasty, it is necessary to trace his pedigree with some care. He was the son (by Edmund Earl of Richmond) of Margaret Plantagenet, daughter of John Duke of Somerset, son of John Earl of Somerset, son of John of Gaunt by an adulterous connection with Dame Catherine Swinford. He was thus descended from the same branch of Edward III.'s family as Henry IV. had been, but by an illegitimate alliance. John of Gaunt, indeed, had procured royal letters patent, legitimating this branch of his offspring; but, on the other hand, the legitimation bore an express exception as to the inheritance of the crown. It is the opinion of Sir James Mackintosh that this exception, even if the legitimation could stand good in other respects, completely precluded all claims which Henry Earl of Richmond might make to the crown. In those days, however, these matters were not so accurately traced or so extensively known as they would have been in a somewhat later age; and, accordingly, during the usurpation of Richard III., the Earl of Richmond was so formidable a competitor, that the friends of the true succession in the house of York saw no other course than to propose an alliance between him and the genuine heir, the Princess Elizabeth. On this understanding, Henry was enabled to overthrow Richard III. at the battle of Bosworth, and to assume the crown, which, indeed, his children might properly inherit by the right of their mother, but could never be borne by himself except through the right of conquest.

Notwithstanding this imperfection of title, Henry VII. reigned in his own right for many years, and even became a kind of landmark in the English succession, precluding all collateral pretenders, and pointed to as the fountain of their right by many succeeding claimants. His son Henry VIII. had an unquestionable title, but only through his mother, the daughter of Edward IV. His successors, Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth, were all legitimate claimants; and so was the next monarch, James I. (VI. of Scotland), whose descent from Margaret, the eldest daughter of Henry VII., or we should rather say of his consort Elizabeth, rendered him, in the failure of the issue of Henry VIII., the true representative (through the house of York) of Edward III. This sovereign had also some Lancastrian pretensions, through Jane, daughter of the Duke of Somerset, who was the mother of his ancestor James II. of Scotland; but they had the same sinister bar as those of Henry VII.

From James I., who died in 1625, the crown descended in the usual principles of succession through Charles I., Charles II., and James II.; but it is well known that this last monarch, in consequence of his attempting to overturn the Protestant religion, was displaced at the Revolution in 1688, by his own daughter Mary, and his nephew and son-in-law William Prince of Orange, who assumed the throne jointly, not only to the exclusion of their imprudent father, but also of his infant son the Prince of Wales. This violation of the custom of succession was sanctioned by the voice of the people in Parliament—a sanction which had been obtained to almost every preceding breach in the line, but was now extended on the high principle, before unknown, of a right in the people to displace a sovereign for misconduct in the exercise of his functions, or, to speak more technically, a breach of those laws which equally bind sovereign and subjects. Had William left any child, either by Mary or otherwise, the succession would have centred in that individual; for, failing James II. and his son, William was the next heir, by his mother Mary, the eldest daughter of Charles I. As he left no offspring, Anne, the second daughter of James II., succeeded to the throne, which would have also been inherited by her children, if any had survived her. At her death in 1714, it went to the family now reigning, of whose descent we shall give a minute account, as well as of the lines of the royal house which were set aside in their favour.

Till the extinction of the posterity of James II. in 1808, by the death of Cardinal York, the title to the crown upon the principle of primogeniture lay unquestionably in that family. It then centred in the posterity of Henrietta, daughter of Charles I. This lady married Philip Duke of Orleans, brother of Louis XIV., by whom she had a daughter, Ann-Mary, married to Amadeus II., King of Sardinia, and who became the mother of Charles Emanuel III., who succeeded to the throne of Sardinia in 1730. We are unable to trace this family any farther with accuracy: we believe, owing to the operation of the Salic law in Sardinia, the representation of the Princess Henrietta does not now rest with the occupant of the throne, but with some noble Italian family.

Failing the descendants of Henrietta, the succession to the throne upon the ordinary principle would next come to the descendants of Elizabeth, eldest daughter of King James I. of Great Britain. This princess, who was born at Falkland, in Fife, in 1596, married Frederick V., elector-palatine of the Rhine, by whom she had thirteen children. Two of her sons, Maurice and Rupert, distinguished themselves as commanders in the army of their uncle Charles I. during the civil war. Her eldest son was Charles Louis, elector-palatine, whose daughter, Charlotte Elizabeth, was the second wife of that same Duke of Orleans who had married for his first the Princess Henrietta, daughter of Charles I., and who thereby became the ancestor of the Sardinian line. The Duchess of Orleans was a woman distinguished for plainness of appearance and for natural talent, the latter of which she transmitted to her son, the Regent Orleans. The line is now represented by Louis Philip of Orleans, king of the French, who, strange to say, in the failure of the Sardinian line, would inherit a title to the throne of Great Britain upon the common principles of succession.

Next to Charles Louis, elector-palatine, stood his brother Edward Count Palatine, whose descendants branched out into the families of the Prince of Salms and the Duc de Bourbon, the latter of which lately became extinct. This race, however, and that of Charles Louis, were, like the Sardinian family and the son of James II., secluded from the throne by the act of succession, on the ground of their being Roman Catholics, and choice made of the Princess Sophia, the youngest of all the thirteen children of the Princess Elizabeth, who was the only Protestant of the family. Sophia was a woman of great beauty, wit, and even learning: she was the first to discover and patronise the talents of Leibnitz. When William III. displaced his father-in-law in 1689, although it opened up a contingent prospect of the throne to herself, her congratulatory letter to him was more full of expressions of gratitude and tenderness towards the dethroned monarch, who had been her friend, than of affection to the individual whom she was addressing. At the passing of the act of settlement in 1701, she was upwards of seventy years of age, and had long before been married to Ernest Augustus Duke of Hanover. She died in June 1714, less than two months before Queen Anne, whom she would otherwise have succeeded. Her son George, Elector of Hanover, then became king; and his direct descendant, William IV., is now upon the throne.

One observation must force itself on every one who inquires into the genealogy of the royal family—namely, how many branches of the tree have become withered and extinct, while others are as remarkable for their fruitfulness. The main line of the house of Stuart existed till 1808: how strange to consider, that, during two hundred years before that, only two persons of the royal family had any posterity which have reached our own times—namely, the Princesses Henrietta and Elizabeth. But for the existence of an offspring from one or other of these persons, we should have to search for a claimant of the English throne in the posterity of the Princess Mary, daughter of Henry VII., now perhaps extended throughout the whole of the English nobility; while the nearest heir to that of Scotland would be the Duke of Hamilton, descended from a daughter of James II., who died in 1460. In the latter case, there are only, during nearly four hundred years, two persons of the royal house who have sent representatives down to our own time. The same principle holds good in some of our noble families: we believe the claimant of the Marischal peerage in Scotland traces back his descent from the main line for about the same time with the Duke of Hamilton, all the intermediate persons being unrepresented. It would thus appear that whole families, which at one time look flourishing, become afterwards a blank in our population. We have heard of several instances of the fact in the middle classes; of one family, in particular, which was very numerous two centuries ago in Ayrshire, and whose name is not now borne by one male person in the district. The fact, if it could be established, would not prove, as some may think, a fallacy in the Malthusian calculations. It would rather be favourable to that peculiar view of the human race; for what does it show but that only a small part of those who are born can find room in our old straitened communities to leave an extending posterity?

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

CONSIDERABLE obscurity hangs over the actual condition of Spain at the present moment, and the movements, political and warlike, with which she is internally distracted. From all that can be ascertained, however, there seems little doubt that the Carlist insurrection is for the present in a great measure suppressed, both in the southern and northern provinces. Since our last summary, the queen's troops have been almost every where successful. We left General Saarsfield at Burgos, having found himself unable to proceed towards Vittoria for want of the necessary supplies of munitions. He proceeded thither, however, on the 11th November, at the head of about 14,000 men—part of this force moving upon Bilbao to the left, and the main body advancing on the Vittoria road under his own command. On the 14th, the right wing of this latter division encountered the Curate Merino, at the head of a large body of insurgents, whom he speedily put to the rout. After this affair, he is said to have met with no opposition on his way to Vittoria, which he entered on the 22d. The other division of his army took possession of Bilbao on the 26th. General Saarsfield has since resigned his command in favour of General Valdez, and has been appointed viceroy of Navarre. It seems that his long and apparently unaccountable inaction at Burgos, was owing to want of vigour, or perhaps to treachery, in the late minister of war, Cruz, by whom he was left unsupported with the necessary reinforcements, and hampered with contradictory orders. The vigorous representations of the liberals, and the growing dissatisfaction in the capital, at length compelled the queen to interfere. Saarsfield sent in his resignation of the command, but first insisted upon putting a virtual end to the war by the capture of Vittoria and Bilbao.

It is said that the conquerors have disgraced their success by relentless severity towards the insurgents, and committed the most savage and indiscriminate carnage amongst the fugitives.

General Rodil, the captain-general of Estremadura, crossed the Portuguese frontier, at the head of a considerable force, in search of Don Carlos, whom he almost surprised at Miranda, and compelled to fly precipitately to Chaves. General Morillo at the same time advanced as far as Braganza, but was equally unsuccessful. These unexpected acts of vigour are supposed to have been determined on by Zea Bermudez, in the hope of gaining a little popularity with the liberals.

In the meantime, the struggle betwixt the liberals and the minister Zea Bermudez still goes on. We confess we are somewhat at a loss to understand how this man still keeps his place. The council of regency, the dominant party in the state, are represented as being his determined opponents, yet still he continues to be minister, in spite of all endeavours to displace or supersede him. This anomalous state of matters would lead to a suspicion that he was secretly countenanced and supported in some efficient quarter.

As we believe much ignorance prevails amongst all classes in this country respecting the actual state of parties in Spain, and their respective resources, the condition of the army, &c., we are happy to be able to give the following information on those subjects, from an interesting article in the Revue Militaire Belge for December, written by the celebrated General Van Halen, who, it may be presumed, is intimately acquainted with the subject.

The sum total of the Spanish army is estimated at 90,000 men; but of these, 30,000 are militia. The royal guard consists of 2052 foot soldiers, and 2240 heavy armed cuirassiers and lancers, besides a train of artillery. The cavalry scarcely exceeds 4000 men, and the whole artillery force is about 3500. The remainder consists of troops of the line and unattached companies. General Van Halen deducts at least one-eighth from the entire available force for the men employed in the service of the officers, and other unwelcome occupations. The number of staff-officers is prodigious—no less than 530—among whom the name of the Duke of Wellington is conspicuous. The infantry is in a state of excellent discipline, owing to the administration of General Llander: the cavalry, on the contrary, is in a wretched condition. The staff does not contain more than five or six officers possessing energy and talent, out of the 530. These exceptions are Amarillas, Llander, Valdez, Morillo, Espaleta, and Anglona; all of whom, except Valdez, learned the art of war under Wellington, in the campaigns of 1812-13 and 14. Saarsfield is represented as being subject to attacks of "the spleen," which render him almost intolerable to his officers. When suffering under this complaint, he locks himself up in his chamber, and keeps a pistol ready loaded on a table near him, ready to shoot any one daring or ignorant enough to break in upon his privacy. Freire, Quesada, and Castanos, have become too old for hard service. The troops in general may be depended upon for loyalty to the queen, as long as they are commanded by their present officers. They all look forward to better times for their country, and, as they deem the present state of affairs not likely to last, care little for the political predilections of Zea Bermudez.

With respect to the feeling of the people, as distinguished from that of the army, General Van Halen says that there are only two parties in Spain—the Liberal and the Carlist; the former comprising in its ranks the majority of the nobility, almost all the constitutionalists, the majority of the ancient Josephinos, the merchants, and the industrious classes. These latter could furnish a national guard of 100,000 men.

The Carlist party consists, first, of the benefited clergy; they never act except as a deliberative body. Secondly, the monks, who are divided into two classes, the administrative and the active; the latter comprising the healthy and vigorous. Thirdly, the great body of the peasantry. This party is very compact, and moves along with a single view to the preservation of its revenue. It can muster an army of monks of no less than 50,000; and if necessary, even the number might be doubled, from the ranks of the immediate relations, who mainly depend for support upon receiving a share of the income collected from various sources by the clergy. This income is estimated at about five millions and a quarter sterling.

The army of monks has two chiefs. One is the General of the Franciscans, an energetic plausible man, who is a kind of secretary at war. Merino "the man of action," and takes his commands from headquarters. He has the privilege of entering the nunneries, where every thing is prepared for his reception, when out on any expedition. He general receives his orders at some distance from his camp, which he leaves for that purpose in the night, accompanied by an old servant of very Quixotic appearance. Every three or four leagues there is sure to be a convent, and Merino judges from the peculiar mode in which the clock is illuminated, whether he is to stop there or proceed.

The clergy had decided, some time before the death of Ferdinand, what part to take when that event should happen. They had resolved to use all their influence at court for the establishment of a juste milieu system. Zea Bermudez is their tool; and should he resist their orders, would at once be prostrated.

The insurrection of the Basque provinces arose from a dread of losing certain peculiar privileges, rather than from any wish to change the government and dethrone the queen.

Such are the opinions of General Van Halen, which if not implicitly to be relied upon, are at least worthy of attention.

PORTUGAL.

THE contention in Portugal is almost exactly as it left it last month. Both parties seem exhausted with the struggle, and negotiation has been substituted for operation. We left the Miguelite army with the walls of Santarem, watched by the forces of Pedro; and there they have both remained, upon the last accounts, in a state of inactivity. What little skirmishing has been going on elsewhere, has been favourable to the cause of Miguel. On the 2d December about 1500 of his troops, under the command of Colonel Lemos, made an attack on Alcasar de Sal, a small town near St Ubes, garrisoned by a detachment of the Pedroite army, consisting of about 1000 Lisbon militia and 150 English and Portuguese marines. At first the Miguelites were twice repulsed with considerable loss by the small body of English and Portuguese marines; but the militia and volunteers stationed in the rear, observing the determined charges of the Miguelite cavalry, betook themselves to flight without firing shot, leaving their friends to get out of the fray as they best could. The latter of course retreated, and were driven into some neighbouring marshes, where they suffered heavy loss. A great number of the volunteers, it is said, passed over to the lines of the enemy, shouting out, "Viva Don Miguel!" The total loss of the Pedroites, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, is reckoned to amount to at least 800 men.

Since the above, Miguel has been strengthening his force at Santarem by recruits; and the arrival of a detachment of 3000 men from his army at Oporto, enabled him once more to assume the offensive. He has dispatched troops into the Alentejo, with the intention, it was supposed, of attacking Faro and Lagos in the Algarve.

In the meantime, it is said that the conduct of Pedro and his ministers has led almost to an open rupture with the Dukes of Palmella and Terceira and Admiral Napier. The latter has given vent to his indignation in no measured terms, declaring that if he did not value the cause at a higher rate than his own interest or personal feelings, he would throw up his appointment and return to England.

All this, together with the evident indisposition of the great body of the Portuguese nation to the "constitutional" cause, augurs ill for the success of the latter; and in fact there seems little chance of speedy termination to the contest, unless by the influence of foreign mediation.

Official intelligence has, however, been received from Lisbon of the adhesion of the Cape de Verd Islands to the queen, as soon as the entry of the constitutional troops into the capital became known. It also appears that the queen-regent of Spain has expressed great dissatisfaction with Don Miguel, on account of his friendly predilection towards Don Carlos, and has officially declared her determination to break off all diplomatic relations with him, and exert herself in concert with Great Britain to bring about a reconciliation between the contending parties in Portugal. This is the only acknowledgment of Donna Maria on the part of Spain—and it cannot be called a formal one—which has yet appeared, so that the statement given in our last upon the credit of the London journals was premature.

Meanwhile, the agents of Miguel in this country are no less busy than those of Pedro in raising recruits. About 400 have been lately raised, and are ready to be shipped off for the support of the former, and the "prime sinew of war," money, is said to be plentiful with him.

FRANCE.

THE election of public functionaries in the various departments has terminated since our last, and the result is said to be highly favourable to the government.

JANUARY, 1834.

ent or juste milieu party. The following is a short outline of the constitution of these local administrations:—The mayor, who is the sole administrator of the commune, is assisted by a municipal council; the prefect, whose jurisdiction comprises several communes, has a council of arrondissement; and the prefect, or civil governor of a province, has the advice of a general council: he has likewise under him a council of prefecture, over which he presides when he pleases, for the decision of disputed cases relating to contributions, or to questions of real or personal property, &c. The law gives to the electors the voice of the members of these several administrative councils.

The French minister of the interior is taking great precautions to prevent the recurrence of another Venetian insurrection (although not the slightest symptom of such an event is manifested), by the construction of roads, bridges, and other operations calculated to civilise the country.

The latest French journals are chiefly filled with details of the trial of twenty-five persons, charged with having conspired to revolutionise the government at the last July celebration of the victory of the barricades. The conspirators are all people of mean condition, except a M. Raspail, a chemist of some note. The proceedings in court, had we room to give exact details, would appear not a little extraordinary to our readers. The prisoners interrupt the solemnity of them by abusing and ridiculing the president and his crown functionaries, who having no power to repress such indecency, retort with equally acrimonious abuse. It is generally expected that the prosecutions will terminate like almost all the others under Louis Philippe's government, in the acquittal of the prisoners. The witnesses consist chiefly of Polish spies, whose evidence, owing to their infamous character, is repeatedly been discredited on previous occasions the same nature.

The house and property of the veteran Lafitte, who, by the variations in the French funds at the revolution of the barricades, was reduced from extreme wealth to utter poverty, are about to be sold for behoof of his creditor, the Bank of France. Should the proceeds be insufficient to discharge the claim, the bank will come upon Louis Philippe, who was Lafitte's security. A public subscription was some time ago set on foot, with the view of purchasing Lafitte's house and demesne, and presenting it back to him, as a token of public gratitude to the old man; but it has proved a failure, no more than L.16,000 having been collected. It is worthy of remark, also, that scarcely halfpenny of this sum has been contributed by the respectable or wealthy classes, being obtained almost all from the lower orders.

The Memorial Bordelais, of the 6th December, announces that the Duchess de Berri is again pregnant. Marshal Jourdan, who commanded the French on so many important occasions, died on Sunday, November 24, in his seventy-second year.

TURKEY.

It seems to be generally believed that the tottering empire of the East is rapidly approaching annihilation. Her native strength has long been withered up, more by internal disease than foreign enmity; and she has been suffered to exist, or rather we should say perpetrated, to the present time by the European governments, not for her own sake, but as a sort of understood mutual barrier to the extension of their own empire, and thus preserving what is called the "balance of power" in Europe.

If we may believe the rumours generally abroad, an attempt will soon be made to remove this balance. Russia, at whose mercy the Turkish empire may be said at present to lie, has, it is said, entered into a treaty for its partition with Austria and Prussia, and it is expected in many quarters that this design will speedily be unequivocally manifested. This scheme is reported to have been one of the results of the recent congress of Munchengrätz. The signal for operations is said to be the death of Mahmoud, who is shortly expected to be decapitated by his subjects, with whom this seems to be an uniform means of solace on all occasions of national calamity.

Whatever truth there may be in the above report, it is certain that France and England are looking with great suspicion on the movements of the Czar. Preparations are making at Chatham, Portsmouth, and Plymouth, for reinforcing our fleet in the Mediterranean, and ten sail of the line are immediately to be dispatched thither. The dock-yards of Toulon are also full of bustle and preparation, and there seems little doubt of the co-operation of the two countries in whatever line of policy it may be determined on to pursue. There seems a disposition amongst the "liberals" of both nations to throw the remnant of the Turkish empire into the hands of Mehemet Ali; but any proceedings on the part of France or Britain to destroy its existence as an independent nation, would be tantamount to that want of faith for which they are at present condemning Russia.

HOLLAND.

The only piece of intelligence relative to Dutch affairs since our last, worth mentioning, is the reduction of the army, of which 14,000 men are said to have been disbanded. This does not look like any immediate expectation of personal war, although the conduct of his Majesty, in some other respects, would induce a supposition that he regards a rupture amongst the great powers as not improbable. It is strongly suspected that the equivocal and temporising policy he is pursuing, relative to the settlement of the disputes with Belgium, is a mere contrivance for delay, in expectation of a general war. The Prince of Orange, also, it is said, has set out on a secret mission to St Petersburg, which of course leads to the suspicion of friendly understanding with the Czar, in the present ominous aspect of European matters.

GERMANY.

We are ever and anon receiving intelligence, which points to the conclusion that an universal struggle is about to take place throughout Germany, between the rulers and the ruled; in other words, between despotism and freedom. The movements of the people themselves are not more indicative of this fact than those of their rulers, whose alarm and anxiety is evident from their repeated conferences, interchange of missions, and other proofs of a close and unremitted correspondence, although they contrive to keep the results of their deliberations wonderfully secret.

The actual nature of the meeting of the crowned heads at Munchengrätz, a few months ago—whether merely a friendly "palaver," as the Indians say, or a political congress—seems never yet to have been exactly ascertained; but it appears to have been the preliminary of one of a decidedly important character, which is about to be held at Vienna. The precise time when it will be opened is not ascertained; but some of the ministers have already arrived, and others are on their way. Among the former is the envoy of the king of Holland, Baron Verstolk Von Soelen; and it is remarkable that he had hardly made his appearance in Vienna, before the Belgian minister took his departure. Moreover, the Belgian minister at Berlin is also on his road home. Nothing has transpired respecting the immediate cause of these proceedings; but there is little doubt of their being in reference to the insurrectionary spirit generally manifesting itself throughout the smaller states of Germany, and it will in all probability depend upon the resolutions adopted at the approaching conference, whether the transit from a despotic to a free system of government be a peaceful or bloody one.

ITALY.

A RECENT communication from the Austrian to the French government, indicates a state of public feeling in the north of Italy, alarming to the imperial protector of that country. Metternich, it seems, has applied to the Duc de Broglie for permission to march a body of Austrian troops into Piedmont, for the purpose of quelling the revolutionary spirit which prevails among the subjects of the King of Sardinia. Our readers will recollect that this monarch, when Prince of Carignan, headed an insurrectionary movement in 1821, against the authority of his royal father; and that his conduct on that occasion laid him open to the imputation of treachery and cowardice. His behaviour then, and subsequently, was at all events such as to entitle him to the support of the oppressors of his country; and, accordingly, no opposition was manifested to his accession to the throne in due course, by the cabinet of Vienna. Since he has been king, he has proved himself worthy of the confidence and countenance of Prince Metternich. He has persecuted every man suspected of liberalism in his dominions. Law and justice have been violated, substantially and in form, in the trials of the suspected. Special commissions, military courts-martial, and all the most approved instruments of tyranny, have been actively in force during the last year. We have heard the stifled groans, as it were, of his victims: the rumours of detected conspiracies, followed by military executions, banishments, and incarcerations, have been rife; but no distinct intelligence of these dark and bloody deeds has been suffered to transpire. Italians will endure a vast amount of oppression without murmurs; for, unfortunately, centuries of barbarian rule have habituated them to it. But there is a limit to Italian forbearance in this respect; and it would seem that the spirit of the Piedmontese has become so formidable to their contemptible sovereign, that he has applied to his patrons at Vienna for the loan of an army to keep them down. This, of course, they would be exceedingly pleased to afford him; but since the overthrow of the old Bourbon despotism in France, it has become necessary for the Austrians to use more caution in their mode of interfering in the affairs of Italy. Hence the application to the Duc de Broglie, who, it is gratifying to find, has been the reverse of accommodating to the designs of Austria. The French minister for foreign affairs is reported to have declared, that if Austria occupied one part of his Sardinian majesty's dominions, France would take possession of the other; that Savoy and Nice should be garrisoned with French troops as soon as the Austrian forces crossed over from Lombardy to Piedmont. This reply, we presume, has settled for a time the question of Austrian interference.—Spectator.

WEST INDIES.

THE session of the Jamaica Assembly was opened on the 8th October, with a long speech from the governor, Earl of Mulgrave. The chief purport of his address was, of course, to recommend the recent measure for the abolition of slavery to the members, which he did in terms equally conciliatory and decided. He particularly recommended the gradual and voluntary relaxation of the master's authority over the slave; reminded them that the colonists had never expressed a wish to perpetuate slavery; and concluded by requesting their cordial co-operation in carrying the emancipation act into effect. The address was on the whole well received, and the expressions of dissatisfaction dropped by one or two of the members on the occasion, were directed rather against the general policy of the mother country towards them than the abolition act itself. We may remark, by the way, that these reiterated complaints of the colonists, and their opposition to the various legislative measures affecting them, have been too much and too generally confounded by the British people with a systematic opposition to the abolition of slavery. Had the colonists, indeed, not been of themselves preparing the slave population for many years for the enjoyment of freedom, by conferring on them many privileges, and enacting many ameliorating laws in their behalf, it would perhaps have been impossible to have devised any plan of speedy emancipation which could be safely entertained and acted on at the present moment.

The bill for the abolition of slavery has accordingly been introduced into the House of Assembly, and referred to a select committee to consider and report. The Barbadoes Assembly came to a resolution, on the 15th October, to suspend proceeding on the subject till the report of the Jamaica committee be known. From the discussions which have already taken place, however, in the various assemblies, it is evident that one of the greatest points of objection will be the apprenticeship clause, which seems to be reckoned most destructive in its tendency, at once to the interests of owner and slave. The Antigua committee, after stating some most forcible objections to this part of the plan, recommend "unrestricted emancipation in 1834." They then go on to say—"Thus might we hope to effect, for the island of Antigua at least, that consummation so devoutly to be prayed for—a complete and final settlement of this most harassing and embittering question, and that without the necessity of a measure entailing such great and enduring expense, and so unrecognised by the British constitution, as the appointment of stipendiary magistrates from Europe, unacquainted, as they must be, with the peculiar habits, customs, and character of the people, and ignorant of the municipal institutions by which they have hitherto been governed; and also by only one stage of excitement, instead of the three, most unnecessarily, as we think, assigned for us by act of Parliament." These opinions are certainly entitled to great attention, as proceeding from men perfectly competent to form correct views on the subject, and disposed to consider it with candour. It does not, however, follow that immediate emancipation would be safe for the other colonies, because attended with little danger in Antigua; as, if we are to credit the assertion of the committee, the Antigua slaves have reached "a state of religious and moral improvement" which renders them far superior to their fellow-bondsmen in most of the other colonies.

THE COLONIES.

THERE are accounts in town from Sydney, New South Wales, to the 2d of June last; and the letters communicate some interesting particulars relative to the state of the colony, particularly as regards the production of the staple article of wool, which has now become so important an article of exportation to the mother country. The sheep, in nearly all parts of Australia, were in a much more healthy state than formerly; and it is estimated that in the next year there will be a vast increase in the produce of wools. The entries of wool from the colony this week have already been pretty large, having amounted to more than 500 bales. From Van Dieman's Land we learn that the shipments of wool and other produce for England were carried on with activity, and the accounts on the state of the flocks of sheep in that colony are also more favourable. News had just arrived of the loss of the Hibernia, with convicts on board, in number exceeding two hundred and seventy, of whom but seventy-nine souls were saved.

It appears, by the communications received from Canada, that, during the present season, 21,945 emigrants have arrived out by the way of the river, which amount is less by 3000 than the half of that of last year. It is calculated that about 15,000 went by the way of the United States to Upper Canada.

The Montreal Gazette of the 25th November gives a melancholy account of a destructive conflagration, which has reduced a considerable portion of the once flourishing town of Kingston, in Upper Canada, to ashes. The value of the property lost was not then ascertained. Several times within the last year and a half, has the same town been visited with a similar calamity, though not to the same extent.

IRELAND.

BETWIXT popular outrage and political dissension, Ireland is again as much agitated as ever; and it only needs the additional misery of famine and the rigour of winter to fill up the usual scene of popular distress which is almost annually presented to us in that unhappy country. Resistance to the payment of rent as well as tithes is becoming general. In the counties of Limerick, Tipperary, Waterford, Cork, and Kilkenny, outrages of the most bloody description are of daily occurrence. The daily papers have whole columns of paragraphs headed

"Violent Outrage," "Riot and Bloodshed," &c. The coercion bill is virtually a dead letter, and in fact it would appear that the authorities are unwilling to act upon it.

Mr O'Connell and his coadjutors are again more busy than ever agitating for the "repeal of the Union and extinction of tithes"—for they now identify the latter subject of popular outcry with the former question. Mr O'Connell's abuse of the government, and especially Mr Littleton, for whom he has hitherto professed a friendly feeling, is unmeasured. At a recent meeting called for the purpose of getting up petitions for the above objects, he observed, "What advantage is it to us that Lord Anglesea and Stanley have been removed, if they are succeeded by as prosecuting a Lord Wellesley, and as unpopular a Littleton? The change in the cards is valueless! I have not the least confidence in either. I will venture to prophesy, that they will turn out as Anglesea and Stanley did. I prophesied that Anglesea would be the most unpopular man in Ireland, and that prophecy has been fulfilled. There is, however, one step below Lord Anglesea's unpopularity, and I think that Mr Littleton will eventually descend into it."

As if in retaliation for Mr O'Connell's enmity and abuse, the government lately revived a prosecution, instituted some months ago against Mr Barrett, the publisher of the Dublin Pilot, for a libel upon government, contained in a letter written by Mr O'Connell, which appeared in the columns of that paper. Owing to some mismanagement, accidental or wilful, the proceedings were at the time put a stop to, and it was generally supposed that the prosecution had been entirely given up. On Monday, November 18, however, the case was again revived, and notice of trial given for Tuesday the 26th. On that day, accordingly, the case was heard in the Court of King's Bench, Dublin. Besides the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, Mr Sergeant Pennefather, Mr Sergeant Perrin, Mr Holmes, and three other counsel, were retained for the crown. Mr O'Connell, Mr Sheil, Mr Woulfe, Mr Pigott, and Mr O'Dwyer, were counsel for Mr Barrett. A jury of twelve Protestants was sworn; and the defendant having pleaded not guilty, the Attorney-General addressed the jury at considerable length on the nature of the libel, which consisted of the most violent abuse of the coercion act after it had become the law of the land. He quoted some passages from the letter, in which Whitefeet outrages were reprobated in the strongest terms, and stigmatised as "crimes demanding the vengeance of man, and bringing down the punishment of God." He exposed the inconsistency of the letter-writer in protesting against a measure which these very crimes had rendered necessary, and read a number of passages, which he maintained were clearly of a libellous nature and most dangerous tendency. Mr O'Connell then addressed the jury in behalf of Mr Barrett, in a speech which occupied about thirteen columns of the Dublin papers. It consisted chiefly of a tirade against the Whig Ministry, whom he denounced as apostates from their principles, and who, he said, had instituted the present prosecution, not on account of the alleged libel on the coercion act, but for the exposure of their "baseness" which the letter contained. It was, in short, a Cabinet prosecution. It would be in vain, he said, to attempt to put down the cry for the repeal of the Union by such prosecutions as this. He described in glowing colours the prosperity which would flow upon Ireland, should her Parliament once more assemble upon College Green. Mr O'Connell then read the whole of the letter, commenting upon it as he went along, enforcing the opinions it contained, and endeavouring to show that it had not a dangerous tendency, but the reverse. He warned the jury, and men of all parties, that the coercion act might be brought into operation against them any day that the government chose. The man who asserted that the letter was a libel to-day, might be sent to prison himself to-morrow. He quoted the speeches of Chief Justice Bushe and Judge Jebb, then on the bench, and of Lord Plunkett and Mr Saurin, delivered when the Union with England was discussed in the Irish Parliament, and argued that there could be nothing criminal in repeating the substance of those arguments.—From the late hour at which Mr O'Connell concluded, the proceedings were adjourned to next day (Wednesday, 27th), when the Solicitor-General addressed the jury in earnest terms, representing the dangerous tendency of Mr O'Connell's doctrines. It was now little matter, he said, whether Whig or Tory held the reins of government—the time had arrived when the honest, the orderly, and the virtuous of all parties, should unite to stem the tide of radicalism and revolutionary principle, which, if suffered to proceed, would overwhelm all the institutions of the country. He adverted to the agitation of the repeal question. Mr O'Connell had shrunk from the challenge given him in the House of Commons to debate the question, although he complained that the coercion bill was passed for the purpose of stifling its discussion. Let him bring forward the statements he had made here in the House of Commons, and he would find that Mr Stanley and Mr Spring Rice would upset all his calculations of debt and revenue founded upon one-ninths and two-seventenths.

The Chief Justice briefly charged the jury. They were simply to find whether the publication was such as it was described in the indictment, or whether it came within the limits of legitimate discussion.

The jury, after about ten minutes' conversation, returned a verdict of guilty, but strongly recommended the defendant to the merciful consideration of the court. The foreman then offered to explain the reasons for their recommendation, but the judge declined hearing them. Several points saved for the defendant, respecting matters of form, are to be argued next term, until which time Mr Barrett is to be allowed to remain out on his own recognizances.

This prosecution seems to have given general dissatisfaction, in so far as the publisher of the libel, and not the avowed writer of it, was selected as the object of punishment. The circumstances attending its revival, also, are thought to have too much the appearance of revenge for Mr O'Connell's recent proceedings; while it is feared that the measure will only tend to excite popular feeling more than ever in his favour. "It was certainly a very contemptible thing," says the Spectator, "to lay hold of the instrument, because the hand which guided it would either elude their grasp, or deal them a knock-down blow; but the prudent course would have been to let both alone, and to suffer the libel to remain in the obscurity from which none but themselves would have dragged it."

Amid all the miseries of Ireland, it is gratifying to find her manufactures improving. The linen trade is in a very flourishing condition. In the Belfast cotton manufactures, they cannot procure a sufficient number of weavers, and generally throughout the country looms are putting up in all quarters, and the greatest briskness prevails.

Orangeism is said to be making rapid strides in the south, particularly in Waterford. Only a few months ago, such a thing as an Orange lodge was not known in Waterford, and now there are three.

ENGLAND.

CHURCH REFORM.

THE subject of church reform at present occupies public attention to a degree which has not been witnessed, perhaps, since the commencement of the civil war; and there seems every reason to conclude that it will be one of the most prominent matters of debate in the ensuing session of Parliament. At a public dinner in the London Coffeehouse, Dec. 11, Dr Lushington, M.P. for the Tower Hamlets, and intimately connected with administration, stated it to be the intention of the Ministers to take measures for the extinction of tithes, and effect a complete radical reform in the church. The dissenters in various parts of England have, in the meantime, been taking measures for bringing their claims under the notice of the government. A meeting of Independents and Baptists was held at Leeds, Dec. 3, for the purpose of adopting measures to obtain relief from certain grievances under which the dissenting body labours. Resolutions were passed, and a memorial was drawn up, to be presented to Earl Grey, with a request that he would listen favourably to its prayer, and that with his colleagues he would "set himself promptly and vigorously to redress the wrongs" of the Protestant dissenters. The following extracts from the memorial will explain the nature of the claims, and some of the arguments by which they are supported:—

"We cannot think it right that a system of which we do not approve, and whose services we do not attend, instead of relying, as is most natural, on the rich and adequate resources of the members of its own community, should extort support and wring its funds from us, who have our own cause to maintain, and our own wants to supply. Were we to solicit from government the authority to put our hands into the stores of the Episcopalians, and to extort from them the means of supporting our worship, the demand would appear glaringly insolent and extravagant, and expose us to constant and indignant rebuke and condemnation: yet is the practice of which we complain, the tax from which we seek to be relieved, equally unjust and oppressive. From every thing, therefore, in the shape of levies, rates, or taxes, for building the churches, and maintaining the worship of the Episcopalian community in this country, we ask to be forthwith relieved.

"The cemeteries belonging to the respective parishes of the country are public property, and have been provided by rates levied on the inhabitants generally, to which Protestant dissenters have contributed their full proportion. We ask, therefore, that these, which in many instances are the burial-places of our fathers, may be open to us, to bury our dead, in our own way, without being compelled to submit to the ritual of the church of England.

"The universities claim to be national institutions, and owe their existence to the authority, and their means of support in whole or in part to the pecuniary grants of the legislature. We ask access to the privileges to be enjoyed there, and to the honours to be acquired there, without the imposition of oaths which would fetter our consciences, and of forms which militate against our principles.

"The manner of solemnising marriage, now in existence, has proved a grievance; and it requires on our parts a sacrifice of principle, and such a deference to the church of England, as conscience itself disapproves and condemns. We therefore respectfully claim to be released from the necessity of performing this service in a church, and according to a certain ritual; and to be left at liberty to conduct it, so far as the religious part of the ceremony is concerned, in a manner more consonant with our own views."

The memorial also contains a request for a general system for the registration of births. A similar document has been sent from Manchester, and other towns are about to follow the example. The Christian Advocate speaks of desires going considerably beyond the scope of the memorial.

"The dissenters," says that paper, "are determined upon the entire and absolute separation of the church from the state. Nothing less than this will or ought to satisfy them; for, as it is well and correctly said in the address delivered by Mr Binney, on laying the first stone of 'the New King's Weigh House, a place of worship intended for the use of a congregational church,' of which he is the pastor, 'the established church is a great national evil; it is an obstacle to the progress of truth and godliness in the land; it destroys more souls than it saves; and, therefore, its end is most devoutly to be wished by every lover of God and man.' This is the truth, whatever some half-hearted temporising dissenters may say; and we rejoice to know that the principle of religious liberty are beginning to be fully understood, and appreciated throughout the land, in the length and breadth of it. The following aphorism is hourly acquiring vigour and ascendancy in this kingdom:—'As civil affairs, according to the principles of the British constitution, taxation without representation is tyrannical, in religion, compulsory payments to a church in which we conscientiously dissent, is of the nature of persecution; and the exclusive patronage by the state of one sect is injustice.'"

The clergy do not appear insensible to the danger of the establishment. The "growth of latitudinarian sentiments, and the ignorance which prevails concerning the spiritual claims of the church," were lately made the subject of condolence by the clergy of the diocese of Canterbury, in an address to the archbishop; and a meeting was held early in the month at Bristol, for the formation of a church-union composed of the laity and clergy of the deanery, "to co-operate with other associations of the same description in different parts of the kingdom, to withstand all change which involves any denial or suppression of the doctrines of the church of England—a departure from the primitive practice in religious offices, innovations upon the apostolical prerogatives, order and commission of bishops, priests, and deacons."

It is also stated that an address to the primate preparing by the English clergy generally, in which they express their reliance upon him as the champion of the church in this dangerous emergency.

A London paper, which seems to have the power of describing, without passion, existing things and sentiments, has the following remarks:—"The result of the approaching struggle we consider to be no means doubtful. Every thing seems to mal against the church. She has enemies from without and enemies within; the most dangerous of the latter being such men as the Bristol associators, who thrust themselves forward to withstand the impetus of public opinion, thus increasing tenfold the violence of the inevitable shock. It is this which makes the position of the church so perilous. Were her sons discreet and conciliatory, the peculiar advantages which she enjoys over other similar establishments, would enable her to ride through the impending storm with little damage."

CORN LAWS.

THE existing restrictions on the importation of corn seem to be getting daily more obnoxious in the eyes of the people, and the demonstrations of public feeling against them have of late been much increased in warmth, as well as number. In London, Manchester, Sheffield, and other places in England, anti-corn law associations are forming, or formed, for the purpose of diffusing information concerning the alleged pernicious tendency of a restriction on the price of food. In London, the Anti-Corn-Law Association has announced the commencement of a Penny Magazine, as a means of disseminating their views upon the subject.

At a meeting of trades in Edinburgh, November 20, an association was agreed to be formed for the like purpose; and on Thursday, December 19, a public meeting of bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and other traders, was held at Glasgow, at which strong resolutions were passed, condemnatory of the corn laws, and an association to promote their abolition was formed, including the Lord Provost and Magistrates, Mr Oswald, M. P., and other public individuals. Nothing indeed can be more clear than that a very powerful movement has taken place in reference to the corn restrictions, and that not confined to the humbler classes of the people, but including many of those who have a more direct influence in political affairs, and even many of the agriculturists themselves, whose interests have hitherto been supposed to be identified with the continuance of the monopoly.

We noticed in our last that a notification had appeared in one of the Edinburgh newspapers, signifying the conversion of the East Lothian farmers to the abolition of corn restrictions; and we are enabled to state, from personal inquiry, that several of the most extensive agriculturists in the county of Edinburgh now take the same view of the subject.

Under these circumstances, the Ministerial views respecting the corn laws have become matter of deep interest. Upon the whole, from what can be gathered, there seems to be a dread of the question among the Ministers, on account of its being so strongly controverted by two powerful parties in the state, neither of which, perhaps, they are willing to offend. In addressing his constituency at Leeds, Mr Macaulay said, "My theory differs very little from that of Lord Fitzwilliam and Mr Whitmore; but I say that there is this distinction between the corn laws and most other abuses that are oppressive in our institutions—that most of those abuses evidently exist solely for the benefit of the oligarchy, and are opposed to the general sense of the people. Unhappily, as to the corn laws, though this may be the true state of the case, yet, if we examine what is the state of parties, we shall find that there is one great section of the people against another."

He then speculated upon the possibility of getting the abolition carried through the House of Commons, which he thought could only be done by a very narrow majority, if at all. "I do not think the public mind," said he, "ripe for putting this question on a sound footing. It would be towns against country—a certain victory for the agriculturists in the House of Commons—a doubtful contest at a general election—and I not say what would be the effect of violence. It is therefore important to disseminate in every way the information, in order that this great question may soon be ripe for a satisfactory decision; and I most sincerely assure you that nothing would give me greater pleasure than to make any personal sacrifice which would tend to the settlement of this question. But if the only result is to be that we, with our difficulty, get through the Commons a bill which will be defeated in the Lords, I am doubtful whether it would be desirable immediately to push this question to a decision."

Mr P. Thomson, in addressing the electors of Manchester, Dec. 19, expressed nearly the same sentiments. "The question," said he, "stands under peculiar circumstances: upon it the people of England are entirely agreed. Ignorance—for, in my opinion, it is ignorance—makes those who ought to be the best friends of every alteration in the present corn laws. It is a question upon which we should feel—as all here deeply feel—its importance, and ought to strain every nerve to carry some change."

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

Throughout the past month, there have been constant rumours afloat respecting certain contemplated changes in the administration. The most important of these was the immediate resignation of Earl Grey, and his probable successor; one party asserting the premier to be Lord Durham, another Mr. Stanley, according to their own wishes, fears, or wishes. The alleged reason of Earl Grey's retirement is said to be his aversion to the measures of reform, which it is thought there will be an inability to avoid bringing forward in the very first session of Parliament. These reports have latterly died away; but it would appear, from the following paragraph from the Sun newspaper, that they were utterly unfounded:—

"We have reason to believe (says the Sun) that the reports which have been in circulation for the last fortnight, of the probable retirement of Earl Grey, were originally without foundation; but it appears that, on Saturday or Sunday last, some arrangement was made to, by which the noble earl was induced to suspend his determination. The Tories, with their usual levity, have spread a rumour that Lord Grey had quarrelled with some of his colleagues in office, and that his wish for retirement was to be attributed to this circumstance. Never was a statement more unfounded. Although much more liberal than some of his colleagues, Earl Grey knew but too well their influence in a particular quarter; and dreading lest by saying a word of cordiality towards them, he might expose the Cabinet to a chance of dissolution, and bring about the accession of the Tories, he has given way on many occasions to what is called the moderate portion of the Cabinet, and has thus prevented dissension."

MR HILL AND THE IRISH MEMBERS.

A curious matter has lately been brought into notice, which has been the cause of no little commotion in Mr O'Connell's camp, and threatens to redound with any thing but credit to some one or other of the members of Stephen's. Some weeks ago, Mr Hill, member for Hull, in a speech to his constituents, mentioned that one of the Irish members who voted against the coercion bill in Parliament, had in private strongly urged upon masters the necessity of passing it as the only means of securing peace in the country. A Mr Jackson, a Radical of Hull, forthwith communicated this matter to O'Connell, who, of course, immediately took steps to vindicate the characters of his Irish supporters from this formidable accusation. He addressed a long letter to the "Hull Radicals," in which he indignantly repelled the "infamous calumny" of Mr Hill, and retorted upon that gentleman with charges scarcely less heavy; amongst others, that of supporting all the principles of the "brutal and bloody bill." At the same time, as if only half-satisfied of Mr Hill's assertion being an "infamous calumny," he (O'Connell) called upon every Irish member to make a disavowal of the accusation, in order to exculpate himself in the eyes of the public. With this order between twenty and thirty Irish M.P.'s have already complied, by asserting their innocence, and demanding the name of the guilty person from Mr Hill. That gentleman, however, refuses to publish the individual's name, but has given notice in the London papers, "that if any member of Parliament addresses to me a private letter on the subject, he will receive from me an explicit answer, whether he is, or is not, the individual I referred to on that occasion." Mr Hill thus repeats the statement of the face of his denunciations, which he would scarcely have had a firm assurance that the words had been said, and that there was, of course, one Irish member who would not apply to him. But this is not the whole. The industry of the Spectator has discovered an analogous story in the columns of the Durham Advertiser. According to the latter journal, Mr Pease the Quaker, some weeks before Mr Hill made his speech, in justifying his support of the coercion bill to his constituents, said, he was "requested to vote as he did by several Irish members, who wished, but durst not vote for it themselves." The same story indeed was current in the best informed circles in this city; and the Scotsman says, "we are able to state on excellent authority, that a belief prevailed among close and impartial observers in the House of Commons, that O'Connell himself was at bottom desirous that the 'brutal and bloody' bill should pass!" How true this be, can, of course, only be conjectured; but it seems next to impossible, from the proceedings now going on to elucidate the mystery, that the name of the culprit alluded to by Mr Hill can be long concealed, at least after Parliament has met. It may be mentioned, in the meantime, that Mr Hill has proved the charge brought against him by Mr O'Connell, of having supported the coercion bill, to be quite unfounded, as he (Mr Hill) was engaged on the circuit during the whole period of its discussion.

EMIGRATION.

By the recent publication of various Parliamentary papers, many interesting facts respecting the progress of emigration from Great Britain have been elicited; and it will be seen, from what follows, how steadily the human tide continues to roll towards the west, every year increasing in magnitude.

The following table shows the number of persons who have emigrated in the last eight years to North America, the Cape, and Australia:—

Years.	British America.	United States.	Cape of Good Hope.	Australia.	Total.
1825	8,741	5,551	114	485	14,891
1826	12,818	7,063	116	903	20,900
1827	12,648	14,526	114	715	28,003
1828	12,084	12,817	135	1,056	26,092
1829	13,307	15,678	197	2,916	31,198
1830	30,574	24,887	204	1,242	56,907
1831	58,067	23,418	114	1,561	83,160
1832	66,339	32,872	196	3,733	103,140

The general result is, that Britain sent off 103,000 souls from her population last year, of whom a number sailed 7000 miles, a number 14,000, and those who made the shortest voyage 4000 miles. The annals of emigration afford nothing approaching to this in any part of the world.

Of 51,200 emigrants who landed at Quebec and Montreal last year, 17,500 went from England, 23,200 from Ireland, and 5500 from Scotland. In the year 1831, the numbers were, from England 10,300, Ireland 34,100, Scotland 5300.

Of the emigrants from Scotland last year, 1716 sailed from Greenock, 1145 from Leith, 638 from Cromarty, 478 from Aberdeen, 430 from Dundee, 231 from Alloa, 181 from Islay, 175 from Annan, 160 from Glasgow, 112 from Leven, 110 from Campbeltown, and numbers under 100 from Stranraer, Peterhead, and Irvine.

Of the emigrants to the United States last year, 15,754 sailed from Liverpool, 5546 from London, 2742 from Bristol, 2613 from Londonderry, and 1711 from Greenock.

Mr Buchanan, the government agent at Quebec, states in his Report, that "the general description of emigrants who arrived last year, was above the average of preceding years; many respectable and wealthy families came from all parts of the United Kingdom; and the extent of property and specie brought into the country by them is exceedingly great, fully amounting to from £600,000 to £700,000 sterling." About 5000 persons were sent out by pecuniary aid from parishes or landlords; and there were 1700 "commuted pensioners" (military, we believe), many of them men of irregular habits, and ill fitted for the situation of settlers. Of these, about 100 returned to Britain. The fear of cholera was a considerable check to emigration. Mr Buchanan estimates the whole number of emigrants who fell victims to the disease, at no more than 2350.

"The demand for all classes of working people (says the Report) has never been exceeded in the Canadas, particularly since the abatement of the cholera; and I can assure your lordship, that, during my late tour through the districts and settlements of Upper Canada, I did not see an industrious emigrant who could not meet with employment. The number of that class arrived this year is not adequate to supply the demand created by the more wealthy emigrants. This was particularly felt in the Western and London districts of the upper province, where the want of labourers was so great that it was found necessary to encourage a number to come over from Ohio and Pennsylvania." This was written on the 12th December 1832, and the arrival of emigrants closed in October.

Respecting the fact that many individuals from Great Britain have lately been returning from the land of promise to their native soil, in distress and disappointment, we believe the following pertinent remarks on the subject, which we find in the Liverpool Times, explain pretty clearly the reasons of this, besides giving some sound and seasonable advice to intending adventurers. "It is not every one who can benefit himself by crossing the Atlantic, nor are all parts of America equally eligible. The prudence of emigrating at all depends on the kind of labour which a man has to dispose of, and the demand for it in the neighbourhood to which he proceeds. There is great ignorance on these matters among the working classes, and much misery has been the result. Another evil is, that large masses of emigrants direct their course to a few particular points, and thus glut the market. There can be no doubt, nevertheless, from the vast tracts of country which are being every day brought into cultivation, the extensive canals, railways, and common roads which are forming, and the universal spirit of enterprise and improvement which pervades both independent and British America, that employment will be found by most kinds of labourers who act with prudence, and proceed to the right points. There must be for many years an active demand for agricultural labourers, joiners, builders, smiths, and handicraftsmen of various kinds, in most parts of the United States and the Canadas, in which forests are continually being converted into fruitful fields, and the habitations of men are rising in the midst of trackless woods, for ages the abode of wolves and panthers. The great misfortune is, that thousands of emigrants, possessed of only enough to carry them across the Atlantic, are every year landed in the streets of New York and Quebec, without the least means of proceeding into the interior. Now, though those cities are rising rapidly, the state of society in them, and for a number of miles round them, does not differ materially from what exists in Liverpool, or any other flourishing town of Europe; and the inconvenience produced by the influx of ten or twenty thousand labourers, who must have work immediately or starve, is as great as it would be if they landed in this port. In a few months, most of them, it is true, contrive to beg their way into the back settlements, where they soon find work; but those who are too proud to do this, continue lingering about the streets of the large American cities in a state of the utmost wretchedness. Every emigrant, therefore, ought to endeavour, before he quits this country, to scrape together not only enough to pay his passage, but to support him for a few days in America, while he is seeking work. A government plan of emigration, which we hope to see adopted before long, and of which the principle ought to be, to land emigrants at the points where they are most likely to obtain work, or to convey them into the interior, would furnish an effectual remedy for this evil. At present nothing can be done beyond giving advice as to the best mode of proceeding, and this the emigrant office, at Liverpool, would, we are quite certain, give most readily to all who may apply."

MR HUNT AND THE TRUE SUN.

MR HUNT having brought a prosecution against the printer and proprietors of the True Sun for a libel, the cause came to be heard in the Court of Exchequer on Monday, December 2. Mr Hunt conducted the prosecution in person. The libel he complained of appeared in the True Sun of 18th December 1832, and consisted of a paragraph, purporting to be copied from the Liverpool Courier, detailing the particulars of a riot at Preston, and was published as follows:—"RIOT AT PRESTON—(from the Liverpool Courier.)—It appears that Hunt, the late member, pointed to Counsellor Sagar in the mob, and said, 'That is the black sheep.' The mob fell upon and murdered him. In the affray Hunt had his nose cut off. The coroner's inquest has brought in a verdict of wilful murder against Hunt, and he is in custody." To the end of this quotation the editor of the True Sun appended the word "Fudge!" Mr Hunt produced the files of the Liverpool Courier, to prove that no such paragraph had ever appeared in it, and asserted that the whole was a malicious slander manufactured at the True Sun office. He understood, he said, that one of the intended pleas of defence was, that the paragraph was inserted merely for the purpose of giving the statement an unqualified contradiction, and that the word "Fudge" subjoined to it had that effect; but they might as well have put "Finis," or "Figaro," or "Wag," or any other slang term now in vogue. There was no such word in the English language; and he appealed to the dictionaries of Johnson, Walker, Sheridan, Bailey, Ainsworth, and others of established reputation, to prove it. Only one author—Dr Goldsmith—had made use of it, in the Vicar of Wakefield; and how was he (Mr Hunt) to be assured that the readers of the True Sun understood "Fudge" as being a contradiction of the paragraph? or that they were not of the same class as the servants in "High Life Below Stairs," who got into a dispute about the authorship of Shakespeare's plays, when the coachman silenced them all by authoritatively stating that the writer of them was one "Mr Finis," for he had seen his name at the end of the book. Mr Hunt then proceeded to account for the enmity which the True Sun people bore to him. It arose, he said, from his observing, when the Radicals were called upon for a subscription to support the paper, that their establishment was too expensive, not only as regarded the persons employed, but the splendid and costly furniture of the apartments, which he seemed to consider a great scandal to the Radical cause. He thought that an editor, and a "scissors-man to make up the paper," were all that was necessary; and that a small room, like that of Mr Black of the Chronicle, filled with books, the tables covered with papers, with half-a-dozen chairs not worth half-a-crown a-piece, might answer very well for the True Sun. By way of proving the animus of the True Sun, he read a paragraph from the Spectator, which was copied into the True Sun, characterising him as the "poor thing Hunt," who degraded the labouring classes in Parliament by his ignorance, and rejoicing at the election of Cobbett, as "a Radical worth having." (The reading of the paragraph excited roars of laughter in the court, evidently to Mr Hunt's great mortification.) Mr Hunt then called several witnesses to state the meaning they attached to the word "Fudge," the most of whom seemed, or pretended to be, ignorant of its meaning, and one of them even unaware of its existence! This exhibition was at last stopped by the court, as being "too absurd." Mr Humphreys then addressed the jury for Mr Ager, the printer of the True Sun. It was proved that three actions had been already brought for a similar paragraph, against the Globe, the Guardian, and a Liverpool paper. He ridiculed Mr Hunt's fondness for speechmaking, which with him amounted to a disease, and might be termed by his friend Dr Lipscombe, "a determination of words to the mouth." He commented upon the audacity of the assertion that the defendants had written the paragraph themselves, when it had appeared in the Liverpool Journal, though not the Liverpool Courier, four days before. He affirmed that the word "Fudge" was intended to be, and that it was in fact, an emphatic though brief contradiction of the story in the alleged libel. The learned counsel referred to the passage extracted from the Spectator, imputing "ignorance" to Mr Hunt, as being the passage which had really stung him: he would forgive every thing but that. After a lengthened and humorous address, which frequently convulsed the auditors, court and all, with laughter, Mr Humphreys concluded by calling upon the jury to repudiate this shallow attempt to convert the paragraph in question into a libel.

Lord Lyndhurst then charged the jury, who, after ten minutes' deliberation, returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with one farthing damages. The True Sun, however, was burdened with costs, which were very considerable.

The Spectator, in commenting on this trial, recommends Mr Hunt to adopt the word "Fudge," in future, as his motto. "He might write it after his name thus—HENRY HUNT, X.M.P. Fudge!" Let him choose a shield of native brass, not polished, and wear on it a bend sinister, with three blacking-bottles, proper, sable; a tongue couchant—we believe that is the heraldic term for lying—on a scutcheon of pretence; crest, an ass rampant; the motto, "Fudge!"

EXTRAORDINARY CASE OF KIDNAPPING.

A STRANGE instance of this crime, once so disgracefully prevalent in Britain, but which has been long considered obsolete, occurred lately at London, and, from the intended victim being an individual of a highly respectable station in life, the affair has excited no little sensation in the metropolis. On Friday, December 6, the family of Mr John Mills, of the East India Road, Poplar, were thrown into a state of great dismay, by the receipt of a letter from Mr William Mills, one of the sons of the above gentleman, who lately returned from Demerara, stating that he had been trepanned on board the Marquis of Chandos West Indianman, which left the West India Dock on the previous day, by Captain Galor, the commander, who put him into irons, set a guard over him to prevent his escaping, and placed him in confinement in the cabin, with the intention of taking him to the West Indies. The young gentleman implored of his family to lose no time in adopting measures to overtake the ship, which was then under weigh. On receiving this intelligence, Mr Mills immediately dispatched Mr Charles Mills, and Mr Browne, a solicitor, to Dover. There they learned that the ship was detained at Deal by head-winds. The mayor of Dover sent some officers to accompany the gentlemen, with full power to take Mr William Mills out of the ship. The party started for Deal, which they reached at a late hour on Saturday night, and ascertained that the ship was not far off. A boat was engaged, and the boatmen were about to shove off, when, owing to the violence of the wind, the boat was capsized, and all the parties narrowly escaped a watery grave; but owing to the perseverance of the Deal pilots, the boat was righted, and the water baled out. Mr Charles Mills was, however, so much bruised by being thrown on the shingles, that he was obliged to return, and was carried back into the town. Mr Browne and the officers, notwithstanding the boisterous state of the weather, succeeded in reaching the Marquis of Chandos, lying at anchor in the Downs, about twelve o'clock at night, and demanded of the carpenter of the ship, who was keeping watch on deck, to produce Mr William Mills. The carpenter strongly denied that he was on board, and delisted the officers to search the vessel. The party immediately boarded her, and Captain Galor was called: he also denied that Mr William Mills was in the ship; but, observing the determination of the parties to search the vessel, at length agreed to produce the person of whom they were in search, and took them into the cabin, where they found Mr William Mills in a state of mind bordering on frenzy. He had given up all hopes of being released, the pilot having left the vessel several hours previous; and his joy on seeing Mr Browne was unbounded. The following explanation is given of the captain's conduct:—The young gentleman had been engaged in business in Demerara; which not proving successful, he secreted himself on board the Marquis of Chandos, in order to get off to England. He was not discovered till the ship had been out two days. Captain Galor is liable to a heavy fine, according to the law of Demerara, for taking away any person who was not registered as a passenger in the custom-house books; and it was to save himself from this penalty that he contrived to inveigle Mr Mills on board his vessel, and carry him back.

Furzey, the man who was tried and acquitted for stabbing two policemen at the famous Calthorpe Street meeting, has obtained a verdict against the proprietors of the Morning Chronicle, for a libel, damages L.40. The libel was a paragraph which appeared in that paper in June last, saying that he had been identified as the murderer of the unfortunate Cully.

John Bodie, the young man mentioned in our last as being suspected of having poisoned his grandfather, has been tried and acquitted.

The Queen.—The Queen, in all her domestic arrangements and regulations, exhibits a laudable example to all persons of rank and fashion. Her time is never dissipated in frivolous pursuits, but is devoted to usefulness when disengaged from the company that is generally inseparable from the royal station. Throughout the palace, her Majesty inculcates the practice of industry, and deprecates waste, extravagance, and prodigality.—Herald. To this information the Courier adds, that her Majesty's unpretending way of going to chapel at Brighton is not unnoticed by the inhabitants. Her attendance at one of the ordinary chapels, where there is an excellent preacher, is frequent. Her Majesty enters and goes out with not more than two or three attendants, with as little appearance of state as any one of the congregation. Her seat is in a pew in the body of the church, nowise distinguished from those on each side of it. The president of the great republic of America does not appear more unceremoniously in the pew of a Presbyterian chapel at Washington, than the Queen of Great Britain, in even a smaller and more plainly fitted up chapel, at Brighton.

Lord Althorp has addressed an official circular to the churchwardens of the various parishes throughout the kingdom, requesting them to forward to him, without delay, all the information they possess, or can procure, respecting the value, ownership, &c. of tithes in their district. This is supposed to be preparatory to the introduction of a new tithe bill, next session of Parliament.

The Lord Chancellor, it is said, has addressed letters to the managers of all the public charities in England, ordering returns of the nature of their foundations, state of funds, &c., with the view of consolidating the whole into a general fund for the purpose of national education.

A report is prevalent that the King intends creating three Irish dukes, and that the following noblemen are to be raised in the peerage—Marquis Wellesley, as Duke of Dublin; the Marquis of Lansdowne, as Duke of Kerry; and Earl Fitzwilliam, as Duke of Rockingham.—Morning Herald.

Sir Josias Rowley is about to proceed to the Mediterranean, as commander-in-chief of the British fleet on that station, in the room of Sir Pulteney Malcolm, who is coming home.

Lord Napier has received the valuable appointment as governor at Canton, in China, fixed by the legislative arrangements of last session of Parliament. The salary is L.6000 per annum.

We are enabled to announce that the appointment of the Marquis of Sligo as the successor of the Earl of Mulgrave at Jamaica, has taken place.—Morning Post.

Mr Thomas Babington Macaulay has just received the appointment of Counsellor in India, with a salary of L.10,000, and is to receive L.12,000 in advance as outfit. This is a new office created under the recent act of Parliament, and is termed a judicial counsellorship, being in addition to two civil counsellorships with the same salary, previously established. The duties of the new counsellor are to be exclusively legislative, and entirely disjoined from the executive branch of the government. The nomination of the members of the executive and legislative government of India—besides embracing the "grand prizes"—is the only branch of the Indian patronage directly exercised by the home authorities, and for the most part virtually by his Majesty's Ministers. The appointment of Mr Macaulay has excited great dissatisfaction amongst the "Liberals," who denounce it as another instance of the rapacious and pecuniary disposition of the Whigs. The Spectator newspaper concludes some severe comments on this "arbitrary job," as it terms it, with the following remarks:—"In any case, the honourable gentleman must be looked upon as one of the most fortunate of politicians and Whigs—even in these fortunate days of Whiggery. In three short years he has advanced from a Commissionership of Bankruptcy and L.300 a-year, to the honours of Holland House—to those of Lansdowne House—to the pocket borough of Calne—to a membership of the Indian Board—to the Secretaryship of the Indian Board—to the representation of the town of Leeds—and finally, to being the successor of the Indian demigod and lawgiver Menu, with L.10,000 a-year, which the poor demigod never enjoyed."

The appointment of Mr Macaulay as a counsellor of India having created a vacancy in the representation of Leeds, active exertions are making by the different political factions in that town to procure the election of one of their "persuasion." Mr Sadler is of course the favourite of the Tories, who are as usual certain of success. Mr Blackburne is canvassing the "independent" interest, and a host of names are talked of on the part of the Whigs. At a recent meeting of the electors, an almost unanimous requisition was signed, calling on Mr Baines, editor and proprietor of the Leeds Mercury, to become a candidate.

The Duke of Wellington has earnestly recommended the institution of temperance societies in the army.

Dec. 12. The Court of Common Council of London unanimously repealed the standing order requiring the members of the court to be elected by ballot.—This day, the meeting of Parliament was farther prorogued, with the usual ceremony in the House of Lords, to the 4th February, when it will meet for the dispatch of business.

The Bank of England has voluntarily published the average state of its accounts from April to December, although not required by law to do so until August next. From this document it appears that the circulation of bank notes ranges, from April 3, 1832, to December 3, 1833, a period of 22 months, from 18 to 19 millions and a half, while the deposits have increased from L.8,696,000 to L.12,415,000, nearly one-third. The total of liabilities on the 3d of December were, circulation L.18,659,000, deposits L.12,415,000; total L.31,074,000. The assets to meet these are, securities L.23,160,000, bullion L.10,134,000; total L.33,294,000.

There are said to be negotiations on foot between the Bank of England and some of the large joint-stock banks in the country, for circulating the notes of the former preferably to making issues of local notes by those banks.

The only obstacle is the settlement of the rate of interest at which such notes are to be issued. The banks are willing to pay 2½, while the Bank of England demands 3 per cent; but as the former are resolute in their determination, it is thought likely that the directors, who are most anxious to make their notes the universal circulation of the country, will yield the point. It is said that one of the first measures which will be introduced into Parliament by Ministers, in the ensuing session, will be a bill for the amendment of the regulation.

The Army—Expenditure.—A royal commission has issued, appointing the Duke of Richmond, Lord Russell, Mr Ellice, Sir James Kempt, and General Robert Dundas, members of a board to consider means of consolidating the offices of secretary at the master-general of the ordnance, paymaster of the force, and also the commissariat-office at the Treasury, so as to lessen their cost, and augment their efficiency. Sir J. Bisset is secretary to this board. Reductions in the number of troops are also mentioned as likely to be made, and, in the meantime, orders have been issued to suspend recruiting for the king's forces, preparatory to bringing each regiment fifty men below its complement, as was the case in 1828, 1829, and 1830; by which a reduction of several thousand men will be effected without difficulty or expense.

Joint-stock banking establishments are on the increase in all parts of the kingdom, and in most instances exhibit decisive proofs of prosperity.

A company has been just established to run stage-coaches in various parts of England. The capital of the company exceeds L.300,000. They have ordered 10 coaches to be built at Birmingham, and six at Maudslayi.

Dec. 16. The anniversary meeting of the Smith Prize Cattle Club was held, Lord Althorp in the chair. The Duke of Richmond, Lord Huntingfield, and a numerous assembly of agriculturists from nearly every county in England, and many also from Scotland, were present. The prizes were distributed by Lord Althorp. The show of cattle was uncommonly fine, and very well attended.

Deccan Prize Money.—This affair, notices about which have appeared like periodical apparitions in the newspapers for the last fifteen years, has, it seems, at last been adjusted—a circumstance for which the reading public we dare say, will be as thankful as some of the misers of the prize themselves. The London Gazette, December 20, contains a scale of the distributions of money amongst the forces engaged in the Pindaree and Mahratta war, under the Marquis of Hastings, in 1818, as follows:—Commander-in-chief, L.30,987, 6s.; lieutenant-general, L.1370, 4s. 3d.; major-generals, brigadier-generals, L.1027, 13s. 2d.; colonels, L.1s. 3d.; lieutenant-colonels, L.246, 12s. 9d.; majors, superintending surgeons, L.164, 8s. 6d.; captains, surgeons, and paymasters, L.82, 4s. 3d.; subalterns, assistant-surgeons, and regimental quartermasters, L.41, 13d.; troop quartermasters, company's riding-master, provost marshals, and conductors, L.10, 5s. 6d.; staff and park sergeants, sub-assistant-surgeons, dressers, sub-conductors, L.2, 1s. 1d.; sergeants, L.1, 7s. 5d.; corporals, English farriers, trumpeters, and privates, 13s. 8d. The native troops receive from L.5, 9s. 1d. to 9s. 1d. each.

The sum of L.125,000 has been awarded to Admiral Napier's fleet as prize-money for the capture of the Guelite fleet.

Paganini, it is said, has left this country a gainer of less a sum than L.27,000 by his extraordinary performances. It has been estimated by one of his brother players in this country, that he has received L.200 for every hour of his performances.

The Earl of Lonsdale has, at his own expense, supplied the town of Whitehaven with water, and erected public fountains for the use of the inhabitants.

A subscription has been commenced for the purpose of erecting a tablet to the memory of the late Hannah More, and also for the establishment of a school to bear her name, at Bristol, to the endowment of which she bequeathed the residue of her estate. Nearly L.4000 have been already subscribed.

Law of Libel.—The following statement, made at a recent meeting of newsvenders in London, furnishes a striking exemplification of the operation of the law of libel in England:—In September 1832, a paragraph appeared in the Satirist newspaper, reflecting on the character of an attorney of the name of Dicus, who brought an action against the proprietors of that paper, and recovered L.300 damages, with costs. In June 1833, the same individual brought another action for the same libel, against a newsvender of the name of Warne, who had sold a copy of the paper in the usual course of his trade. The plaintiff obtained a verdict of L.10 damages; but the costs, which are added, amounted to no less than L.6. The same plaintiff brought another action against another newsvender named Goldwin, for precisely the same thing; which action was tried at the last assizes at Croydon, when the plaintiff recovered a second verdict, with L.5 damages and L.85 costs. He has since served notices of trial on several other newsvenders; and it is stated that he has no fewer than eighty-four actions in preparation!

An extraordinary abstraction of 1000 sovereigns has recently been made from a box containing L.20,000 notes and gold, sent from the Navy Pay-Office in London to their pay-clerks at Plymouth by the mail-coach. The gentlemen at Plymouth having given a receipt for the full amount, have been made to pay the loss, though it is fully believed that the theft was made before the box left Somerset House.—Hampshire Telegraph.

A dividend of five and a quarter per cent. on East India stock, for the half year ending 5th of January, has been declared at the quarterly court of the proprietors, held on Wednesday at the India House.

The city of York subscription for the Wilberforce Testimonial amounts to nearly L.1100; and the subscription at Halifax to L.300.

30. An attack was made upon Mr Egerton Smith, publisher of the Liverpool Mercury, with the intention of assassinating him. A gentleman was shown into his room, who, after bolting the door, described himself as the individual who had lately been advertising for a wife, and complained in a furious manner of several offensive allusions to him in the Mercury. When he drew forth a pistol, when Mr Smith closed with him, and assistance being obtained, he was secured. A pistol, as well as another found on him, was loaded with ball. His name is De Bruin, and he is believed to be a Dane.—This day (St Andrew's day) the annual anniversary dinner of the London Scottish Hospital was celebrated at the London Tavern, Sir L. Shadwell (in the presence of the Duke of Gordon, president) in the evening. From the report read by the secretary, it appeared that at the institution, established in the time of James the First, and chartered by Charles the Second, steadily increases in usefulness. During the last year, not less than two hundred and fifty Scotchmen were relieved, and a hundred and forty sent back to their native country. The total population of Liverpool is estimated at 207,474, of whom 62,051 are Roman Catholics.

1. A vendianism is again becoming very prevalent in various districts of England. In the western part of Northamptonshire most destructive fires lately took place in the space of a fortnight, and they are occurring almost daily throughout the south-western counties. One incendiary was executed at Cambridge, December 1st, who made a full confession of his various diabolical acts by which it appeared that he had, with his own hands, destroyed property to the amount of £60,000, his motive being the paltry 6s. 6d. which he received for giving notice to the fire-office. His mode of perpetrating the deed was by rolling some combustible timber in quantity of linen, which, at a favourable opportunity, he inserted in the stacks.

2. A young man, named Thorley, murdered a respectable young woman at Leftwich, near Northwich, in whom he had been long intimate, by cutting her throat almost before her mother's eyes. He then deliberately changed his bloody clothes, walked to Chester, and surrendered himself to the jailor.

A New York paper says, there is now confined in the city's prison in this city, a gentleman (Rowland Steenson), who, less than five years ago, figured splendidly among the private bankers of London. He is condemned for a debt of 80,000 dollars, at the suit of a former partner (Parkins) of London, who is also an inmate of the same prison, on executions for several large amounts. The banker is dependent upon charity for his food. What are the vicissitudes of fortune!

DISASTERS AT SEA.

A variable and tempestuous weather which has prevailed seemingly over the whole British hemisphere for several weeks, has left its usual record of death and disaster behind it. The accounts from almost every part of the western coast are most distressing. In and around Liverpool the hurricane appears to have been uncommonly severe, and attended with many fatal results. On Wednesday, Nov. 27, the chain of one of the anchors of the floating-light-ship off Liverpool having snapped, the vessel got herself and the hulk towed into harbour, and, afraid to trust their safety in such a hurricane to the remaining chain and anchor. During the night, the ship, Blaney steam-boat, on her voyage from Belfast, endeavouring to make for the harbour, is supposed to have gone off her course, and run for Ayr Point (the west entrance of the Dee), mistaking it for the floating-light off Liverpool. The consequence was, she ran on the banks and went to pieces, when every individual on board, amounting in all to forty-seven, perished. The only living thing that escaped, indeed, a poor pig, of which there were upwards of 600 on board—the owners of them, dealers in these animals, constituting the greatest number of the passengers. The cabin passenger was a Mr Purden, of Newry.

On the following night, a pilot-boat, the Good Intent, on board a number of the pilots employed in taking the vessels out during the week, was wrecked at Colly, on the Lancashire shore, about thirteen miles from Liverpool, when thirteen, out of a crew of twenty-two, were drowned. It is supposed to have been on either of the above two nights that the sloop Enterprise of Kirkcubright, which sailed from that port for Liverpool on the 25th, was lost; nothing having since been heard of her, unless that her boat was drifted ashore on the Preston sands on the 4th December. There were nine individuals on board.

The Dumfries Courier (Dec. 25) contains an account of the loss of the schooner Clyde of Bristol, upon the Isle of Fleet, off Gatehouse harbour, on the 18th December, the captain of which was drowned.

In addition to these, there are innumerable other accounts of individual accidents, boats upset or swamped, persons swept away in rivers, &c., from almost all parts of the north and west coasts.

STRAY FACTS.

Whale Trade of America.—It is computed that in the United States there are about 800 whale ships, employing 10,000 men, and bringing home every three and one-half years 227,960 barrels of oil, worth about 4,000,000 dollars. The outfit for each ship for two years and a half cruise is estimated at from 15,000 to 20,000 dollars.

In all France, during the year 1831, only twenty-five persons were executed, of whom 23 had been convicted of murder. The same year in England alone, the number executed was 52, of whom 12 had been convicted of murder. Hence in France only two, but in England twenty, a vastly smaller population—no fewer than forty, extensive of murderers, died by the hand of the executioner.

There are upwards of 300,000 tons white salt, and 500,000 tons rock salt, shipped from Liverpool in the course of the year, which, according to the lowest average computation, will amount to at least £200,000 annually.

It is believed that an individual can at this moment produce about 200 times the quantity of cotton goods, by means of the improved machinery now in use, than an individual could have produced at the accession of George III. in 1760.

The term Martinet, which is used to denote a strict disciplinarian, is of French origin. In fact, an officer of that name was employed by Louis XIV. in the campaign of Holland to discipline the infantry, and the regulations which he established are still preserved. The introduction of the bayonet is owing to him, as is also the invention of pontoons.

The introduction of the progress of bleaching by chlorine has added largely to the supply of materials for paper-making; for not only the waste of our cotton factories, but even the worn-out bags in which cotton is imported, are now made to serve the same purpose as linen rags; so that neither the loss of the continental rags, in which the Americans outbid us, nor the daily increasing consumption of paper, have occasioned any increase of its price. It is not only of superior quality, but 50 per cent. lower than it was twenty-five years ago.

SCOTLAND.

THE SCOTTISH CHURCH.

It appears from a paper recently laid before the Town Council of Edinburgh, that, when the salaries of the clergy and the interest of the value of the churches are united, there is a loss upon every church, ranging from £69 to £1519, and amounting in the aggregate to £12,300, or nearly one thousand pounds each at an average. The total number of worshippers is 9218, out of a population which, in reference to this subject, cannot be calculated at less than 80,000. The seats unlet are 4815. In the churches served by two clergymen, the unlet seats are to those let as five to four. In the Tron Church, the cure of souls is conducted at an expense to the community of six guineas for each worshipper. The expense for providing clergy alone is at the rate of 4s. 9d. for each individual in the whole population, while in Glasgow it is only 1s. 0½d.

From a separate document, it appears that, while the sittings in established churches in and about Edinburgh amount to 18,850, of which about a third are unlet, those in dissenting and other voluntary places of worship are 46,940, nearly all of which must be let, as such places of worship are only built when there is a necessity for them.

At a recent meeting of the Glasgow Town Council, a resolution was "tabled," to the effect that the Magistrates and Council surrender their right of patronage of the city churches into the hands of the communicants, on condition that the latter pay ministers' stipends, and other expenses of worship, with a reasonable rent for the use of the buildings; and another, that Parliament be petitioned to abrogate the all-endowment connections betwixt church and state, and apply the funds now dedicated to their support to secular national purposes.

The Perth magistracy have resolved, that, on all future vacancies which may occur in the churches of that town, they will appoint no candidate who has not two-thirds of the votes of the communicants in his favour, reserving to themselves the right of selection, should there be two or more candidates with an equal number of votes.

CENTENARY OF THE SECESSION CHURCH.

On Tuesday (Dec. 10), the members of the Secession Church in Edinburgh celebrated the centenary of the foundation of their church by a public dinner in the Waterloo Rooms; Doctor Brown, of the Broughton Street chapel, in the chair, supported by Dr Jameson, and Dr Wardlaw of Glasgow. About 400 individuals were assembled on the occasion. In introducing the appropriate toast of the evening, the Chairman took a review of the principles of the original Seceders, who never contemplated a permanent disunion from the church of Scotland, but only until the necessary reforms should be effected in her. But, after 100 years had elapsed, such a prospect seemed more distant than ever. There was a prospect, however, of the Secession being brought to an honourable termination in another way—namely, by the dissolution of the national establishment; and if this was not effected by the wise and wary hand of legislation, "there was reason to believe that it would soon be fiercely torn asunder by the reckless hand of tumultuary violence." He stated in the course of his speech that the Secession Church at present numbered more than 400 congregations in this country, and included besides a large body in Ireland and America, by far the greater part owning the ecclesiastical authority of the United Associate Synod. After expressing a hope that all sectarian titles and distinctions amongst them would speedily merge in the denomination of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, the Rev. Doctor concluded with the toast—"The Secession, and may it last as long as there was any need for it, and no longer." Dr John Ritchie (Potterrow chapel) proposed the memory of the four founders of the Secession Church—Wilson, Erskine, Moncrieff, and Fisher—upon whom he passed a high eulogium. He said the question now came to be this, whether the established church was to continue to be upheld at the expense of every body but that establishment, or whether it was to be levelled to the ground for the benefit of every body, and more particularly for the benefit of those within it? For his own part, he felt as certain as that he then stood in his place, that the established churches of the three kingdoms would soon be swept away.—The Rev. Mr McGilchrist (Rose Street chapel), in proposing "The British empire, and may its government ever be regulated with due regard to the pre-eminent rights of conscience, and the religious freedom of all the citizens," congratulated his brethren that "regenerated France had started from her lethargy to join her elder sister Britain in the same bright career of religion and morality, fulfilling the universal reign of truth, when the earth should become one grand temple of knowledge, of social order, of happiness, piety, and virtue."—Many other toasts were drunk, and the meeting separated at a late hour.

The Secession Centenary has been celebrated in a similar manner in various other towns in Scotland.

Nov. 26. A very numerous and respectable meeting held in St Andrew's Church, Edinburgh, for the purpose of expressing sympathy for the fate of the Poles, and adopting means to relieve them—the Lord Provost in the chair. The meeting was addressed by Mr Cunningham and Mr J. S. More, advocates, Dr Huie, and others; and resolutions were passed for distributing subscription papers, and otherwise craving contributions to the funds of the Edinburgh Association in behalf of the Poles.—The Polish exiles in France have struck a medal in honour of our countryman, Mr Cutlar Ferguson, for his persevering and eloquent advocacy of their cause in the British Parliament.

—27. A sumptuous dinner was this day given to Sir John Hope, Bart. of Pinkie, colonel of the Mid-Lothian yeomanry, by the officers and privates of the corps, when a splendid piece of plate, value 200 guineas, was presented to him. Upwards of 100 noblemen and gentlemen were present as guests.

—30. An hospital for the maintenance and education of the sons of respectable teachers and farmers was this day opened at Louisville, near Duddingston, by the admission of eighteen boys. This establishment has been instituted upon the bequest of the late Mr Louis Cauvin, originally a teacher of French in Edinburgh, but latterly an agriculturist at Louisville, who left the bulk of his large fortune for this benevolent purpose.

Dec. 1. Lord Arbutnot was re-elected Lord Rector of University and King's Colleges, Aberdeen, for the ensuing year.

—2. Lady Saloun's beautiful cottage, near Inverness, was destroyed by fire. Some of the most valuable of the moveables, including her ladyship's jewels, some money, the plate, family pictures, and books, were preserved.

3. A numerous public meeting of the Society for the Abolition of Church Patronage, and others interested in that object, was held in the Waterloo Hotel, for the purpose of petitioning both Houses of Parliament, praying for the total abolition of the present system of patronage in the Church of Scotland. Among the gentlemen on the platform were Mr George Sinclair, M.P.; Mr A. Johnston, M.P.; Mr Colquhoun, M.P.; the Rev. Dr M'Crie; the Provost of Leith; Sir Wm. Seton, Bart.; Mr A. Dunlop, advocate; Rev. H. Grey; Rev. Dr Muirhead, &c. A large number of ladies were present. Mr Sinclair, M.P., was called to the chair, and addressed the meeting in a long speech, in which he depicted the evils of patronage in strong colours, and represented it as being most detrimental to the interests of the established church, which he would be sorry to see swept away, but would prefer that alteration to the continuance of patronage. Mr A. Johnston, Mr Colquhoun, Sir William Seton, and Mr Tennent, respectively addressed the meeting in moving the various resolutions—to petition both houses of Parliament to abolish the grievance of patronage—to call on town parishes and presbyteries throughout Scotland to co-operate in this object, &c. Towards the conclusion, Dr M'Crie addressed the meeting at some length, and was received with much applause. He said he was obliged to condemn his brethren of the Secession, who had receded from the good ground which their fathers had taken up; and who, instead of seeking the reformation, were wishing and endeavouring to effect the downfall of the establishment. He considered the church of Scotland as the church of the people of Scotland. The reverend Doctor quoted the act confirming presbytery in Scotland, and contended that, whenever it ceased to be the general religion of this land, its Parliamentary principle will be gone, and it would soon be removed. He was a warm friend to the church of Scotland; but he did not mean that church with which the chairman was connected, or the church of which he was himself a member—he meant the reformed constitution of the church of Scotland.

21. The Court of Session rose for the Christmas recess, and sits again on the 14th of January. The box-day is the 4th of January.

The autumn meeting of the Caledonian Hunt, year 1834, is appointed to be held at Dumfries. The Earl of Haddington is president, and J. J. Hope Johnstone, Esq. of Annandale, is treasurer of the hunt for 1834.

The Board of Stamps have agreed that spoiled stamps are to be taken in by the distributors in Glasgow, and sent periodically to the head office at Edinburgh, and, on their being found correct, other stamps will be issued for them in Glasgow.

We mentioned in our last, that a keen competition had this year taken place among the Glasgow students respecting the choice of a rector, and that equal votes had been given for Solicitor-General Cockburn, and Sir Daniel K. Sandford, Professor of Greek. Mr Cockburn subsequently gave the casting vote in his own favour (as rector pro tem), and explained his reasons in a published letter to be—1st, That, by the statute, no professor is eligible as rector or principal of the college in which he holds his professorship; and 2dly, That his sense of duty to the Glasgow College would not allow him to bring on another disputed election, or the risk of the rectorship standing vacant till next year. He has, accordingly, been re-installed.

Louis Phillip, King of France, has recently written to Doctor Chalmers, for the purpose of being supplied with the plans of education which have proved so eminently successful in Scotland, and also with the best methods of conveying Scriptural knowledge to his people.

The Phenakistiscope, or Magic Disc.—An exceedingly ingenious toy with this name has recently been invented upon the Continent, and introduced into Edinburgh by Mr Dun, optician, and Messrs Forrester and Nichol, lithographers. Those who have not had the pleasure of seeing this curious instrument can hardly form a conception of its character. It consists of a circular piece of card attached by a hole in its centre to an appropriate axle and handle. On the outer edge of the card are drawn, we shall suppose, a series of figures of men all in the act of leaping, but no figure is exactly in the same attitude. One is standing as if resolving to leap, the next is bending himself as if going to set off, the next again is in the air, and the next is landing. Above these figures, all round the card, are small slits or holes, and if the eye of the spectator look through one of these holes, whirling the card round with the hand at the same time with its figured side towards a mirror, he will, by the rapid motion, see represented in the glass the whole of the figures, as if in actual individual motion. Correctly speaking, the rapid motion blends the attitude of one figure with another, and hence the delusion. By the same principle, drawings of machinery on the disc will appear as if in motion, which may possibly lead to the practice of superseding the use of models; and, in fact, we know scarce any kind of change the representation of which is beyond its reach. We express with readiness the pleasure we experienced from an inspection of the representations got up by the gentlemen who introduced it into Edinburgh. If the giver of Christmas or New-Year presents desire to present what will delight the young mind, strongly excite its curiosity, and awaken its powers of invention, let the phenakistiscope be that present.

REACTIONS.

PUBLIC opinion, ever since it first came into prominence two centuries ago, has been found liable to those strange oscillations, which, in modern political phraseology, are styled reactions.

The first display of public opinion upon a considerable scale, was certainly that which took place in the reign of Charles the First, for the restriction of the royal prerogative and the humiliation of the established church. It slowly rose during the two preceding reigns, and might indeed be considered as a natural consequence of the impulse given to the minds of men at the Reformation. It was only, however, against the government of King Charles that it assumed a decided and important character. It is hardly necessary to remind the reader that the current flowed in one way till it had overthrown the king, the aristocracy, and the church, and surrendered the liberties of three nations into the hands of a military adventurer. On finding all their well-remembered struggles end in this way, the people began to think that the pursuit of liberty was not so safe or satisfactory a course as they had previously supposed, and, being unable to determine upon any mid-way, they were not contented till they had once more thrown themselves at the feet of an unrestrained king and a dominant clergy. Under Charles the Second, and his brother James the Second, they continued to be satisfied with what they had formerly raised a civil war to destroy, till the attempts of the latter monarch to restore the Catholic religion caused the Revolution of 1688. This, so far as politics were concerned, might be described as the second and lesser oscillation of the pendulum. The people were not so much disgusted with monarchy as to wish for its abolition, which they had done before; they only desired that it should be fixed within comparatively moderate limits. In respect of religion, it was almost as violent an oscillation as possible. The people had been so much alarmed by the prospect of a revival of Catholicism, that, for a century and a half after, they feared to allow common privileges to the small portion of the nation who professed that faith.

The reaction for moderate monarchy did not long continue in a firm state after the Revolution: it split into two parties, one of which, including the dissenters from the church, supported the new government with great zeal, while the other, including the more zealous party of churchmen, clamoured for the restoration of hereditary and unconditional monarchy. At a time during Queen Anne's reign, the reaction for hereditary monarchy was so very powerful as to threaten the other with defeat and extinction; however, the accession of the Brunswick family in 1714, and their Whig administrations, restored the balance in favour of the latter, which maintained its ascendancy till the commencement of the reign of George the Third. The dread of a return of the Stuarts and of the Catholic faith was what kept the people attached to this reaction; and the termination of all feuds on that score, by the suppression of the rebellion of 1745, was what set them once more free. Up to that period, the Brunswick sovereigns had been compelled to govern with a steady regard to popular feeling, on account of the still existing rivalry of the exiled Stuarts. But it is amazing how soon after 1745 the rulers began to take more upon them, and the government to clamour against encroachments, or in favour of ameliorations. So far back as 1753, the publications of the day will be found to contain schemes for a reform of the representative part of the legislature, very little different from those which have recently occupied public attention. About this period, too, commenced those struggles at certain open elections, between the ministerial and popular influences, which, till the reform bill, constituted a kind of standard for measuring the democratic strength. With George the Third in 1760 came an entirely Tory system—either an avowedly Tory administration, or an administration operated upon in secret by the king and his personal friends, all of whom were of that complexion of politics. During the first thirty years of this reign, the spirit of liberalism increased in strength, though never to a degree sufficient to overthrow the Tory oligarchy in whom the state power resided. It received a strong impulse from the early events of the French revolution, but was quickly checked by the lamentable violences in which that transaction ended. Under a fear for all institutions and property, and even for life itself—the most powerful of passions—a reaction then took place, throughout almost the whole of the national mind, against the reforming party; and it was not till twenty years of disastrous war, and six hundred millions of additional debt, had stilled those alarms, that the current of public feeling took any decided turn. This was one of the most remarkable flows of the national mind in one direction, that had ever taken place. The defence of king, country, and church, formed one object, for which all classes of the community fought alike heartily; and not only was liberalism thrown into the shade, but any individual of the middle or lower ranks who professed such sentiments, was apt, when the people were rejoicing for a victory, to experience personal maltreatment. The sentiments of former patriots were looked back to as dreams, or if they were allowed a theoretic value, it was affirmed that to moot them at present was not expedient. In reality, during part of this reaction, what had before and has since been looked upon as only a fair expression of opinion, was held up as sedition and treason, and caused several individuals to be subjected to severe punishments.

Since the conclusion, again, of this war, another reaction has taken place. Men now declaim against the contest as one that tended to repress the best interests of the community; and the blame of that to which all, or nearly all, consented, is thrown exclusively upon the party of rulers and legislators who are most immediately concerned in setting it agoing. What is still more strange, men of all ages unite in reprobating it: the old, who commenced it, wonder how such a thing should have ever been done; and the young, who only know it by its expenses, wonder how the last generation, after committing such a mischievous absurdity, can look the present in the face. In fact, so entirely has public feeling been altered, that we are now proceeding in the very course which it lately cost us so much fighting to stay; we are now most nearly allied to that very nation with which we were then at enmity, while those nations which were then our allies are now the least likely to remain so.

As we are now in the midst of a liberal reaction, it is to be supposed that nearly the whole community are convinced that liberalism is the only right kind of politics. What a strange view does it afford, of the instability of popular sentiment, that, only forty years ago, it was supposed by an equally overpowering majority to be the wrong kind—that, from sixty to a hundred years ago, it was supposed to be the right kind, about a hundred and fifty years ago to be the wrong kind, and two hundred years ago to be the right kind again! One might, from this, be almost tempted to argue that popular sentiment was a thing altogether delusive. In reality, it is not so. The oscillation is just a natural result of the freedom of opinion enjoyed by this community, and of the influence which that opinion exercises upon public affairs. At one time we have the set of opinions of one party triumphant; at another time we have the other. Each of them, when dominant, is impelled by opposition to go to its utmost extreme; this produces damage and error; the people become disgusted, even with what was formerly their idol, and the contrary system is then brought into action and into popularity. When this, in its turn, has run its course, and degenerated into wrong, the other is restored. The mood of the public mind, in either case, is just like certain diseases of the body, which must run to a certain point in severity before a cure can be effected. It is evidently, however, the extreme of the one system of doctrines which always brings on the other. The tyranny of Charles I.—the anarchy at the end of the Commonwealth—the liberties taken by James II. with religion—the late tremendous war for putting down liberalism—have all been causes of this kind, and their effects have been most decided. It might be an interesting question for discussion, whether the pendulum is likely ever to come to any thing like a settlement—whether, after all kinds and degrees of doctrines have been tried, any set might be fixed upon for regular and continuous practice. We suspect that no such result will take place so long as communities remain in any thing like their present state. The inequalities of the condition of various classes of men, both in point of goods and intelligence, appear to us as effectual obstacles to the settlement of a point where co-sentaneousness of feeling, as well as an unanimity of opinion, is evidently so necessary. In all probability, then, we shall go on oscillating in this fashion for centuries; sometimes idolising the pleasing idea of universal freedom; at others prostrating ourselves before the notion of a just and salutary constraint upon the licentious tendencies of a weak and deficient human nature.

Foreign History.

FRANCE.

THE session of the two Chambers was opened on the 23d December, by the king in person, who went to the Chamber of Deputies, accompanied by most of his family and great officers. His majesty commenced as follows:—"Peers and Deputies—Gentlemen—The tranquillity of France has not been disturbed since your last session. It is in the enjoyment of the blessings of order and peace. In order to render them lasting, we shall persevere with energy and patience in the same system. An unceasing vigilance is still necessary; insensate passions and culpable manoeuvres are at work to undermine the foundations of social order. We will oppose to them your loyal concurrence, the firmness of the magistrates, the activity of the administration, the courage and patriotism of the national guard and of the army; the wisdom of the nation, enlightened as to the danger of the illusions which those who attack liberty, in pretending to defend it, seek still to propagate; and we shall insure the triumph of constitutional order and our progress in civilization. It is thus, gentlemen, that we shall at length put an end to revolution, and that we shall fulfil the wishes of France. I thank her for the support she has given me; I thank her for the tokens of confidence and affection with which she has surrounded me. I received them with emotion in such of the provinces as I have been able to visit, and I render thanks to Providence for the blessings which our country already enjoys, and for those which the future promises." The speech proceeded to allude to the new law of customs, which it hoped "will reconcile the protection due to industry with those principles of prudent freedom which enlightened governments are disposed to admit." His majesty announced an amelioration in the state of the finances of the country, as well as various projects of law for general improvement. He stated that the dispositions of foreign powers towards France promise the preservation of general peace. The affairs of Portugal and Spain were briefly alluded to, and the suppression of the insurrection in the latter country anticipated; at all events, it was remarked, the French frontier is protected by the corps of observation. A strong hope was declared that France, "continuing to be intimately united with Great Britain," a settlement of the affairs of Belgium will be effected without any interruption to the tranquillity of Europe. The state of Turkey is briefly referred to, and an assurance is given that the French government will continue to watch over the preservation of peace in that country.—The king of the French is stated to have been well received on his way to the Chamber, and cordially greeted by the members of the legislature.

The Chamber of Deputies re-elected M. Dupin its president, and Messrs de Schonen, Benjamin Delessert, Etienne, and Beranger, its vice-presidents, as before; which indicated, at the very first, that the system pursued in the last session is to continue during the present. Against 220 votes for M. Dupin, there were only 40 for Lafayette, and smaller numbers for one or two other republicans.

Public attention was much excited about the end of December and beginning of January, by the fitting out of a naval armament in Toulon, which, with the reinforced British fleet in the Mediterranean, was expected to proceed to the Dardanelles, for the purpose of checking the proceedings of Russia in regard to Turkey. It was rumoured that the Russian ambassador would express his resentment of this measure by not offering the king the usual new-year congratulations. M. Pozzo di Borgo, however, formed the head and spokesman of the diplomatic body in this affair of courtesy.

In the course of discussion in the Chambers, Jan. 7, Baron Bignon, in name of the commission for drawing up the address, and with their unanimous approbation, delivered a very remarkable speech on the subject of foreign affairs. He dwelt at great length upon the treatment of Poland by Russia, and denounced the conduct of the latter power as directly subversive of the solemn treaties to which she was pledged. He alluded to Mr. Cuthlar Fergusson's motion in the British Parliament on this subject, and quoted Lord Palmerston's energetic speech against Russian injustice delivered on that occasion: he could have wished that some equally strong expression had been made by the French government. In very eloquent language, he then alluded, as if prophetically, to the future triumph of the Poles over their barbarian oppressors. From Poland to Turkey, M. Bignon said, the transition was not too rapid. The dangers of Turkey were consequent upon the ruin of Poland. There were recollections and facts in history, some of them not yet revealed, which rendered it impossible to rely on the disinterestedness of Russia. He then informed his hearers of the fact, that in 1803, the Emperor Alexander had proposed to give up Spain, Portugal, and Italy, to France, together with Bosnia, Albania, the Morea, and the islands, provided Napoleon would permit him to seize Constantinople and the Dardanelles; Constantinople, he said, would be merely a country-town to him, and the Dardanelles the key to his house. This project, however, Napoleon never would consent to.

The designs of Austria on Italy, and of Prussia on the German States, were then referred to; and M. Bignon said that the Congress now assembling at Vienna would add new links to the chain of their policy. But if their designs succeeded, there would be treachery against France. It could not be the desire of France that the treaties of 1815 should be observed, notwithstanding her love of peace, to preserve which she had submitted to such humiliation. M. Bignon continued—

"The least we can do is to require from the powers that are enriched by stripping us, that they remain within the extensive limits they have allotted to themselves; it is the least we can do to oppose them in increasing those limits; and the least we can do is to protest against new invasions.

"Well, gentlemen, as the three principal countries of Europe are threatened with invasion—as Turkey is incontrovertibly in danger—as danger impends over Italy and Germany—would it not be the height of imprudence to close our eyes in order not to see the storm until the moment it is ready to burst upon us? It is fitting, it is right, that the government should be beforehand acquainted with the opinions of the chamber. . . .

Before we come to a readjustment of the European territory, such as perhaps the ministry anticipates, there might be put into operation a series of gradual usurpations, which are the more dangerous, as, by being tolerated at first, they have a tendency to acquire by fact and by time a sort of legitimacy. It is therefore against these we must fortify ourselves. We must commence by not recognising them—by affixing our censure to them—from their very origin declaring their nullity."

As soon as M. Bignon concluded, the Duc de Broglie rose and said, that he thanked the orator for his speech, and the commission for their address, "every paragraph and principle of which the ministers adopted." He would wait till the debate was farther advanced, and reserve what he had to say for his reply.

The Duc de Broglie afterwards found that he had gone too far in making this declaration, which had the effect of making all Europe for some days speculate on the probability of a war. He found it necessary to offer his resignation to the king, who, however, refused it; and the minister then gave an explanation in the chamber, by which he endeavoured to make it appear that what he said was entirely hypothetical.

The address in reply to the king's speech was carried by 288 against 43; the latter number must be considered as comprehending the whole amount of Carlists and Republicans in the Chamber. On the budget of the Minister of Finance being opened, it was found that the estimated expense for 1834 was a sum equal to L.41,200,000; the revenue only L.39,860,000. This deficit, with another arising from arrears, which makes it L.3,000,000, is to be supplied by a loan to that amount.

The trial of the twenty-seven (not 25) Republican conspirators, alluded to in our last, terminated on Sunday, Dec. 22, in their acquittal. During this trial, three of the prisoners' counsel used very intemperate language towards the Attorney-General, whom they openly styled a wretch and a liar, and to the judges, who were designated the vile menials and mercenaries of an usurper. The court in consequence condemned the three counsel, one to suspension from his functions for twelve months, and the other two to a similar penalty for six months. At this sentence—which has called general attention to the arbitrary power assumed by all courts of taking justice into their own hands for offences against themselves—the uproar and confusion, previously very great, became much increased. Every opprobrious epithet was bestowed on the court and government amidst the deafening bravos of the prisoners, whose republican cockades, undaunted mien, and threatening attitude, backed by the cheers of their frères and amis, who had gathered in large numbers, looked at one time so terrific that women fainted, and others took to their heels in dread of a conflict.

The French people are at last awakening to the truth, of which the English from their longer experience have been for some time aware—that the constitution of the representative body is the really vital question of government, and that their own rests on far too narrow a basis. For the first time, numerous petitions are now preparing from various parts of France for a more popular system of election.

UNITED STATES.

THE session of Congress opened on the 3d December. The speech of the president, which was extremely long, began with congratulations upon the happy condition of the Union. He says, "Our condition abroad is no less honourable than it is prosperous at home. Seeking nothing that is not right, and determined to submit to nothing that is wrong, but desiring honest friendships and liberal intercourse with all nations, the United States have gained throughout the world the confidence and respect which are due to the character of the American people, and to a policy so just and so congenial to the spirit of their institutions." With Great Britain the question of the north-east boundary remains unsettled; but the negotiations for the erection of lighthouses on the Bahamas have been successful. "It is gratifying to the friends of both [countries] to perceive that the intercourse between the two people is becoming daily more extensive, and that sentiments of mutual good will have grown up befitting their common origin, justifying the hope that by wise counsels on each side, not only unsettled questions may be satisfactorily terminated, but new causes of misunderstanding prevented." The president complained that France had not paid the first instalment, under the convention of the 4th July 1831. He then adverted to the relations of the Union with Russia, Spain, Portugal, Denmark, the Two Sicilies, Belgium, and the Sublime Porte. As to the finances of the United States, "the receipts into the treasury during this year will amount to more than 32,000,000 of dollars. The revenue derived from customs will, it is believed, be more than 28,000,000, and the public lands will yield about 3,000,000. The expenditures within the year for all objects, including 2,572,240 of dollars, 99 on account of the public debt, will not amount to 25,000,000; and a large balance will remain in the treasury after satisfying all the appropriations chargeable on the revenue for the present year." The revenue of the coming year will be sufficient to discharge the remainder of the national debt, and under circumstances an alteration in the tariff is not recommended. "We have waged two wars (he says) since we have become a nation, with one of the most powerful kingdoms in the world; both of them undertaken in defence of our dearest rights—both successfully prosecuted and honourably terminated—and many of those who partook in the first struggle as well as the second will have lived to see the last item of the debt incurred in these necessary but expensive conflicts faithfully and honestly discharged; and we shall have the proud satisfaction of bequeathing to the public servants who follow us in the administration of the government, the rare blessing of a revenue sufficiently abundant, raised without injustice or oppression to our citizens, and unencumbered with any burdens but what they themselves shall think proper to impose upon them." He strongly urged upon the Congress the necessity of a rigid economy, and an inflexible determination not to enlarge the income beyond the real necessities of the government. The president justified the withdrawal of the government deposits from the United States' Bank, and observed strongly upon the misconduct of the bank which made such a step necessary. He alleged that the bank was systematically converted into an electioneering engine. In the point of the case, the question is distinctly presented whether the people of the United States are to govern through representatives chosen by their unbiased suffrages, or whether the power and money of a great corporation are to be secretly exerted to influence their judgment, and control their decisions. The president stated, "In my own sphere of duty, I should feel myself called on by the facts disclosed to order a scire facias against the bank, with a view to put an end to the chartered rights it has so palpably violated, were it not that the charter itself will expire as soon as the decision would probably be obtained from the court of last resort."

The president alluded with great uneasiness to the continual increase of disasters in the steam-navigation, and he recommended to the state legislatures to endeavour to remedy the evil by penal legislation. I said nothing respecting the colonization of the negroes but alluded to the impossibility of the Indians or whites living within the same limits. "Establish in the midst of another and superior race, and wit out appreciating the causes of their inferiority, seeking to control them, the Indians must necessarily yield to the force of circumstances, and ere long disappear." In conclusion, he recommended an amendment of the constitution, in relation to the mode of electing the president and vice-president of the United States. "Regarding it," says the president, "as all important to the future quiet and harmony of the people, that every intermediate agent in the election of these officers should be removed, and that their eligibility should be limited to one term of either four or six years, I cannot too earnestly invite your consideration of the subject."

The most important business to be brought before Congress on this occasion, was certainly the question of the bank charter. A trial of strength took place upon the subject almost immediately after the opening of the session. Mr. McDuffie, one of the members for South Carolina, proposed that a memorial presented to the house on behalf of the bank directors should be referred to a committee of the whole house with the general bank question; while the friends of the administration insisted upon its being referred to the committee of ways and means. On this question it was agreed expressly that a trial of strength should take place; and the government party obtained a majority of 133 to 96 votes. This is considered decisive of the fate of the bank.

It is well known that both houses of Congress formerly voted for the renewal of the bank charter—the institution having secured, by bribery, a great influence in their election. The president, in vindication of purity of election, and with a conscientious regard to the non-expediency of renewing the charter refused his assent, and thus placed himself at issue with the representative portions of the legislature. He would now appear to be in the fair way of overcoming the influences which he had then to oppose. The British press expresses great surprise at seeing the president of a republic do that which no constitutional monarch could do in the elder hemisphere. They do not reflect, that the veto in the latter is kind of fiction, while, in the former, being recent and deliberately entrusted by the nation into the hands of its chief magistrate, it is a reality, and must accordingly be acted upon.

SPAIN.

THE Carlist insurrection continued during the month of December to give considerable trouble to the queen's government, though it is evidently of a partial and ill-concerted nature to produce serious danger. The guerilla warfare proceeded as usual in Navarre; and in Biscay, Arragon, and Valencia parties of the insurgents appeared in considerable force. On the 21st (Dec.) a body of the queen's troops, amounting to 300 of the line, and 200 of the royal guard, commanded by General D'Espinosa, was completely defeated, and put to the rout by the Carlists under the celebrated chief Zavala, at Guernica, in Biscay. Nearly the whole of the guards, and eight of the other soldiers, were killed, and 120 wounded. On the 26th the rebels were strong enough to make a formidable attack upon Tolosa, but were successfully resisted. Zavala or Zavalla who is now represented as the real leader of the Carlist party, has been negotiating with General Valdez, but, from the high tone he assumed, no accommodation was arrived at. About the end of December, Morillo made an incursion into Portugal with a large force, for the purpose of seizing Don Carlos, who, with his general, Meriz was understood to be at Villa Real. The invader advanced as far as Braganza, but without succeeding in their object. Subsequently, General Rodil made another incursion for the same purpose, but equally without success. These aggressions upon his territory have greatly incensed Don Miguel, who is said to have proposed retaliating, by lending the aid of 3000 men to Don Carlos, for an invasion of Spain. The latter individual, however, does not seem inclined to hazard his own person in the warfare now instituted in his favour.

By far the most remarkable event of the month has been a constitutional movement in Catalonia. The municipality of Barcelona—the inhabitants of which are the most intelligent in Spain—adopted the resolution, at the beginning of January, of sending an embassy to the queen-regent, stating their wishes to the following effect:—“1. That the Spaniards receive a representative government, with the liberties connected with it.—2. The suppression of the abbies, and all the monkish rabble (y demas fravlesca calla).—3. The liberty of the press.—4. The reform of the clergy.—5. The distribution of its property among the people.—6. The suppression of the tithes and other imposts injurious to farmers and landowners.” The captain-general of the province, Llaner, not only countenanced these “wishes,” but dispatched them to the queen. It is stated that her majesty returned the packet unopened, and that it was spatched back again—accompanied in the latter instance by an expression of similar wishes from Quesada, captain-general of Old Castile, and a hint that they were participated in by several other governors of provinces, yet of men apparently very powerful in Spain. The queen now perceived that an extensive plan had been formed, in concert with her council of regency, to bring about a change of measures, and accordingly gave orders for a remodelling of the administration. The removal of the absolutist, Zea Bermudez, seems the chief object in view. The queen about the same time—but we are unable to say whether in consequence of the constitutional movement or not—caused the publication of a list of sub-delegates under the new territorial vision of the kingdom, and of their chief secretaries, the most of whom were found to be persons conspicuous for their sufferings in the constitutional cause. The Spectator of January 18 says:—“From information which we have recently received, and on which we place reliance, we are led to believe that the state parties in Spain is by no means understood in this country; and that it is systematically misrepresented in several of the leading papers. There are but two parties possessing real power in Spain, the Constitutionalists and the Carlists. The Juste Milieu, the queen's party, contains some adroit politicians, but is no hold upon the nation. It is essentially weak, and extremely unpopular. No permanent junction is possibly take place between it and the Constitutionalists or the Carlists. The only chance, therefore, which the queen-regent has of preserving the throne for her infant daughter, is by throwing herself tirely into the arms of the constitutionalists. The Carlist party is not the miserable faction of plunderers which some describe it to be. It comprises a very large and increasing portion of the people, and a number of men of great property and high influence, besides the priesthood. It receives the voluntary contributions of the inhabitants, who refuse to pay taxes to the queen's government. A compromise between this formidable confederacy and the constitutionalists is not impossible; but neither of them will listen to terms of alliance with the French or Juste Milieu, which is the object of their thorough detestation. It may suit the purpose of diplomatists and their organs to represent matters differently; but this is the actual state of parties in Spain.”

The Spanish government, which is much embarrassed by the deficiency of its revenue, has received proposals for a loan from M. Aguado, a Parisian banker, who seems perfectly to understand how to make the most of its necessities. He offers to fund a nominal capital of £6,600,000, at 3 per cent., for which the real capital advanced will be only £2,400,000; and for the use of this sum, the government is to pay £270,000 per annum, or nearly 12 per cent., with the ultimate chance of having to pay back two pounds or fifty shillings for every one pound borrowed, if its credit should improve, as may be expected under a reformed system! The minister to whom the proposal was referred has reported against accepting it, though it is not probable that any capitalist will offer better terms. Such are the consequences of bad faith. The Cortes' bonds are a warning to all monied men who might be disposed to embark in such speculations.

PORTUGAL.

THE state of parties in Portugal remains in the same condition as formerly—Pedro being possessed of Lisbon and Oporto, while Miguel continues in great strength at Santarem, with uncontrolled sway over almost all the kingdom except those two cities. The policy pursued by the former person still gives great dissatisfaction to the friends of his cause; his ministry is unpopular; and his treatment of one Count Taipa, who, for remonstrating against some of his measures, was arrested as a partisan of the enemy, has proved the cause of much obloquy against him.

On the 17th of December, Baron Romefort, an emissary of the queen-regent of Portugal, made a proposal from her majesty at Santarem, for a mediation of her court in conjunction with Great Britain, in the quarrel between Miguel and his brother. Don Miguel unhesitatingly rejected the proposal, and the baron immediately took his departure for Lisbon. It has been announced in this country on official authority, that Don Pedro expressed his willingness to accept of the terms proposed by this Anglo-Spanish mediation; which is not unlikely, as they probably involved the abdication of his brother, and the establishment of his daughter's authority. The official gazette at Lisbon soon after contained the offer of a general amnesty from Pedro to the Miguelites, but without what alone could procure it confidence, official signatures. There seems reason to conclude that the British cabinet made this proposal of mediation, with some view to taking active measures in the event of Miguel's rejection, for forcing the restoration of peace. As stated elsewhere, the question of an armed interference in the Portuguese quarrel was understood to be a matter of keen debate in the cabinet about the 16th of January; one party being eager for the immediate transmission of an army to the aid of Donna Maria, and another (including probably the conservative part of the administration) protesting against such interference in the internal affairs of a foreign nation. It was even rumoured on Saturday, Jan. 18, that Earl Grey had resigned on the previous day, in consequence of the thwarting of his wishes on this subject. In reality, there seems more reason to conclude that Earl Grey was averse from interference. He visited the king at Brighton on the Thursday, returning on Friday, on which day he stated to Prince Talleyrand, with whom he dined, that his reception had been most gracious and satisfactory. On the same evening, the Courier contained a demi-official notice, that, for the present, Ministers had determined not to undertake an armed interference in the affairs of Portugal. This resolution, coupled with the satisfactory nature of Earl Grey's interview with the king, seems to indicate what we have surmised. But, indeed, it is easy to see that an interference could hardly be undertaken with any decency by the Ministers. They are bound, no doubt, to protect Portugal from invasion. This, however, is not the nature of the case, and no other pretext can well be urged. The Ministers have already profited by the promise they gave at their installation into office, of non-interference with foreign states; if they were now to break that promise, without adequate cause, their conduct would be justly liable to the severest blame, as being totally unregulated by principle.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

THE affairs of Holland and Belgium now present a marked contrast. While the financial measures of the latter country proceed with perfect ease and comfort, those of the former are greatly embarrassed—the supplies having been only passed by a majority of 28 against 24. The king of the Netherlands cannot long hold out against the popular opposition which seems to have been excited by his recent policy.

WEST INDIES.

THE abolition bill has been passed by the Legislative Assembly of Jamaica, by a large majority; but has been protested against at St Vincent's.

The Prussian government has made great progress in establishing its plan for the Commercial Confederation of Germany. There is to be an exemption from duties on German products in German states, a uniform tariff of duties on foreign products, and a uniform scale of weights, measures, and coins. The revenue, when collected, is to be paid into one common treasury, and divided among the different members of the Confederation, in proportion to their extent, population, &c., in lieu of the duties they now separately enforce. The evident object of Prussia is to gain a more extensive market for her own manufactures, by excluding those of foreign states—especially English—from the greater part of Germany. At present, our exports to those countries which are, or certainly will become, members of the Confederation, amount to about eleven millions annually. Thus the trade which is endangered by the Prussian project is of very great importance to us.—The details of this plan are not completed, but we may be sure that no time will be lost in their settlement. That numerous obstructions, and much practical wrong to the minor members of the Confederacy, will result from this new continental system, is very probable; but once established, it will be difficult to compel a relinquishment of it by the dominant power of Prussia. We at least in England have no right to complain of the vast loss of trade which will probably be occasioned by it. Our corn and timber duties afford an ample excuse to the German states for any retaliatory measures they may think it for their interest to take. The Confederacy includes the whole of Germany not under the sway of Austria, except Frankfort, which will probably be soon obliged to join it.

The Emperor of Russia has just been taking some very vigorous steps for retarding the progress of education in his dominions; an excellent method of preventing the increase of his own power.

An insurrection of a formidable nature broke out in Buenos Ayres on the 11th of October, occasioned by the House of Representatives having passed a bill prohibiting the journalists from inserting any political remarks in their papers. Four of the papers were consequently discontinued, but one persisted in discussing politics, and was ordered to be prosecuted. Upon this, great crowds of people, principally butchers, collected, and had a scuffle with the police; after which the cavalry galloped out of town, and made attempts to raise the country. They soon collected a considerable force, and, headed by General Pinedo, took possession of all the strong points in the neighbourhood of the city. The government relies for assistance on some troops in the interior. In this condition affairs stood when the last accounts were dispatched, on the 26th of October.

There has been some severe fighting in Mexico, the hostile armies having recovered partially from the effects of the cholera. The rebels, under Arists, were completely defeated, at Mellado, by the president, Santa Anna, on or about the 16th of October—the exact date is not given. This victory will, it is hoped, restore tranquillity to the country for some time to come.

PROBABILITY OF A WAR.

IN the midst of pacific theories, and the pursuits appropriate to peace—internal improvement, education, political amelioration, and commerce—we have just been roused, as with a trumpet's voice, by the cry that one war, if not two, are about to be commenced. The first and most important was one in concert with France against Russia, for the purpose of rescuing Turkey from the almost closing talons of that voracious power. By the treaty of July 8, to which allusion was made at the proper place in this paper, it was agreed that Turkey should accept the aid of Russia, in preventing armed foreign vessels from entering the Dardanelles. The transactions since, so far as known, may be briefly traced. In October, the representative of Louis Philip at St Petersburg presented a note, expressing the profound affection of his master at this treaty, and avowing that, if its stipulations should lead to an armed intervention of Russia in the internal affairs of Turkey, the French government would consider itself at full liberty to adopt such a line of conduct as may be suggested by circumstances. In answer to this, it was represented by the Russian cabinet, that the treaty was a matter concerning no other powers than Russia and Turkey, and proceeded upon views which, when better explained, would be approved by other powers. “It is true,” says this document, “that this act changes the nature of the relations between Russia and the Porte; for in the room of long-continued hostility, it substitutes that friendship and that confidence in which the Turkish government will henceforth find a guarantee for its stability, and, if necessary, the means of defence calculated to ensure its preservation.” In all probability a similar correspondence will be found to have taken place between the British representative and the cabinet of St Petersburg. Nevertheless, both France and Britain have considered it necessary to prepare the means of asserting the freedom of the Dardanelles, and the integrity of the Turkish empire, by reinforcing their fleets in the Mediterranean. Besides the vessels which still continue to be fitted out at Toulon, it appears by recent advices from Smyrna that the British and French naval forces in the Levant are already considerable. The English ships of the line, Caledonia and Talavera, and the large steam frigate Salamander, with an engine of 200 horse-power, had just arrived from Malta. There are also in the Mediterranean the Britannia, with Admiral Malcolm's flag, the St Vincent, the Malabar, 74, the two cut-down ships Barmham and Alfred, the Madagascar frigate, and several sloops and brigs.

Early in December, the Porte took alarm at these formidable preparations, and demanded from the ambassadors of the respective nations an explanation of the circumstance. On being informed that the cause was the recent treaty between Russia and Turkey, the sultan gave orders to put the forts upon the Dardanelles into a warlike state, and to allow no vessel to enter the channel without a special permission. Since then, as we are informed by very recent accounts, the British fleet has put back to Malta on account of the weather.

Early in the past month, an article of a threatening character and official appearance, in an Austrian newspaper, reached the metropolis, where it was received by several of the newspapers, including the Times and ministerial Globe, with loud denance, and most warlike denunciations. The design of Russia was described by the former paper as having been fixed for several years to the appropriation of Turkey; and her late supposed hostility to political advancement in the west was alleged to have been merely a mask upon this grand object. Her resolution to execute her design was described as fixed, judging from her known preparations. “She has,” says the Times, “twenty-three sail of the line in the Euxine, moored within sixty hours' sail of Constantinople, and she has a land force ready to be embarked at a minute's notice, of between 30,000 and 40,000 men. Russia has, besides, a fleet in the Baltic of twenty-seven ships of the line. Is it then a question whether, when Russia employs such arguments as fifty sail of the line—one portion of them almost within cannon-shot of the Mediterranean; the other within a fortnight's sail of Liverpool or Hull—to confirm and enforce the dispatches of her negotiators—do we live to hear it asked whether Great Britain is to feel herself or her commercial interests secure, with no preparations but an additional ream or two of the raw materials of diplomacy in our Foreign Office?”

The appearance of subsequent articles in continental papers, and the retraction of an imprudent military outburst by the French minister De Broglie, have somewhat dispelled the prospect of war, and the feeling of the ministerial prints is by no means responded to in the same tone by the rest, or by the press in general.

neral. The disadvantages of an acquisition of Turkey by Russia are very palpable—though, after all, as a commercial question, it is one of little importance; but most are agreed that war must be avoided by all means, as its effects could not be much short of national bankruptcy, and consequent revolution and anarchy.

The other war above alluded to was one for assisting Don Pedro. It is understood that, during the week ending January 18, this question was keenly debated in the British cabinet, which was much divided in opinion, but at last determined to take no step of the kind.

IRELAND.

The agitation of the repeal question has been going on under the auspices of Mr O'Connell, during the past month; but, upon the whole, the tone of Ireland has been comparatively quiet during that space of time. The papers continue to display regular lists of outrages, and the Gazette of December 19 contained no fewer than nine government proclamations, offering rewards from L.30 to L.100, for the detection of the perpetrators of assaults, murders, and robberies, in the counties of Mayo, Louth, Armagh, Down, Kildare, and Tipperary.

Mr O'Connell has declared that he will make his motion for the repeal of the Union on the 15th of April.

Early in January, the crown solicitor wrote to Mr Barrett, offering to abandon all proceedings against him, provided that he would furnish evidence sufficient to convict Mr O'Connell of having authorised the publication of the libellous letter in the Pilot. To this letter a reply was sent, signed "Richard Barrett," stating that Mr O'Connell would admit the authorship, provided he should be tried by an impartial jury of Protestants unconnected with politics, or one composed of half Protestants and half Catholics. The crown solicitor sent an answer to this letter, stating the "insufficiency of the admission," and containing a notice to Mr Barrett that the sentence upon him would be called for. When the subject was before the court, however, on the 13th ult., an affidavit by Mr Barrett was produced, in which he declared that the letter written to the solicitor had neither been sent by him nor authorised by Mr O'Connell. In short, it must either have been a hoax, or the affidavit conceals a subterfuge. Further proceedings in this case were postponed.

While so little intelligence of a pleasing nature comes from Ireland, the following will be found truly agreeable to benevolent minds:—"A considerable portion of Mr Otway Cave's estate, which was held by a middleman, has recently come into his hands. The occupying tenants, owing to a grinding rack-rent, were not only deeply indebted, but steeped to the lips in poverty and wretchedness. On the 10th ult. they were assembled at Castle Otway; and language cannot describe the feelings of the poor fellows when they were informed that henceforward they were to consider themselves the immediate tenants of Mr Cave, that their rents were consequently reduced in about the proportion of a third part, and that the arrears due, amounting to several hundred pounds, were blotted out for ever."—Tipperary Free Press.

ENGLAND.

We understand that the King will go to town on the 4th of February to open the session. His Majesty will remain in London four days, then return to Brighton, where the court will continue till the 20th February.—Brighton Gazette.

His Majesty has transmitted to the Marquis of Chandos, through the privy purse, the sum of L.50 in aid of the fund for giving premiums to agricultural labourers.

The Duke of Wellington is likely to be the new Chancellor of Oxford University, in the room of Lord Grenville.

Lord Torrington has been finally appointed the new Lord of the Bedchamber.

Lord Howick succeeds Mr George Lamb (deceased) as under Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Lord Grenville, the coadjutor of Mr Pitt during the early part of the late war, and himself prime minister in 1807, died on the 12th January, aged 75. His office of auditor of the exchequer is to be suppressed; but the duties are in the meantime to be performed by Lord Auckland, with the salary (L.2000) applicable to the inferior office of comptroller, which will be conferred on his lordship.

It is understood in the city to be the intention of government to transmit silver coin forthwith to the West India colonies, to the amount of L.500,000, probably as a preparation for the great measure of compensation, but certainly intended to form part of the currency of the islands.

The Lords of the Treasury have issued an order to the distributor of stamps, requiring that, after the expiration of two years from the date of publication, the files of all newspapers deposited with them shall be transmitted to the British Museum; and their lordships, at the same time, direct that particular attention shall be paid to keeping the series complete.

It is said to be decided that degrees shall be conferred in London, not by either King's College or the London University, but on the student of either, by a Board appointed for the purpose.

Miss F. Kemble has been married in America to a Mr Butler, but continues to appear on the stage under her former name.

The Revenue.—The income of the year ended 5th January 1834, is L.42,936,845. The income for the year ended 5th January 1833, is L.43,379,339. The decrease on the year is L.442,494. The income for the quarter ended 5th January 1834, is L.11,637,525. The income for the quarter ended 5th January 1833, is L.11,789,072. The decrease on the quarter is L.151,547. In the year, the great decrease is in the customs, L.612,894. There is an increase in the excise of L.183,741, and in the post-office of L.63,000. Taking the quarter's revenue, there is an increase in the excise of L.298,005, and a decrease in the customs of L.293,019, so that the one nearly balances the other. The decrease in the taxes is L.94,122, which is alone nearly L.3000 more than the total of the decrease in the quarter. The agitation which has taken place with regard to the inhabited house duty and window duty in the metropolitan districts, will partly account for the deficiency in the taxes. The ministerial newspapers assert that the income of 1833 exceeds the expenditure by a million and a half; which will in itself be sufficient to allow of the remission of the house duty.

The continued advance in the price of the funds causes much speculation in the city as to the cause. It appears that the East India Company, having a very large cash balance in hand, between L.3,000,000 and L.4,000,000, and having determined not to lend it out on private credit, however high (although some applications from leading monied men had been made for its use), has placed in deposit with the Bank of England, for a fixed period, a portion of the amount; the Times says L.1,500,000. It is further stated by that journal that the bank is to pay interest at the rate of two per cent. on this deposit; and that it is to be lent by the latter at a higher rate of interest to two of the leading city capitalists. This is the first instance known of any payment of interest on deposits made at the Bank of England, and may lead to important changes in the banking business of the metropolis. The Morning Herald, however, describes the loans referred to as having been made direct by the East India Company to two houses—that of Overend, Gurney, and Co., and that of Rothschild—and says, that the amount advanced to each is one million, on the security of stock. A considerable increase of the circulation is anticipated in consequence.

Jan. 14.—A numerous meeting was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, for the purpose of appointing a committee with a view to the formation of a central Anti-Corn Law Society. Sir J. S. Lillie, in the chair. The assembly was addressed by Mr Rosson, Mr Owen, Mr Fearon, Mr Ashurst, Colonel P. Thomson, Mr Knapp, Mr Nicholson, and Col. Stanhope, in support of resolutions—that the natural tendency of the corn-laws is to cramp industry; to injure directly the merchant, manufacturer, and shipowner, by preventing the production and exportation of goods; that it also directly injured the landowner and farmer by producing mischievous fluctuations in the price of corn, and by checking the employment and consequent wealth of the consumers; that it was therefore desirable that the corn-laws should be gradually but totally repealed. The resolutions were agreed to, and a committee appointed.

A great anti-tithe meeting of the county of Devon took place on the 10th January. The assemblage may be fairly stated at about 3000—a considerable number for the season of the year—and it was generally admitted that the major part consisted of the leading yeomanry of the county. Mr Hamlyn proposed the petition, which was condemnatory of the tithe system, which the petitioners stated to be "at variance with the dictates of reason and the principles of justice, and most oppressively grievous, in cases that frequently occur, where the value of the whole crop will not clear the expense of raising it." The petition prayed that "the tithes might be permanently commuted on the basis of supposing the tithe-owner the tenth joint proprietor of the soil." The hon. gentleman spoke at some length in favour of the petition. Sir H. P. Davie, Bart., seconded it; and Mr Parrott, M.P. for Totness, ably followed on the same side. Captain Buller, R.N., of Whimpole, moved an amendment, the object of which was to get rid of the specific clause of the petition for commuting the tithe to a tenth of the land. He maintained that the only party that would be benefited by the abolition of tithes was the landowner; and, on the ground of common honesty, he could not permit any meeting of landowners to dictate to the legislature what the commutation should be. Above nine-tenths of the meeting were opposed to this view of the question; and the amendment, which was seconded by Mr Divett, M.P. for Exeter, was negatived by a most overpowering majority. Lord Ebrington, Mr Fellowes, and Mr Bulteel, expressed their opposition to the petition adopted, on account of the specific clause, very much to the dissatisfaction of the meeting. The meeting was characterised by one interesting and almost universal feature—the most unqualified expression of determination to get rid of the system altogether, if the legislature did not speedily amend it.

The autumn and early winter of 1833 have been remarkable for the number of storms which have visited the coasts of Western Europe and Eastern America, and the immense amount of damage to shipping which has been the consequence. On the last day of the year Liverpool was visited by a sudden and severe gale, which drove all the vessels in the Mersey, without exception, from their moorings.—On the same day, the metropolis was visited with a violent storm of wind and rain, which did considerable damage, principally in the suburbs. On the Thames, numerous tiers of shipping in the upper and lower pools broke from their moorings, and several of the colliers were injured. Two ballast-lighters went down off Deptford, but the men escaped by jumping into their boats. A barge filled with barrels and provisions was driven against New London Bridge; she soon filled, and went down near Billingsgate. Three persons were drowned by the upsetting of a boat in Limehouse Reach. A coal-barge was swamped and sunk near Bankside.—The greatest distress has been experienced all along the southern coast of England, by the seamen, in consequence of the detention of their vessels some of them for eight, nine, ten, and even twelve or thirteen weeks, in port, on account of the unfavourable weather, these poor men receiving no pay while no sea.

There is scarcely a civilised state in Europe where the local records of births, marriages, and deaths, are irregularly kept, or so ill calculated to answer their avowed object, as they are in England; while there is no country in the world, where, from the migratory habits of our people, the extent of our empire, and the amount of our litigated funds (the distribution and ownership of which depend upon such records), a complete and accurate registration would be more useful, or is, in more indispensable.—Times.

The Globe states that Ministers are preparing bills establishing a system of civil registration applicable to sects.

The Lord Chancellor lately obtained a small pension for the eminent Dr Dalton of Manchester; Mr God has been appointed to a place, the duties of which are easy to fulfil, while its salary places him above want; Earl Grey has restored the royal pension of L.100 to Jamieson, the learned author of the "Scottish Dictionary."

Early in the month, the will of Mr R. Heber, who had for some time been sought for in vain, was found between two volumes in the library at his house in London. The personal property has been sworn to be L.600,000. After annuities of no great amount to various relations, he gives his sister, Mrs Cholmondeley, life interest in the whole of his property, real and personal; the whole, after her death, to go to his only niece, Miss Heber, daughter of the late Bishop of Cuthbert. The books in Mr Heber's library are estimated at 85,000, and the cost at L.150,000. The absurdity such a collection is very apparent, when we consider that rejecting 5000 volumes as dictionaries, 2000 would remain to be read per annum in a life of 40 adult years.

A thousand pounds in sovereigns was lately lost in a mysterious way between the Bank of England and the Navy Pay Office at Plymouth, which has determined the government to transmit sums to the outposts by confidential persons connected with the bank.

While the British landholders are asleep, the Americans are pouring their wheat into Canada, to be grown there, and then sent to this country as colonial flour. Last year the importation into the Clyde of what is called Canadian flour was equal to about a sixth part of all flour baked in the electoral district of Glasgow. It rapidly increases, and in a few years it will effect a reduction in the price of corn nearly as great as if trade were free. The average value of flour in the exporting districts of the United States is about 21 freight to Liverpool, 2s.; total cost in Liverpool, 2s. present price of wheat imported from Canada, 32s. Price by the transit through Canada, 9s.—Glasgow Chronicle.

The Cambridge Chronicle states that a pension is about to be bestowed upon the widow of Belzoni.

At present there are 100 inmates of the Birmingham workhouse fewer than during Christmas last year, about 1000 less out-poor relieved by the overseers.—Birmingham Journal.

The number of emigrants to Canada, in the last three years, amounts to 133,970, and the markets for British manufactures have increased in a greater ratio than the population. During the last year, 1035 British vessels, amounting to 279,704 tons, navigated by 12,243 seamen have entered the port of Quebec alone. This astonishing trade has increased from 69 vessels, navigated by 731 seamen, in the year 1805. A million and a half value in British manufactures has paid duties of import.—Leeds Mercury.

Mr Laird, who was associated with Lander in his expedition to the Niger, and has just returned to England in the Columbine, brings with him accounts from Land then at Atta, to the 21st of July last. The following, regarding Lander, is the substance of his information. His trip up the river from the mouth of the Nun (a canoe) occupied him thirty-two days. He met Mr La and Lieutenant Allen, who had imagined he was either dead or had returned to England, descending the river with the steamer on their way back to the coast. It was on the 12th of July. Lander immediately arranged that Mr Laird should return to the coast in the Quorra, and gave back to him some part of the cargo from the Columbine; while, with the iron steamer, he would himself push on to Rabba and Boussa. He seems determined farther to distinguish himself by discovery, and by the establishment of a commercial intercourse with the natives, in which he had confident hopes of being successful. Mr Laird, during his sojourn in Africa, suffered greatly from fever. For several months he was confined to a miserable hut, till some of his bones had actually cut their skin. Lander expected to be in England by Christmas.

An effort was recently made by a party of the subscribers to the Liverpool Exchange Reading Room, to cause the doors to be shut during Sunday. A debate took place on the subject, and it was finally carried 65 against 25, that the room should be kept open.

A correspondent of the Times mentions that the number of churchmen in Nottingham, the population of which in 1831 was 50,000, does not exceed 5800; while the dissenting congregations number 12,000. The number of children taught in the Sunday schools of the establishment is 1678; in those of the dissenters, 5048. The statement disproves, as far as Nottingham is concerned, the assertion of a writer in the last Edinburgh Review that in England "not above a third or a fourth are adherents."

Drink for Horses.—Some innkeepers in Coventry and its vicinity have adopted the practice recommended by a member of the Bath Agricultural Society, of boiling the corn given to horses, and giving them the water to drink. Three bushels of oats, &c. so prepared, will keep horses better for working than double the quantity crude.

number of prisoners in the House of Correction at Wakefield is now about 150 less than usual, and this is accounted for by the restrictions that have been lately imposed. The diet has been lowered, the use of tobacco prohibited, and the prisoners are not allowed to speak to one another from the time of going into prison to coming out: if one is heard to speak to another, by night or by day, he is placed in solitary confinement for twenty-four hours; and this regulation is found to be productive of very beneficial results. Some who have lately been admitted have declared that if they go there again, it will be for something that will either hang or transport them, for they will never be doomed to silence.—Tyne Mercury.

The expenses of constructing railways are deceitful to the initiated. L.4000 per mile has been set down as the average cost of laying a double set of tracks; but Mr. Johnson's estimate of that from London to Birmingham averages L.21,786 per mile. The annual expense of working a locomotive engine on the Manchester railway was calculated originally at L.270, 12s. 10d.; but according to Mr. Grahame of Glasgow, L.2107, 14s. are actually expended for the purpose. These are facts full of interest to those who are now embarking their property in this way.—Leeds Intelligencer.

There are in Suffolk five contiguous parishes, the aggregate tithes of which amount to nearly L.2500 per annum, in not one of which is there a resident clergyman; the income destined and adequate to provide for resident incumbents, at L.500 per annum each, being entirely absorbed by one of the colleges at Cambridge, who employ two non-resident curates, at L.100 per annum each, to perform divine service!

More than six thousand persons have been put on board transports, as convicts to Botany Bay, during the last year. A vast number who have been sentenced are in prison or the hulks.

A curious fact, favourable to Mr. Lyell's theory of the earth, has just occurred in North America. During one of the late severe storms, a channel three hundred yards wide, and eight or ten feet deep, was opened across Long Point, a promontory on Lake Erie, where a canal at the expense of L.12,000 was contemplated, but which will be abandoned by this extraordinary convulsion of nature. The fact is incontestably vouched.

A brigand, named Vincent della Bianca, better known by the appellation of Sciavinetto, who has long been the terror of Lombardy, from his audacious robberies and murders, was lately discovered walking in the streets of Milan, elegantly dressed. Immediately he was recognised, and assailed by the police-officers, assisted by soldiers and the people, all eager to secure him; but the robber, armed with a pair of pistols and a poniard, defended himself with incredible intrepidity, killing two men, and wounding many others. Finding himself overwhelmed by numbers, he resolutely stabbed himself in several places, and at length extinguished life by cutting his throat.—Galignani's Messenger.

ELECTIONS.

The election of a new representative for Huddersfield, in the room of Captain Fenton deceased, commenced on the 6th of January. The candidates were Mr. Blackburne, a Whiggish Radical, Mr. Sadler, a Tory, and Captain Wood, a thorough Radical. At the close of the poll on the 9th, Mr. Blackburne had 22 votes, Mr. Sadler 147, and Captain Wood 108. Mr. Blackburne, who was declared duly elected, is opposed to the farther extension of the suffrage, until it shall be found that the present act has not produced the end it was intended to effect: he is favourable to the abolition of the corn-laws.

Mr. Edward George Granville Howard is returned to Parliament for the borough of Morpeth, in the room of his late brother, Mr. Frederick Howard.

Mr. James Cornish has resigned his seat for the borough of Totness. Lord Seymour, and Mr. J. T. Myne, of Teffont House, Wiltshire, are candidates to succeed him.

A vacancy was lately expected to take place in the representation of Marylebone, in the anticipation of Sir William Horne being elevated to the bench; and Mr. John Crawford, well known by his writings on eternal statistics, presented himself as a candidate, with an address of distinguished liberality. The prospect of Sir William's elevation has since been doubted. The death of Mr. James Brougham has caused a vacancy in the representation of the new borough of Kendal. We are not aware that any candidate has declared himself. Three gentlemen of Whig principles are named, and with almost equal confidence—Mr. Barham, Mr. Crackenthorpe, and Mr. John Wakefield, junior; the latter is a banker in Kendal, and a member of the Society of Friends.

EDUCATION.

The Lord Chancellor's secretary has addressed a letter to the trustees of various public charities, in which he expresses his lordship's desire to be informed whether they will be disposed to further, so far as lies in their power, plan for the consolidation of the funds of all public charities throughout the kingdom, and the appropriation of them to the purpose of "national education." The Lord Chancellor, with the view of furthering the interests of the Mechanics' Institution in this town, has undertaken to furnish a course of lectures on political economy, to be delivered to the members.—Manchester Chronicle.

The Secretary for the Home Department has issued orders to all schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, calling them to return lists of the number, religion, &c., of their pupils, the number of their assistants, and the salaries allowed to each.

The Belfast Northern Whig bestows high praise upon the school-books now in course of publication by the National Board of Education in Ireland. In the lessons intended for children learning to read, useful information is judiciously given—a point hitherto much neglected by makers of school-books. In the fourth book of lessons, for instance, is a section upon "political economy and the useful arts," to which Smith, Babbage, &c. have been made to contribute; but the greater portion is ascribed to the Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Whately, who has thus (says the Northern Whig) applied his great powers of mind to the humble but most important task of drawing up, for the youth of Ireland, simple lessons in a science, with the general principles of which all should be acquainted; but which has hitherto been overlooked, not only in our schools, but in almost every seminary in the united empire. In the section referred to, his lordship has contrived to state the nature of value, wages, capital, taxes, letting, and hiring, &c., in such a manner as to furnish pupils with tolerably accurate ideas on these subjects.

A sum nearly equal to L.600,000 of British money has been set apart by the French government for public instruction during the ensuing year. The minister who superintends this department of the state-service has ordered each child attending the national schools to be provided with a copy of the New Testament. In order that the demand thus occasioned may be met, no fewer than 50,000 copies of the New Testament have been ordered, and it is understood that the Bible Society is to supply an equal number. In all probability the cause of Protestantism in France will be much advanced by this means.

In Prussia, a sixth part of the entire population is at school. Education in that country is under the control of the minister of public instruction, assisted by a numerous board, divided into three sections, corresponding with the three main branches of his official duties; public worship is under the cognisance of a board of thirteen lay and ecclesiastical counsellors; the board of public education is composed of counsellors, nearly the whole of whom are laymen; and a third, whose province is medicine, of eight counsellors. Each of the boards has an office for its correspondence, and there is a chancery, or public office, for the whole department, besides a private secretary for the minister's assistance. The total expense of conducting the department is L.11,090.

MEDICAL EDUCATION.

PUBLIC attention is at present attracted in an extraordinary degree to the state of medical education in Scotland. A system of regulations was established, Dec. 9, between the University of St. Andrews and a number of private medical teachers in Edinburgh, whereby it was arranged that the instructions of the latter gentlemen should be terminated by diplomas from the above university, both for surgery and medicine, upon certificates being shown by the applicants from a board of examiners established at Edinburgh, and composed partly of the said private teachers. The St. Andrews University, which comprises no such classes itself, thus makes use of its power in a way certainly not contemplated when that power was granted. At a meeting of the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, Jan. 4, resolutions were passed, denouncing the procedure of the university "as being wholly uncalled for by any considerations of public expediency or utility, as a violation of the rights and privileges of this college, and as calculated, in as far as a smaller extent of education is demanded of candidates for that degree, than for the diploma of the college, to impede the exertions which this college have for many years been making to raise the qualifications of those who receive their licence." And a petition to the King was resolved on, praying his Majesty to "interdict the University of St. Andrews from all further procedure in this matter." On the same day, the "examinators to the University of St. Andrews" met, and protested against this petition, for various reasons, among which were, "Because it is absurd in the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh to object to the course of study required of candidates by the University of St. Andrews, seeing that it is nearly the same as that required by the said Royal College, and more extensive than that required to obtain degrees in the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, or Glasgow, or the Royal College of Surgeons of London;" and "Because, if the universities do their duty, they have nothing to fear, possessing many advantages which their rivals do not enjoy. If they should relax in their exertions, there can be no reason why they should have exclusive privileges for their own pecuniary benefit, to the injury of the public."
